PREFACE.

OUR history of Stark County, after months of arduous toil, is now completed. Every important field of research has been minutely scanned by those engaged in its preparation; no subject of universal public value has been omitted, save where protracted effort failed to secure trustworthy results. The necessarily limited nature of the work, the impossibility of ingrafting upon its pages the vast fund of the county's historic information, and the proper omission of many valueless details and events, have compelled the publishers to be brief on all subjects presented. Fully aware of our inability to furnish a perfect history from meager public documents, inaccurate private correspondence and numberless conflicting traditions, we make no pretension of having prepared a work devoid of blemish. Through the courtesy and the generous assistance met with everywhere, we have been enabled to rescue from oblivion the greater portion of important events that have transpired in Stark County in past years. We feel assured that all thoughtful people in the county, at present and in future, will recognize and appreciate the importance of the undertaking, and the great public benefit that has been accomplished.

It will be observed that a dry statement of fact has been avoided; and that the rich romance of border incident has been woven in with statistical details, thus forming an attractive and graphic narrative, and lending beauty to the mechanical execution of the volume, and additional value to it as a work for perusal. We claim superior excellence in our manner of collecting material; in the division of the subject matter into distinct and appropriate chapters; in giving a separate chapter to every town, township and important subject, and in the systematic arrangement of the individual chapters. While we acknowledge the existence of unavoidable errors, we claim to have prepared a work fully up to the standard of our promises, and as accurate and comprehensive as could be expected under the circumstances.

HISTORY OF OHIO.

BY A. A. GRAHAM.

INTRODUCTORY—TOPOGRAPHY—GEOLOGY—PRIMITIVE—RACES—ANTIQUITIES—INDIAN TRIBES.

THE present State of Ohio, comprising an extent of country 210 miles north and south, 220 miles east and west, in length and breadth—25,576,969 acres—is a part of the Old Northwest Territory. This Territory embraced all of the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin and so much of Minnesota as lies east of the Mississippi River. It became a corporate existence soon after the formation of the Virginia Colony, and when that colony took on the dignity of State government it became a county thereof, whose exact outline was unknown. The county embraced in its limits more territory than is comprised in all the New England and Middle States, and was the largest county ever known in the United States. It is watered by the finest system of rivers on the globe; while its inland seas are without a parallel. Its entire southern boundary is traversed by the beautiful Ohio, its western by the majestic Mississippi, and its northern and a part of its eastern are bounded by the fresh-water lakes, whose clear waters preserve an even temperature over its entire surface. Into these reservoirs of commerce flow innumerable streams of limpid water, which come from glen and dale, from mountain and valley, from forest and prairie—all avenues of health, commerce and prosperity. Ohio is in the best part of this territory—south of its river are tropical heats; north of Lake Erie are polar snows and a polar climate.

The territory comprised in Ohio has always remained the same. Ohio's history differs somewhat from other States, in that it was never under Territorial government. When it was created, it was made a State, and did not pass through the stage incident to the most of other States, i. e., exist as a Territory before being advanced to the powers of a State. Such was not the case with the other States of the West; all were Territories, with Territorial forms of government, ere they became States.

Ohio's boundaries are, on the north, Lake Erie, and Michigan; on the west, Indiana; on the south, the Ohio River, separating it from Kentucky; and, on the east, Pennsylvania and West Virginia. It is situated between $38^{\circ} 25'$ and 42° north latitude; and $80^{\circ} 30'$ and $84^{\circ} 50'$ west longitude from Greenwich, or $3^{\circ} 30'$ and $7^{\circ} 50'$ west from Washington. Its greatest length, from north to south, is 210 miles; the extreme width, from east to west, 220 miles. Were this an exact outline, the area of the State would be 46,200 square miles, or 29,568,000 acres; as the outlines of the State are, however, rather irregular, the area is estimated at 39,964 square miles, or 25,576,960 acres. In the last census—1870—the total number of acres in Ohio is given as 21,712,420, of which 14,469,132 acres are improved, and 6,883,575 acres are woodland. By the last statistical report of the State Auditor, 20,965,371 $\frac{3}{4}$ acres are reported as taxable lands. This omits many acres untaxable for various reasons, which would make the estimate, 25,576,960, nearly correct.

The face of the country, in Ohio, taken as a whole, presents the appearance of an extensive monotonous plain. It is moderately undulating but not mountainous, and is excavated in places by the streams coursing over its surface, whose waters have forced a way for themselves through cliffs of sandstone rock, leaving abutments of this material in bold outline. There are no mountain ranges, geological uplifts or peaks. A low ridge enters the State, near the northeast corner, and crosses it in a southwesterly direction, emerging near the intersection of the 40th degree of north latitude with the western boundary of the State. This "divide" separates the lake and Ohio River waters, and maintains an elevation of a little more than thirteen hundred feet above the level of the ocean. The highest part is in Logan County, where the elevation is 1,550 feet.

North of this ridge the surface is generally level, with a gentle inclination toward the lake, the inequalities of the surface being caused by the streams which empty into the lake. The central part of Ohio is almost, in general, a level plain, about one thousand feet above the level of the sea, slightly inclining southward. The Southern part of the State is rather hilly, the valleys growing deeper as they incline toward the great valley of the Ohio, which is several hundred feet below the general level of the State. In the southern counties, the surface is generally diversified by the inequalities produced by the excavating power of the Ohio River and its tributaries, exercised through long periods of time. There are a few prairies, or plains, in the central and northwestern parts of the State, but over its greater portion originally existed immense growths of timber.

The "divide," or water-shed, referred to, between the waters of Lake Erie and the Ohio River, is less elevated in Ohio than in New York and Pennsylvania, though the difference is small. To a person passing over the State in a balloon, its surface presents an unvarying plain, while, to one sailing down the Ohio River, it appears mountainous. On this river are bluffs ranging from two hundred and fifty to six hundred feet in height. As one ascends the tributaries of the river, these bluffs diminish in height until they become gentle undulations, while toward the sources of the streams, in the central part of the State, the banks often become low and marshy.

The principal rivers are the Ohio, Muskingum, Scioto and Miami, on the southern slope, emptying into the Ohio; on the northern, the Maumee, Sandusky, Huron and Cuyahoga, emptying into Lake Erie, and, all but the first named, entirely in Ohio.

The Ohio, the chief river of the State, and from which it derives its name, with its tributaries, drains a country whose area is over two hundred thousand square miles in extent, and extending from the water-shed to Alabama. The river was first discovered by La Salle in 1669, and was by him navigated as far as the Falls, at Louisville, Ky. It is formed by the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers, in Pennsylvania, whose waters unite at Pittsburgh. The entire length of the river, from its source to its mouth, is 950 miles, though by a straight line from Pittsburgh to Cairo, it is only 615 miles. Its current is very gentle, hardly three miles per hour, the descent being only five inches per mile. At high stages, the rate of the current increases, and at low stages decreases. Sometimes it is barely two miles per hour. The average range between high and low water mark is fifty feet, although several times the river has risen more than sixty feet above low water mark. At the lowest stage of the river, it is fordable many places between Pittsburgh and Cincinnati. The river abounds in islands, some of which are exceedingly fertile, and noted in the history of the West. Others, known as "tow-heads," are simply deposits of sand.

The Scioto is one of the largest inland streams in the State, and is one of the most beautiful rivers. It rises in Hardin County, flows southeasterly to Columbus, where it receives its largest affluent, the Olentangy or Whetstone, after which its direction is southerly until it enters the Ohio at Portsmouth. It flows through one of the richest valleys in the State, and has for its companion the Ohio and Erie Canal, for a distance of ninety miles. Its tributaries are, besides the Whetstone, the Darby, Walnut and Paint Creeks.

The Muskingum River is formed by the junction of the Tuscarawas and Waldhoning Rivers, which rise in the northern part of the State and unite at Coshocton. From the junction, the river flows in a southeastern course about one hundred miles, through a rich and populous valley, to the Ohio, at Marietta, the oldest settlement in the State. At its outlet, the Muskingum is over two hundred yards wide. By improvements, it has been made navigable ninety-five miles above Marietta, as far as Dresden, where a side cut, three miles long, unites its waters with those of the Ohio Canal. All along this stream exist, in abundant profusion, the remains of an ancient civilization, whose history is lost in the twilight of antiquity. Extensive mounds, earthworks and various fortifications, are everywhere to be found, inclosing a mute history as silent as the race that dwelt here and left these traces of their existence. The same may be said of all the other valleys in Ohio.

The Miami River—the scenes of many exploits in pioneer days—rises in Hardin County, near the headwaters of the Scioto, and runs southwesterly, to the Ohio, passing Troy, Dayton and Hamilton. It is a beautiful and rapid stream, flowing through a highly productive and populous valley, in which limestone and hard timber are abundant. Its total length is about one hundred and fifty miles.

The Maumee is the largest river in the northern part of Ohio. It rises in Indiana and flows northeasterly, into Lake Erie. About eighty miles of its course are in Ohio. It is navigable as far as Perrysburg, eighteen miles from its mouth. The other rivers north of the divide are all small, rapid-running streams, affording a large amount of good water-power, much utilized by mills and manufactories.

A remarkable feature of the topography of Ohio is its almost total absence of natural lakes or ponds. A few very small ones are found near the water-shed, but all too small to be of any practical value save as watering-places for stock.

Lake Erie, which forms nearly all the northern boundary of the State, is next to the last or lowest of America's "inland seas." It is 290 miles long, and 57 miles wide at its greatest part. There are no islands, except in the shallow water at the west end, and very few bays. The greatest depth of the lake is off Long Point, where the water is 312 feet deep. The shores are principally drift-clay or hard-pan, upon which the waves are continually encroaching. At Cleveland, from the first survey, in 1796, to 1842, the encroachment was 218 feet along the entire city front. The entire coast is low, seldom rising above fifty feet at the water's edge.

Lake Erie, like the others, has a variable surface, rising and falling with the seasons, like great rivers, called the "annual fluctuation," and a general one, embracing a series of years, due to meteorological causes, known as the "secular fluctuation." Its lowest known level was in February, 1819, rising more or less each year, until June, 1838, in the extreme, to six feet eight inches.

Lake Erie has several excellent harbors in Ohio, among which are Cleveland, Toledo, Sandusky, Port Clinton and Ashtabula. Valuable improvements have been made in some of these, at the expense of the General Government. In 1818, the first steamboat was launched on the lake. Owing to the Falls of Niagara, it could go no farther east than the outlet of Niagara River. Since then, however, the opening of the Welland Canal, in Canada, allows vessels drawing not more than ten feet of water to pass from one lake to the other, greatly facilitating navigation.

As early as 1836, Dr. S. P. Hildreth, Dr. John Locke, Prof. J. H. Riddle and Mr. I. A. Lapham, were appointed a committee by the Legislature of Ohio to report the "best method of obtaining a complete geological survey of the State, and an estimate of the probable cost of the same." In the preparation of their report, Dr. Hildreth examined the coal-measures in the southeastern part of the State, Prof. Riddle and Mr. Lapham made examinations in the western and northern counties, while Dr. Locke devoted his attention to chemical analyses. These investigations resulted in the presentation of much valuable information concerning the mineral resources of the State and in a plan for a geological survey. In accordance with the recommendation of this Committee, the Legislature, in 1837, passed a bill appropriating $12,000 for the prosecution of the work during the next year. The Geological Corps appointed consisted of W. W. Mather, State Geologist, with Dr. Hildreth, Dr. Locke, Prof. J. P. Kirtland, J. W. Foster, Charles Whittlesey and Charles Briggs, Jr., Assistants. The results of the first year's work appeared in 1838, in an octavo volume of 134 pages, with contributions from Mather, Hildreth, Briggs, Kirtland and Whittlesey. In 1838, the Legislature ordered the continuance of the work, and, at the close of the year, a second report, of 286 pages, octavo, was issued, containing contributions from all the members of the survey.

Succeeding Legislatures failed to provide for a continuance of the work, and, save that done by private means, nothing was accomplished till 1869, when the Legislature again took up the work. In the interim, individual enterprise had done much. In 1841, Prof. James Hall passed through the State, and, by his identification of several of the formations with those of New York, for the first time fixed their geological age. The next year, he issued the first map of the geology of the State, in common with the geological maps of all the region between the Alleghanies and the Mississippi. Similar maps were published by Sir Charles Lyell, in 1845; Prof. Edward Hitchcock, in 1853, and by J. Mareon, in 1856. The first individual map of the geology of Ohio was a very small one, published by Col. Whittlesey, in 1848, in Howe's History. In 1856, he published a larger map, and, in 1865, another was issued by Prof. Nelson Saylor. In 1867, Dr. J. S. Newberry published a geological map and sketch of Ohio in the Atlas of the State issued by H. S. Stebbins. Up to this time, the geological knowledge was very general in its character, and, consequently, erroneous in many of its details. Other States had been accurately surveyed, yet Ohio remained a kind of terra incognita, of which the geology was less known than any part of the surrounding area.

In 1869, the Legislature appropriated, for a new survey, $13,900 for its support during one year, and appointed Dr. Newberry Chief Geologist; E. B. Andrews, Edward Orton and J. H. Klippart were appointed Assistants, and T. G. Wormley, Chemist. The result of the first year's work was a volume of 164 pages, octavo, published in 1870.

This report, accompanied by maps and charts, for the first time accurately defined the geological formations as to age and area. Evidence was given which set at rest questions of nearly thirty years' standing, and established the fact that Ohio includes nearly double the number of formations before supposed to exist. Since that date, the surveys have been regularly made. Each county is being surveyed by itself, and its formation accurately determined. Elsewhere in these pages, these results are given, and to them the reader is referred for the specific geology of the county. Only general results can be noted here.

On the general geological map of the State, are two sections of the State, taken at each northern and southern extremity. These show, with the map, the general outline of the geological features of Ohio, and are all that can be given here. Both sections show the general arrangements of the formation, and prove that they lie in sheets resting one upon another, but not horizontally, as a great arch traverses the State from Cincinnati to the lake shore, between Toledo and Sandusky. Along this line, which extends southward to Nashville, Tenn., all the rocks are raised in a ridge or fold, once a low mountain chain. In the lapse of ages, it has, however, been extensively worn away, and now, along a large part of its course, the strata which once arched over it are removed from its summit, and are found resting in regular order on either side, dipping away from its axis. Where the ridge was highest, the erosion has been greatest, that being the reason why the oldest rocks are exposed in the region about Cincinnati. By following the line of this great arch from Cincinnati northward, it will be seen that the Helderberg limestone (No. 4), midway of the State, is still unbroken, and stretches from side to side; while the Oriskany, the Carboniferous, the Hamilton and the Huron formations, though generally removed from the crown of the arch, still remain over a limited area near Bellefontaine, where they form an island, which proves the former continuity of the strata which compose it.

On the east side of the great anticlinal axis, the rocks dip down into a basin, which, for several hundred miles north and south, occupies the interval between the Nashville and Cincinnati ridge and the first fold of the Alleghany Mountains. In this basin, all the strata form trough-like layers, their edges outcropping eastward on the flanks of the Alleghanies, and westward along the anticlinal axis. As they dip from this margin eastward toward the center of the trough, near its middle, on the eastern border of the State, the older rocks are deeply buried, and the surface is here underlain by the highest and most recent of our rock formations, the coal measures. In the northwestern corner of the State, the strata dip northwest from the anticlinal and pass under the Michigan coal basin, precisely as the same formations east of the anticlinal dip beneath the Alleghany coal-field, of which Ohio's coal area forms a part.

The rocks underlying the State all belong to three of the great groups which geologists have termed "systems," namely, the Silurian, Devonian and Carboniferous. Each of these are again subdivided, for convenience, and numbered. Thus the Silurian system includes the Cincinnati group, the Medina and Clinton groups, the Niagara group, and the Salina and Water-Line groups. The Devonian system includes the Oriskany sandstone, the Carboniferous limestone, the Hamilton group, the Huron shale and the Erie shales. The Carboniferous system includes the Waverly group, the Carboniferous Conglomerate, the Coal Measures and the Drift. This last includes the surface, and has been divided into six parts, numbering from the lowest, viz.: A glaciated surface, the Glacial Drift, the Erie Clays, the Forest Bed, the Iceberg Drift and the Terraces or Beaches, which mark intervals of stability in the gradual recession of the water surface to its present level.

"The history we may learn from these formations," says the geologist, "is something as follows:

"First. Subsequent to the Tertiary was a period of continual elevation, during which the topography of the country was much the same as now, the draining streams following the lines they now do, but cutting down their beds until they flowed sometimes two hundred feet lower than they do at present. In the latter part of this period of elevation, glaciers, descending from the Canadian islands, excavated and occupied the valleys of the great lakes, and covered the lowlands down nearly to the Ohio.

"Second. By a depression of the land and elevation of temperature, the glaciers retreated northward, leaving, in the interior of the continent, a great basin of fresh water, in which the Erie clays were deposited.

"Third. This water was drained away until a broad land surface was exposed within the drift area. Upon this surface grew forests, largely of red and white cedar, inhabited by the elephant, mastodon, giant beaver and other large, now extinct, animals.

"Fourth. The submergence of this ancient land and the spreading over it, by iceberg agency, of gravel, sand and bowlders, distributed just as icebergs now spread their loads broadcast over the sea bottom on the banks of Newfoundland.

"Fifth. The gradual draining-off of the waters, leaving the land now as we find it, smoothly covered with all the layers of the drift, and well prepared for human occupation."

"In six days, the Lord made the heavens and the earth, and rested the seventh day," records the Scriptures, and, when all was done, He looked upon the work of His own hands and pronounced it "good." Surely none but a divine, omnipotent hand could have done all this, and none can study the "work of His hands" and not marvel at its completeness.

The ancient dwellers of the Mississippi Valley will always be a subject of great interest to the antiquarian. Who they were, and whence they came, are still unanswered questions, and may remain so for ages. All over this valley, and, in fact, in all parts of the New World, evidences of an ancient civilization exist, whose remains are now a wonder to all. The aboriginal races could throw no light on these questions. They had always seen the remains, and knew not whence they came. Explorations aid but little in the solution of the problem, and only conjecture can be entertained. The remains found in Ohio equal any in the Valley. Indeed, some of them are vast in extent, and consist of forts, fortifications, moats, ditches, elevations and mounds, embracing many acres in extent.

"It is not yet determined," says Col. Charles Whittlesey, "whether we have discovered the first or the original people who occupied the soil of Ohio. Modern investigations are bringing to light evidences of earlier races. Since the presence of man has been established in Europe as a cotemporary of the fossil elephant, mastodon, rhinoceros and the horse, of the later drift or glacial period, we may reasonably anticipate the presence of man in America in that era. Such proofs are already known, but they are not of that conclusive character which amounts to a demonstration. It is, however, known that an ancient people inhabited Ohio in advance of the red men who were found here, three centuries since, by the Spanish and French explorers.

"Five and six hundred years before the arrival of Columbus," says Col. Charles Whittlesey, "the Northmen sailed from Norway, Iceland and Greenland along the Atlantic coast as far as Long Island. They found Indian tribes, in what is now New England, closely resembling those who lived upon the coast and the St. Lawrence when the French and English came to possess these regions.

"These red Indians had no traditions of a prior people; but over a large part of the lake country and the valley of the Mississippi, earth-works, mounds, pyramids, ditches and forts were discovered—the work of a more ancient race, and a people far in advance of the Indian. If they were not civilized, they were not barbarians. They were not mere hunters, but had fixed habitations, cultivated the soil and were possessed of considerable mechanical skill. We know them as the Mound Builders, because they erected over the mortal remains of their principal men and women memorial mounds of earth or unhewn stone—of which hundreds remain to our own day, so large and high that they give rise to an impression of the numbers and energy of their builders, such as we receive from the pyramids of Egypt."

Might they not have been of the same race and the same civilization? Many competent authorities conjecture they are the work of the lost tribes of Israel; but the best they or any one can do is only conjecture.

"In the burial-mounds," continues Col. Whittlesey, "there are always portions of one or more human skeletons, generally partly consumed by fire, with ornaments of stone, bone, shells, mica and copper. The largest mound in Ohio is near Miamisburg, Montgomery County. It is the second largest in the West, being nearly seventy feet high, originally, and about eight hundred feet in circumference. This would give a superficial area of nearly four acres. In 1864, the citizens of Miamisburg sunk a shaft from the summit to the natural surface, without finding the bones or ashes of the great man for whom it was intended. The exploration has considerably lowered the mound, it being now about sixty feet in height.

"Fort Ancient, on the Little Miami, is a good specimen of the military defenses of the Mound-Builders. It is well located on a long, high, narrow, precipitous ridge. The parapets are now from ten to eighteen feet high, and its perimeter is sufficient to hold twenty thousand fighting men. Another prominent example of their works exists near Newark, Licking County. This collection presents a great variety of figures, circles, rectangles, octagons and parallel banks, or highways, covering more than a thousand acres. The county fair-ground is permanently located within an ancient circle, a quarter of a mile in diameter, with an embankment and interior ditch. Its highest place was over twenty feet from the top of the moat to the bottom of the ditch."

One of the most curious-shaped works in this county is known as the "Alligator," from its supposed resemblance to that creature. When measured, several years ago, while in a good state of preservation, its dimensions were two hundred and ten feet in length, average width over sixty feet, and height, at the highest point, seven feet. It appears to be mainly composed of clay, and is overgrown with grass.

Speaking of the writing of these people, Col. Whittlesey says: "There is no evidence that they had alphabetical characters, picture-writing or hieroglyphics, though they must have had some mode of recording events. Neither is there any proof that they used domestic animals for tilling the soil, or for the purpose of erecting the imposing earthworks they have left. A very coarse cloth of hemp, flax or nettles has been found on their burial-hearths and around skeletons not consumed by fire.

"The most extensive earthworks occupy many of the sites of modern towns, and are always in the vicinity of excellent land. Those about the lakes are generally irregular earth forts, while those about the rivers in the southern part of the State are generally altars, pyramids, circles, cones and rectangles of earth, among which fortresses or strongholds are exceptions.

"Those on the north may not have been cotemporary or have been built by the same people. They are far less prominent or extensive, which indicates a people less in numbers as well as industry, and whose principal occupation was war among themselves or against their neighbors. This style of works extends eastward along the south shore of Lake Ontario, through New York. In Ohio, there is a space along the water-shed, between the lake and the Ohio, where there are few, if any, ancient earthworks. It appears to have been a vacant or neutral ground between different nations.

"The Indians of the North, dressed in skins, cultivated the soil very sparingly, and manufactured no woven cloth. On Lake Superior, there are ancient copper mines wrought by the Mound-Builders over fifteen hundred years ago." Copper tools are occasionally found tempered sufficiently hard to cut the hardest rocks. No knowledge of such tempering exists now. The Indians can give no more knowledge of the ancient mines than they can of the mounds on the river bottoms.

"The Indians did not occupy the ancient earthworks, nor did they construct such. They were found as they are now—a hunter race, wholly averse to labor. Their abodes were in rock shelters, in caves, or in temporary sheds of bark and boughs, or skins, easily moved from place to place. Like most savage races, their habits are unchangeable; at least, the example of white men, and their efforts during three centuries, have made little, if any, impression."

When white men came to the territory now embraced in the State of Ohio, they found dwelling here the Iroquois, Delawares, Shawanees, Miamis, Wyandots and Ottawas. Each nation was composed of several tribes or clans, and each was often at war with the others. The first mentioned of these occupied that part of the State whose northern boundary was Lake Erie, as far west as the mouth of the Cuyahoga River, where the city of Cleveland now is; thence the boundary turned southward in an irregular line, until it touched the Ohio River, up which stream it continued to the Pennsylvania State line, and thence northward to the lake. This nation were the implacable foes of the French, owing to the fact that Champlain, in 1609, made war against them. They occupied a large part of New York and Pennsylvania, and were the most insatiate conquerors among the aborigines. When the French first came to the lakes, these monsters of the wilderness were engaged in a war against their neighbors, a war that ended in their conquering them, possessing their territory, and absorbing the remnants of the tribes into their own nation. At the date of Champlain's visit, the southern shore of Lake Erie was occupied by the Eries, or, as the orthography of the word is sometimes given, Erigos, or Errienous.^{*} About forty years afterward, the Iroquois (Five Nations) fell upon them with such fury and in such force that the nation was annihilated. Those who escaped the slaughter were absorbed among their conquerors, but allowed to live on their own lands, paying a sort of tribute to the Iroquois. This was the policy of that nation in all its conquests. A few years after the conquest of the Eries, the Iroquois again took to the war-path, and swept through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, even attacking the Mississippi tribes. But for the intervention and aid of the French, these tribes would have shared the fate of the Hurons and Eries. Until the year 1700, the Iroquois held the south shore of Lake Erie so firmly that the French dared not trade or travel along that side of the lake. Their missionaries and traders penetrated this part of Ohio as early as 1650, but generally suffered death for their zeal.

Having completed the conquest of the Hurons or Wyandots, about Lake Huron, and murdered the Jesuit missionaries by modes of torture which only they could devise, they permitted the residue of the Hurons to settle around the west end of Lake Erie. Here, with the Ottawas, they resided when the whites came to the State. Their country was bounded on the south by a line running through the central part of Wayne, Ashland, Richland, Crawford and Wyandot Counties. At the western boundary of this county, the line diverged northwesterly, leaving the State near the northwest corner of Fulton County. Their northern boundary was the lake; the eastern, the Iroquois.

The Delawares, or "Lenni Lenapes," whom the Iroquois had subjugated on the Susquehanna, were assigned by their conquerors hunting-grounds on the Muskingum. Their eastern boundary was the country of the Iroquois (before defined), and their northern, that of the Hurons. On the west, they extended as far as a line drawn from the central part of Richland County, in a semi-circular direction, south to the mouth of Leading Creek. Their southern boundary was the Ohio River.

West of the Delawares, dwelt the Shawanees, a troublesome people as neighbors, whether to whites or Indians. Their country was bounded on the north by the Hurons, on the east, by the Delawares; on the south, by the Ohio River. On the west, their boundary was determined by a line drawn southwesterly, and again southeasterly—semi-circular—from a point on the southern boundary of the Hurons, near the southwest corner of Wyandot County, till it intersected the Ohio River.

All the remainder of the State—all its western part from the Ohio River to the Michigan line—was occupied by the Miamis, Mineamis, Twigtwes, or Tawixtawes, a powerful nation, whom the Iroquois were never fully able to subdue.

These nations occupied the State, partly by permit of the Five Nations, and partly by inheritance, and, though composed of many tribes, were about all the savages to be found in this part of the Northwest.

No sooner had the Americans obtained control of this country, than they began, by treaty and purchase, to acquire the lands of the natives. They could not stem the tide of emigration; people, then as now, would go West, and hence the necessity of peacefully and rightfully acquiring the land. "The true basis of title to Indian territory is the right of civilized men to the soil for purposes of cultivation." The same maxim may be applied to all uncivilized nations. When acquired by such a right, either by treaty, purchase or conquest, the right to hold the same rests with the power and development of the nation thus possessing the land.

The English derived title to the territory between the Alleghanies and the Mississippi partly by the claim that, in discovering the Atlantic coast, they had possession of the land from "ocean to ocean," and partly by the treaty of Paris, in February, 1763. Long before this treaty took place, however, she had granted, to individuals and colonies, extensive tracts of land in that part of America, based on the right of discovery. The French had done better, and had acquired title to the land by discovering the land itself and by consent of the Indians dwelling thereon. The right to possess this country led to the French and Indian war, ending in the supremacy of the English.

^{*} Father Louis Hennepin, in his work published in 1684, thus alludes to the Eries: "These good fathers," referring to the priests, "were great friends of the Hurons, who told them that the Iroquois went to war beyond Virginia, or New Sweden, near a lake which they called 'Erige,' or 'Erie,' which signifies 'the cat,' or 'nation of the cat,' and because these savages brought captives from this nation in returning to their cantons along this lake, the Hurons named it, in their language, 'Erige,' or 'Erike,' 'the lake of the cat,' and which our Canadians, in softening the word, have called 'Lake Erie.'"

Charlevoix, writing in 1721, says: "The name it bears is that of an Indian nation of the Huron (Wyandot) language, which was formerly seated on its banks, and who have been entirely destroyed by the Iroquois. Erie, in that language, signifies 'cat,' and, in some accounts, this nation is called the 'cat nation.' This name, probably, comes from the large numbers of that animal found in this region."

The Five Nations claimed the territory in question by right of conquest, and, though professing friendship to the English, watched them with jealous eyes. In 1684, and again in 1726, that confederacy made cessions of lands to the English, and these treaties and cessions of lands were regarded as sufficient title by the English, and were insisted on in all subsequent treaties with the Western Nations. The following statements were collected by Col. Charles Whittlesey, which show the principal treaties made with the red men wherein land in Ohio was ceded by them to the whites:

In September, 1726, the Iroquois, or Six Nations, at Albany, ceded all their claims west of Lake Erie and sixty miles in width along the south shore of Lakes Erie and Ontario, from the Cuyahoga to the Oswego River.

In 1744, this same nation made a treaty at Lancaster, Penn., and ceded to the English all their lands "that may be within the colony of Virginia."

In 1752, this nation and other Western tribes made a treaty at Logstown, Penn., wherein they confirmed the Lancaster treaty and consented to the settlements south of the Ohio River.

February 13, 1763, a treaty was made at Paris, France, between the French and English, when Canada and the eastern half of the Mississippi Valley were ceded to the English.

In 1783, all the territory south of the Lakes, and east of the Mississippi, was ceded by England to America—the latter country then obtaining its independence—by which means the country was gained by America.

October 24, 1784, the Six Nations made a treaty, at Fort Stanwix, N. Y., with the Americans, and ceded to them all the country claimed by the tribe, west of Pennsylvania.

In 1785, the Chippewas, Delawares, Ottawas, and Wyandots ceded to the United States, at Fort McIntosh, at the mouth of the Big Beaver, all their claims east and south of the "Cayahaga," the Portage Path, and the Tuscarawas, to Fort Laurens (Bolivar), thence to Loramie's Fort (in Shelby County); thence along the Portage Path to the St. Mary's River and down it to the "Omee," or Maumee, and along the lake shore to the "Cayahaga."

January 3, 1786, the Shawanees, at Fort Finney, near the mouth of the Great Miami (not owning the land on the Scioto occupied by them), were allotted a tract at the heads of the two Miamis and the Wabash, west of the Chippewas, Delawares and Wyandots.

February 9, 1789, the Iroquois made a treaty at Fort Harmar, wherein they confirmed the Fort Stanwix treaty. At the same time, the Chippewas, Ottawas, Delawares, and Wyandots—to which the Sauks and Pottawatomies assented—confirmed the treaty made at Fort McIntosh.

Period of war now existed till 1795.

August 3, 1795, Gen. Anthony Wayne, on behalf of the United States, made a treaty with twelve tribes, confirming the boundaries established by the Fort Harmar and Fort McIntosh treaties, and extended the boundary to Fort Recovery and the mouth of the Kentucky River.

In June, 1796, the Senecas, represented by Brant, ceded to the Connecticut Land Company their rights east of the Cuyahoga.

In 1805, at Fort Industry, on the Maumee, the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Shawanees, Menses, and Pottawatomies relinquished all their lands west of the Cuyahoga, as far west as the western line of the Reserve, and south of the line from Fort Laurens to Loramie's Fort.

July 4, 1807, the Ottawas, Chippewas, Wyandots, and Pottawatomies, at Detroit, ceded all that part of Ohio north of the Maumee River, with part of Michigan.

November 25, 1808, the same tribes with the Shawanees, at Brownstown, Mich., granted the Government a tract of land two miles wide, from the west line of the Reserve to the rapids of the Maumee, for the purpose of a road through the Black Swamp.

September 18, 1815, at Springwells, near Detroit, the Chippewas, Ottawas, Pottawatomies, Wyandots, Delawares, Senecas and Miamis, having been engaged in the war of 1812 on the British side, were confined in the grants made at Fort McIntosh and Greenville in 1785 and 1795.

September 29, 1817, at the rapids of the Maumee, the Wyandots ceded their lands west of the line of 1805, as far as Loramie's and the St. Mary's River and north of the Maumee. The Pottawatomies, Chippewas, and Ottawas ceded the territory west of the Detroit line of 1807, and north of the Maumee.

October 6, 1818, the Miamis, at St. Mary's, made a treaty in which they surrendered the remaining Indian territory in Ohio, north of the Greenville treaty line and west of St. Mary's River.

The numerous treaties of peace with the Western Indians for the delivery of prisoners were—one by Gen. Forbes, at Fort Du Quesne (Pittsburgh), in 1758; one by Col. Bradstreet, at Erie, in August, 1764; one by Col. Boquet, at the mouth of the Walhonding, in November, 1764; in May, 1765, at Johnson's, on the Mohawk, and at Philadelphia, the same year; in 1774, by Lord Dunmore, at Camp Charlotte, Pickaway County. By the treaty at the Maumee Rapids, in 1817, reservations were conveyed by the United States to all the tribes, with a view to induce them to cultivate the soil and cease to be hunters. These were, from time to time, as the impracticability of the plan became manifest, purchased by the Government, the last of these being the Wyandot Reserve, of twelve miles square, around Upper Sandusky, in 1842, closing out all claims and composing all the Indian difficulties in Ohio. The open war had ceased in 1815, with the treaty of Ghent.

"It is estimated that, from the French war of 1754 to the battle of the Maumee Rapids, in 1794, a period of forty years, there had been at least 5,000 people killed or captured west of the Alleghany Mountains. Eleven organized military expeditions had been carried on against the Western Indians prior to the war of 1812, seven regular engagements fought and about twelve hundred men killed. More whites were slain in battle than there were Indian braves killed in military expeditions, and by private raids and murders; yet, in 1811, all the Ohio tribes combined could not muster 2,000 warriors."

Attempts to determine the number of persons comprising the Indian tribes in Ohio, and their location, have resulted in nothing better than estimates. It is supposed that, at the commencement of the Revolution, there were about six thousand Indians in the present confines of the State, but their villages were little more than movable camps. Savage men, like savage beasts, are engaged in continual migrations. Now, none are left. The white man occupies the home of the red man. Now

"The verdant hills
Are covered o'er with growing grain,
And white men till the soil,
Where once the red man used to reign."

EARLY EXPLORATIONS IN THE WEST.

WHEN war, when ambition, when avarice fail, religion pushes onward and succeeds. In the discovery of the New World, wherever man's aggrandizement was the paramount aim, failure was sure to follow. When this gave way, the followers of the Cross, whether Catholic or Protestant, came on the field, and the result before attempted soon appeared, though in a different way and through different means than those supposed.

The first permanent efforts of the white race to penetrate the Western wilds of the New World preceded any permanent English settlement north of the Potomac. Years before the Pilgrims anchored their bark on the cheerless shores of Cape Cod, "the Roman Catholic Church had been planted by missionaries from France in the Eastern moiety of Maine; and LeCaron, an ambitious Franciscan, the companion of Champlain, had passed into the hunting-grounds of the Wyandots, and, bound by the vows of his life, had, on foot or paddling a bark canoe, gone onward, taking alms of the savages until he reached the rivers of Lake Huron." This was in 1615 or 1616, and only eight years after Champlain had sailed up the waters of the St. Lawrence, and on the foot of a bold cliff laid the foundation of the present City of Quebec. From this place, founded to hold the country, and to perpetuate the religion of his King, went forth those emissaries of the Cross, whose zeal has been the admiration of the world. The French Colony in Canada was suppressed soon after its establishment, and for five years, until 1622, its immunities were enjoyed by the colonists. A grant of New France, as the country was then known, was made by Louis XIII to Richelieu, Champlain, Razilly and others, who, immediately after the restoration of Quebec by its English conquerors, entered upon the control and government of their province. Its limits embraced the whole basin of the St. Lawrence and of such other rivers in New France as flowed directly into the sea. While away to the south on the Gulf coast, was also included a country rich in foliage and claimed in virtue of the unsuccessful efforts of Coligny.

Religious zeal as much as commercial prosperity had influenced France to obtain and retain the dependency of Canada. The commercial monopoly of a privileged company could not foster a colony; the climate was too vigorous for agriculture, and, at first there was little else except religious enthusiasm to give vitality to the province. Champlain had been touched by the simplicity of the Order of St. Francis, and had selected its priests to aid him in his work. But another order, more in favor at the Court, was interested, and succeeded in excluding the mendicant order from the New World, established themselves in the new domain and, by thus enlarging the borders of the French King, it became entrusted to the Jesuits.

This "Society of Jesus," founded by Loyola when Calvin's Institutes first saw the light, saw an unequalled opportunity in the conversion of the heathen in the Western wilds; and, as its members, pledged to obtain power only by influence of mind over mind, sought the honors of opening the way, there was no lack of men ready for the work. Through them, the motive power in opening the wilds of the Northwest was religion. "Religious enthusiasm," says Bancroft, "colonized New England, and religious enthusiasm founded Montreal, made a conquest of the wilderness about the upper lakes, and explored the Mississippi."

Through these priests—increased in a few years to fifteen—a way was made across the West from Quebec, above the regions of the lakes, below which they dared not go for the relentless Mohawks. To the northwest of Toronto, near the Lake Iroquois, a bay of Lake Huron, in September, 1634, they raised the first humble house of the Society of Jesus among the Hurons. Through them they learned of the great lakes beyond, and resolved one day to explore them and carry the Gospel of peace to the heathen on their shores. Before this could be done, many of them were called upon to give up their lives at the martyr's stake and receive a martyr's crown. But one by one they went on in their good work. If one fell by hunger, cold, cruelty, or a terrible death, others stood ready, and carrying their lives in their hands, established other missions about the eastern shores of Lake Huron and its adjacent waters. The Five Nations were for many years hostile toward the French and murdered them and their red allies whenever opportunity presented. For a quarter of a century, they retarded the advance of the missionaries, and then only after wearied with a long struggle, in which they began to see their power declining, did they relinquish their warlike propensities, and allow the Jesuits entrance to their country. While this was going on, the traders and Jesuits had penetrated farther and farther westward, until, when peace was declared, they had seen the southwestern shores of Lake Superior and the northern shores of Lake Michigan, called by them Lake Illinois.* In August, 1654, two young adventurers penetrated the wilds bordering on these western lakes in company with a band of Ottawas. Returning, they tell of the wonderful country they have seen, of its vast forests, its abundance of game, its mines of copper, and excite in their comrades a desire to see and explore such a country. They tell of a vast expanse of land before them, of the powerful Indian tribes dwelling there, and of their anxiety to become annexed to the Frenchman, of whom they have heard. The request is at once granted. Two missionaries, Gabriel Dreuillettes and Leonard Gareau, were selected as envoys, but on their way the fleet, propelled by tawny rowers, is met by a wandering band of Mohawks and by them is dispersed. Not daunted, others stood ready to go. The lot fell to René Mesnard. He is charged to visit the wilderness, select a suitable place for a dwelling, and found a mission. With only a short warning he is ready, "trusting," he says, "in the Providence which feeds the little birds of the desert and clothes the wild flowers of the forest." In October, 1660, he reached a bay, which he called St. Theresa, on the south shore of Lake Superior. After a residence of eight months, he yielded to the invitation of the Hurons who had taken refuge on the Island of St. Michael, and bidding adieu to his neophytes and the French, he departed. While on the way to the Bay of Chego-me-gon, probably at a portage, he became separated from his companion and was never afterward heard of. Long after, his cassock and his breviary were kept as amulets among the Sioux. Difficulties now arose in the management of the colony, and for awhile it was on the verge of dissolution. The King sent a regiment under command of the aged Tracy, as a safeguard against the Iroquois, now proving themselves enemies to

*Mr. C. W. Butterfield, author of Crawford's Campaign, and good authority, says: "John Nicolet, a Frenchman, left Quebec and Three Rivers in the summer of 1634, and visited the Hurons on Georgian Bay, the Chippewas at the Sault Ste. Marie, and the Winnebagoes in Wisconsin, returning to Quebec in the summer of 1635. This was the first white man to see any part of the Northwest Territory. In 1641, two Jesuit priests were at the Sault Ste. Marie for a brief time. Then two French traders reached Lake Superior, and after them came that tide of emigration on which the French based their claim to the country."

the French. Accompanying him were Courcelles, as Governor, and M. Talon, who subsequently figures in Northwestern history. By 1665, affairs were settled and new attempts to found a mission among the lake tribes were projected.

"With better hopes—undismayed by the sad fate of their predecessors" in August, Claude Allouez embarked on a mission by way of Ottawa to the Far West. Early in September he reached the rapids through which rush the waters of the lakes to Huron. Sailing by lofty sculptured rocks and over waters of crystal purity, he reached the Chippewa village just as the young warriors were bent on organizing a war expedition against the Sioux. Commanding peace in the name of his King, he called a council and offered the commerce and protection of his nation. He was obeyed, and soon a chapel arose on the shore of the bay, to which admiring crowds from the south and west gathered to listen to the story of the Cross.

The scattered Hurons and Ottawas north of Lake Superior; the Pottawatomies from Lake Michigan; the Sacs and Foxes from the Far West; the Illinois from the prairies, all came to hear him, and all besought him to go with them. To the last nation Allouez desired to go. They told him of a "great river that flowed to the sea," and of "their vast prairies, where herds of buffalo, deer and other animals grazed on the tall grass." "Their country," said the missionary, "is the best field for the Gospel. Had I had leisure, I would have gone to their dwellings to see with my own eyes all the good that was told me of them."

He remained two years, teaching the natives, studying their language and habits, and then returned to Quebec. Such was the account that he gave, that in two days he was joined by Louis Nicholas and was on his way back to his mission.

Peace being now established, more missionaries came from France. Among them were Claude Dablon and Jacques Marquette, both of whom went on to the mission among the Chippewas at the Sault. They reached there in 1668 and found Allouez busy. The mission was now a reality and given the name of St. Mary. It is often written "Sault Ste. Marie," after the French method, and is the oldest settlement by white men in the bounds of the Northwest Territory. It has been founded over two hundred years. Here on the inhospitable northern shores, hundreds of miles away from friends, did this triumvirate employ themselves in extending their religion and the influence of their King. Traversing the shores of the great lakes near them, they pass down the western bank of Lake Michigan as far as Green Bay, along the southern shore of Lake Superior to its western extremity, everywhere preaching the story of Jesus. "Though suffering be their lot and martyrdom their crown," they went on, only conscious that they were laboring for their Master and would, in the end, win the crown.

The great river away to the West of which they heard so much was yet unknown to them. To explore it, to visit the tribes on its banks and preach to them the Gospel and secure their trade, became the aim of Marquette, who originated the idea of its discovery. While engaged at the mission at the Sault, he resolved to attempt it in the autumn of 1669. Delay, however, intervened—for Allouez had exchanged the mission at Che-goi-me-gon for one at Green Bay, whither Marquette was sent. While here he employed a young Illinois Indian to teach him the language of that nation, and thereby prepare himself for the enterprise.

Continued commerce with the Western Indians gave protection and confirmed their attachment. Talon, the intendant of the colony of New France, to further spread its power and to learn more of the country and its inhabitants, convened a congress of the Indians at the Falls of St. Mary, to which he sent St. Lussan on his behalf. Nicholas Perrot sent invitations in every direction for more than a hundred leagues round about, and fourteen nations, among them Sacs, Foxes and Miamis, agreed to be present by their ambassadors.

The congress met on the fourth day of June, 1671. St. Lussan, through Allouez, his interpreter, announced to the assembled natives that they, and through them their nations, were placed under the protection of the French King, and to him were their furs and peltries to be traded. A cross of cedar was raised, and amidst the groves of maple and of pine, of elm and hemlock that are so strangely intermingled on the banks of the St. Mary, the whole company of the French, bowing before the emblem of man's redemption, chanted to its glory a hymn of the seventh century:

"The banners of heaven's King advance;
The mysteries of the Cross shines forth."*

A cedar column was planted by the cross and marked with the lilies of the Bourbons. The power of France, thus uplifted in the West of which Ohio is now a part, was, however, not destined to endure, and the ambition of its monarchs was to have only a partial fulfillment.

The same year that the congress was held, Marquette had founded a mission among the Hurons at Point St. Ignace, on the continent north of the peninsula of Michigan. Although the climate was severe, and vegetation scarce, yet fish abounded, and at this establishment, long maintained as a key to further explorations, prayer and praise were heard daily for many years. Here, also, Marquette gained a footing among the founders of Michigan.

While he was doing this, Allouez and Dablon were exploring countries south and west, going as far as the Mascoutins and Kickapoos on the Milwaukee, and the Miamis at the head of Lake Michigan. Allouez continued even as far as the Sacs and Foxes on the river which bears their name.

The discovery of the Mississippi, heightened by these explorations, was now at hand. The enterprise, projected by Marquette, was received with favor by M. Talon, who desired thus to perpetuate his rule in New France, now drawing to a close. He was joined by Joliet, of Quebec, an emissary of his King, commissioned by royal magnate to take possession of the country in the name of the French. Of him but little else is known. This one excursion, however, gives him immortality, and as long as time shall last his name and that of Marquette will endure. When Marquette made known his intention to the Pottawatomies, they were filled with wonder, and endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose. "Those distant nations," said they, "never spare the strangers; the Great River abounds in monsters, ready to swallow both men and canoes; there are great cataracts and rapids, over which you will be dashed to pieces; the excessive heats will cause your death." "I shall gladly lay down my life for the salvation of souls," replied the good man; and the docile nation joined him.

On the 9th day of June, 1673, they reached the village on Fox River, where were Kickapoos, Mascoutins and Miamis dwelling together on an expanse of lovely prairie, dotted here and there by groves of magnificent trees, and where was a cross garlanded by wild flowers, and bows and arrows, and skins and belts, offerings to the Great Manitou. Allouez had been here in one of his wanderings, and, as was his wont, had left this emblem of his faith.

Assembling the natives, Marquette said, "My companion is an envoy of France to discover new countries; and I am an ambassador from God to enlighten them with the Gospel." Offering presents, he begged two guides for the morrow. The Indians answered courteously, and gave in return a mat to serve as a couch during the long voyage.

Early in the morning of the next day, the 10th of June, with all nature in her brightest robes, these two men, with five Frenchmen and two Algonquin guides, set out on their journey. Lifting two canoes to their shoulders, they quickly cross the narrow portage dividing the Fox from the Wisconsin River, and prepare to embark on its clear waters. "Uttering a special prayer to the Immaculate Virgin, they leave the stream, that, flowing onward, could have borne their greetings to the castle of Quebec. 'The guides returned,' says the gentle Marquette, 'leaving us alone in this unknown land, in the hand of Providence.' France and Christianity stood alone in the valley of the Mississippi. Embarking on the broad Wisconsin, the discoverers, as they sailed west, went solitarily down the stream between alternate prairies and hillsides, beholding neither man nor the wonted beasts of the forests; no sound broke the silence but the ripple of the canoe and the lowing of the buffalo. In seven days, 'they entered happily the Great River, with a joy that could not be expressed;' and the two birchbark canoes, raising their happy sails under new skies and to unknown breezes, floated down the calm magnificence of the ocean stream, over the broad, clear sand-bars, the resort of innumerable waterfowl—gliding past islets that swelled from the bosom of the stream, with their tufts of massive thickets, and between the wild plains of Illinois and Iowa, all garlanded with majestic forests, or checkered by island groves and the open vastness of the prairie."^{*}

Continuing on down the mighty stream, they saw no signs of human life until the 25th of June, when they discovered a small foot-path on the west bank of the river, leading away into the prairie. Leaving their companions in the canoes, Marquette and Joliet followed the path, resolved to brave a meeting alone with the savages. After a walk of six miles they came in sight of a village on the banks of a river, while not far away they discovered two others. The river was the "Mouin-gou-e-na," or Moingona, now corrupted into Des Moines. These two men, the first of their race who ever trod the soil west of the Great

River, commended themselves to God, and, uttering a loud cry, advanced to the nearest village. The Indians hear, and thinking their visitors celestial beings, four old men advance with reverential mien, and offer the pipe of peace. "We are Illinois," said they, and they offered the calumet. They had heard of the Frenchmen, and welcomed them to their wigwams, followed by the devouring gaze of an astonished crowd. At a great council held soon after, Marquette published to them the true God, their Author. He also spoke of his nation and of his King, who had chastised the Five Nations and commanded peace. He questioned them concerning the Great River and its tributaries, and the tribes dwelling on its banks. A magnificent feast was spread before them, and the conference continued several days. At the close of the sixth day, the chieftains of the tribes, with numerous trains of warriors, attended the visitors to their canoes, and selecting a peace-pipe, gayly caparisoned, they hung the sacred calumet, emblem of peace to all and a safeguard among the nations, about the good Father's neck, and bid the strangers good speed. "I did not fear death," writes Marquette; "I should have esteemed it the greatest happiness to have died for the glory of God." On their journey, they passed the perpendicular rocks, whose sculptured sides showed them the monsters they should meet. Farther down, they pass the turgid flood of the Missouri, known to them by its Algonquin name, Pekitanoni. Resolving in his heart to one day explore its flood, Marquette rejoiced in the new world it evidently could open to him. A little farther down, they pass the bluffs where now is a mighty emporium, then silent as when created. In a little less than forty leagues, they pass the clear waters of the beautiful Ohio, then, and long afterward, known as the Wabash. Its banks were inhabited by numerous villages of the peaceful Shawanees, who then quailed under the incursions of the dreadful Iroquois. As they go on down the mighty stream, the canes become thicker, the insects more fierce, the heat more intolerable. The prairies and their cool breezes vanish, and forests of white-wood, admirable for their vastness and height, crowd close upon the pebbly shore. It is observed that the Chickasaws have guns, and have learned how to use them. Near the latitude of 33 degrees, they encounter a great village, whose inhabitants present an inhospitable and warlike front. The pipe of peace is held aloft, and instantly the savage foe drops his arms and extends a friendly greeting.

Remaining here till the next day, they are escorted for eight or ten leagues to the village of Akansea. They are now at the limit of their voyage. The Indians speak a dialect unknown to them. The natives show furs and axes of steel, the latter proving they have traded with Europeans. The two travelers now learn that the Father of Waters went neither to the Western sea nor to the Florida coast, but straight south, and conclude not to encounter the burning heats of a tropical clime, but return and find the outlet again. They had done enough now, and must report their discovery.

On the 17th day of July, 1673, one hundred and thirty-two years after the disastrous journey of De Soto, which led to no permanent results, Marquette and Joliet left the village of Akansea on their way back. At the 38th degree, they encounter the waters of the Illinois which they had before noticed, and which the natives told them afforded a much shorter route to the lakes. Paddling up its limpid waters, they see a country unsurpassed in beauty. Broad prairies, beautiful uplands, luxuriant groves, all mingled in excellent harmony as they ascend the river. Near the head of the river, they pause at a great village of the Illinois, and across the river behold a rocky promontory standing boldly out against the landscape. The Indians entreat the gentle missionary to remain among them, and teach them the way of life. He cannot do this, but promises to return when he can and instruct them. The town was on a plain near the present village of Utica, in La Salle County, Ill., and the rock was Starved Rock, afterward noted in the annals of the Northwest. One of the chiefs and some young men conduct the party to the Chicago River, where the present mighty city is, from where, continuing their journey along the western shores of the lake, they reach Green Bay early in September.

The great valley of the West was now open. The "Missippi" rolled its mighty flood to a southern sea, and must be sully explored. Marquette's health had keenly suffered by the voyage and he concluded to remain here and rest. Joliet hastened on to Quebec to report his discoveries. During the journey, each had preserved a description of the route they had passed over, as well as the country and its inhabitants. While on the way to Quebec, at the foot of the rapids near Montreal, by some means one of Joliet's canoes became capsized, and by it he lost his box of papers and two of his men. A greater calamity could have hardly happened him. In a letter to Gov. Frontenac, Joliet says:

"I had escaped every peril from the Indians; I had passed forty-two rapids, and was on the point of disembarking, full of joy at the success of so long and difficult an enterprise, when my canoe capsized after all the danger seemed over. I lost my two men and box of papers within sight of the French settlements, which I had left almost two years before. Nothing remains now to me but my life, and the ardent desire to employ it in any service you may please to direct."

When Joliet made known his discoveries, a Te Deum was chanted in the Cathedral at Quebec, and all Canada was filled with joy. The news crossed the ocean, and the French saw in the vista of coming years a vast dependency arise in the valley, partially explored, which was to extend her domain and enrich her treasury. Fearing England might profit by the discovery and claim the country, she attempted as far as possible to prevent the news from becoming general. Joliet was rewarded by the gift of the Island of Anticosti, in the St. Lawrence, while Marquette, conscious of his service to his Master, was content with the salvation of souls.

Marquette, left at Green Bay, suffered long with his malady, and was not permitted, until the autumn of the following year (1674), to return and teach the Illinois Indians. With this purpose in view, he left Green Bay on the 25th of October with two Frenchmen and a number of Illinois and Pottawatomie Indians for the villages on the Chicago and Illinois Rivers. Entering Lake Michigan, they encountered adverse winds and waves and were more than a month on the way. Going some distance up the Chicago River, they found Marquette too weak to proceed farther, his malady having assumed a violent form, and landing, they erected two huts and prepared to pass the winter. The good missionary taught the natives here daily, in spite of his afflictions, while his companions supplied him and themselves with food by fishing and hunting. Thus the winter wore away, and Marquette, renewing his vows, prepared to go on to the village at the foot of the rocky citadel, where he had been two years before. On the 13th of March, 1675, they left their huts and, rowing on up the Chicago to the portage between that and the Desplaines, embarked on their way. Amid the incessant rains of spring, they were rapidly borne down that stream to the Illinois, on whose rushing flood they floated to the object of their destination. At the great town the missionary was received as a heavenly messenger, and as he preached to them of heaven and hell, of angels and demons, of good and bad deeds, they regarded him as divine and besought him to remain among them. The town then contained an immense concourse of natives, drawn hither by the reports they heard, and assembling them before him on the plain near their village, where now are prosperous farms, he held before their astonished gaze four large pictures of the Holy Virgin, and daily harangued them on the duties of Christianity and the necessity of conforming their conduct to the words they heard. His strength was fast declining and warned him he could not long remain. Finding he must go, the Indians furnished him an escort as far as the lake, on whose turbulent waters he embarked with his two faithful attendants. They turned their canoes for the Mackinaw Mission, which the afflicted missionary hoped to reach before death came. As they coasted along the eastern shores of the lake, the vernal hue of May began to cover the hillsides with robes of green, now dimmed to the eye of the departing Father, who became too weak to view them. By the 19th of the month, he could go no farther, and requested his men to land and build him a hut in which he might pass away. That done, he gave, with great composure, directions concerning his burial, and thanked God that he was permitted to die in the wilderness in the midst of his work, an unshaken believer in the faith he had so earnestly preached. As twilight came on, he told his weary attendants to rest, promising that when death should come he would call them. At an early hour, on the morning of the 20th of May, 1675, they heard a feeble voice, and hastening to his side found that the gentle spirit of the good missionary had gone to heaven. His hand grasped the crucifix, and his lips bore as their last sound the name of the Virgin. They dug a grave near the banks of the stream and buried him as he had requested. There in a lonely wilderness the peaceful soul of Marquette had at last found a rest, and his weary labors closed. His companions went on to the mission, where the news of his death caused great sorrow, for he was one beloved by all.

Three years after his burial, the Ottawas, hunting in the vicinity of his grave, determined to carry his bones to the mission at their home, in accordance with an ancient custom of their tribe. Having opened the grave, at whose head a cross had been planted, they carefully removed the bones and cleaning them, a funeral procession of thirty canoes bore them to the Mackinaw Mission, singing the songs he had taught them. At the shores of the mission the bones were received by the priests, and, with great ceremony, buried under the floor of the rude chapel.

While Marquette and Joliet were exploring the head-waters of the "Great River," another man, fearless in purpose, pious in heart, and loyal to his country, was living in Canada and watching the operations of his fellow countrymen with keen eyes. When the French first saw the inhospitable shores of the St. Lawrence, in 1535, under the lead of Jacques Cartier, and had opened a new country to their crown, men were not lacking to further extend the discovery. In 1608, Champlain came, and at the foot of a cliff on that river founded Quebec. Seven years after, he brought four Recollet monks; and through them and the Jesuits the discoveries already narrated occurred. Champlain died in 1635, one hundred years after Cartier's first visit, but not until he had explored the northern lakes as far as Lake Huron, on whose rocky shores he, as the progenitor of a mighty race to follow, set his feet. He, with others, held to the idea that somewhere across the country, a river highway extended to the Western ocean. The reports from the missions whose history has been given aided this belief; and not until Marquette and Joliet returned was the delusion in any way dispelled. Before this was done, however, the man to whom reference has been made, Robert Cavalier, better known as La Salle, had endeavored to solve the mystery, and, while living on his grant of land eight miles above Montreal, had indeed effected important discoveries.

La Salle, the next actor in the field of exploration after Champlain, was born in 1643. His father's family was among the old and wealthy burghers of Rouen, France, and its members were frequently entrusted with important governmental positions. He early exhibited such traits of character as to mark him among his associates. Coming from a wealthy family, he enjoyed all the advantages of his day, and received, for the times, an excellent education. He was a Catholic, though his subsequent life does not prove him to have been a religious enthusiast. From some cause, he joined the Order of Loyola, but the circumscribed sphere of action set for him in the order illy concurred with his independent disposition, and led to his separation from it. This was effected, however, in a good spirit, as they considered him fit for a different field of action than any presented by the order. Having a brother in Canada, a member of the order of St. Sulpice, he determined to join him. By his connection with the Jesuits he had lost his share of his father's estate, but, by some means, on his death, which occurred about this time, he was given a small share; and with this, in 1666, he arrived in Montreal. All Canada was alive with the news of the explorations; and La Salle's mind, actively grasping the ideas he afterward carried out, began to mature plans for their perfection. At Montreal he found a seminary of priests of the St. Sulpice Order who were encouraging settlers by grants of land on easy terms, hoping to establish a barrier of settlements between themselves and the Indians, made enemies to the French by Champlain's actions when founding Quebec. The Superior of the seminary, learning of LaSalle's arrival, gratuitously offered him a grant of land on the St. Lawrence, eight miles above Montreal. The grant, though dangerously near the hostile Indians, was accepted, and LaSalle soon enjoyed an excellent trade in furs. While employed in developing his claim, he learned of the great unknown route, and burned with a desire to solve its existence. He applied himself closely to the study of Indian dialects, and in three years is said to have made great progress in their language. While on his farm his thoughts often turned to the unknown land away to the west, and, like all men of his day, he desired to explore the route to the Western sea, and thence obtain an easy trade with China and Japan. The "Great River, which flowed to the sea," must, thought they, find an outlet in the Gulf of California. While musing on these things, Marquette and Joliet were preparing to descend the Wisconsin; and LaSalle himself learned from a wandering band of Senecas that a river, called the Ohio, arose in their country and flowed to the sea, but at such a distance that it would require eight months to reach its mouth. This must be the Great River, or a part of it: for all geographers of the day considered the Mississippi and its tributary as one stream. Placing great confidence on this hypothesis, La Salle repaired to Quebec to obtain the sanction of Gov. Courcelles. His plausible statements soon won him the Governor and M. Talon, and letters patent were issued granting the exploration. No pecuniary aid was offered, and La Salle, having expended all his means in improving his estate, was obliged to sell it to procure the necessary outfit. The Superior of the seminary being favorably disposed toward him, purchased the greater part of his improvement, and realizing 2,800 livres, he purchased four canoes and the necessary supplies for the expedition. The seminary was, at the same time, preparing for a similar exploration. The priests of this order, emulating the Jesuits, had established missions on the northern shore of Lake Ontario. Hearing of populous tribes still further west, they resolved to attempt their conversion, and deputed two of their number for the purpose. On going to Quebec to procure the necessary supplies, they were advised of La Salle's expedition down the Ohio, and resolved to unite themselves with it. La Salle did not altogether favor their attempt, as he believed the Jesuits already had the field, and would not care to have any aid from a rival order. His disposition also would not well brook the part they assumed, of asking him to be a co-laborer rather than a leader. However, the expeditions, merged into one body, left the mission on the St. Lawrence on the 6th of July, 1669, in seven canoes. The party numbered twenty-four persons, who were accompanied by two canoes filled with Indians who had visited La Salle, and who now acted as guides. Their guides led them up the St. Lawrence, over the expanse of Lake Ontario, to their village on the banks of the Genesee, where they expected to find guides to lead them on to the Ohio. As La Salle only partially understood their language, he was compelled to confer with them by means of a Jesuit stationed at the village. The Indians refused to furnish him the expected aid, and even burned before his eyes a prisoner, the only one who could give him any knowledge he desired. He surmised the Jesuits were at the bottom of the matter, fearful lest the disciples of St. Sulpice should gain a foothold in the west. He lingered here a month, with the hope of accomplishing his object, when, by chance, there came by an Iroquois Indian, who assured them that at his colony, near the head of the lake, they could find guides; and offered to conduct them thither. Coming along the southern shore of the lake, they passed, at its western extremity, the mouth of the Niagara River, where they heard for the first time the thunder of the mighty cataract between the two lakes. At the village of the Iroquois they met a friendly reception, and were informed by a Shawanese prisoner that they could reach the Ohio in six weeks' time, and that he would guide them there. While preparing to commence the journey, they heard of the missions to the northwest, and the priests resolved to go there and convert the natives, and find the river by that route. It appears that Louis Joliet met them here, on his return from visiting the copper mines of Lake Superior, under command of M. Talon. He gave the priests a map of the country, and informed them that the Indians of those regions were in great need of spiritual advisers. This strengthened their intention, though warned by La Salle, that the Jesuits were undoubtedly there. The authority for Joliet's visit to them here is not clearly given, and may not be true, but the same letter which gives the account of the discovery of the Ohio at this time by La Salle, states it as a fact, and it is hence inserted. The missionaries and La Salle separated, the former to find, as he had predicted, the followers of Loyola already in the field, and not wanting their aid. Hence they return from a fruitless tour.

La Salle, now left to himself and just recovering from a violent fever, went on his journey. From the paper from which these statements are taken, it appears he went on to Onondaga, where he procured guides to a tributary of the Ohio, down which he proceeded to the principal stream, on whose bosom he continued his way till he came to the falls at the present city of Louisville, Ky. It has been asserted that he went on down to its mouth, but that is not well authenticated and is hardly true. The statement that he went as far as the falls is, doubtless, correct. He states, in a letter to Count Frontenac in 1677, that he discovered the Ohio, and that he descended it to the falls. Moreover, Joliet, in a measure his rival, for he was now preparing to go to the northern lakes and from them search the river, made two maps representing the lakes and the Mississippi, on both of which he states that La Salle had discovered the Ohio. Of its course beyond the falls, La Salle does not seem to have learned anything definite, hence his discovery did not in any way settle the great question, and elicited but little comment. Still, it stimulated La Salle to more effort, and while musing on his plans, Joliet and Marquette push on from Green Bay, and discover the river and ascertain the general course of its outlet. On Joliet's return in 1673, he seems to drop from further notice. Other and more venturesome souls were ready to finish the work begun by himself and the zealous Marquette, who, left among the far-away nations, laid down his life. The spirit of La Salle was equal to the enterprise, and as he now had returned from one voyage of discovery, he stood ready to solve the mystery, and gain the country for his King. Before this could be accomplished, however, he saw other things must be done, and made preparations on a scale, for the time, truly marvelous.

Count Frontenac, the new Governor, had no sooner established himself in power than he gave a searching glance over the new realm to see if any undeveloped resources lay yet unnoticed, and what country yet remained open. He learned from the exploits of La Salle on the Ohio, and from Joliet, now returned from the West, of that immense country, and resolving in his mind on some plan whereby it could be formally taken, entered heartily into the plans of La Salle, who, anxious to solve the mystery concerning the outlet of the Great River, gave him the outline of a plan, sagacious in its conception and grand in its comprehension. La Salle had also informed him of the endeavors of the English on the Atlantic coast to divert the trade with the Indians, and partly to counteract this, were the plans of La Salle adopted. They were, briefly, to build a chain of forts from Canada, or New France, along the lakes to the Mississippi, and on down that river, thereby holding the country by power as well as by discovery. A fort was to be built on the Ohio as soon as the means could be obtained, and thereby hold that country by the same policy. Thus to La Salle alone may be ascribed the bold plan of gaining the whole West, a plan only thwarted by the force of arms. Through the aid of Frontenac, he was given a proprietary and the rank of nobility, and on his proprietary was erected a fort, which he, in honor of his Governor, called Fort Frontenac. It stood on the site of the present city of Kingston, Canada. Through it he obtained the trade of the Five Nations, and his fortune was so far assured. He next repaired to France, to perfect his arrangements, secure his title and obtain means.

On his return he built the fort alluded to, and prepared to go on in the prosecution of his plan. A civil discord arose, however, which for three years prevailed, and seriously threatened his projects. As soon as he could extricate himself, he again repaired to France, receiving additional encouragement in money, grants, and the exclusive privilege of a trade in buffalo skins, then considered a source of great wealth. On his return, he was accompanied by Henry Tonti, son of an illustrious Italian nobleman, who had fled from his own country during one of its political revolutions. Coming to France, he made himself famous as the founder of Tontine Life Insurance. Henry Tonti possessed an indomitable will, and though he had suffered the loss of one of his hands by the explosion of a grenade in one of the Sicilian wars, his courage was undaunted, and his ardor undimmed. La Salle also brought recruits, mechanics, sailors, cordage and sails for rigging a ship, and merchandise for traffic with the natives. At Montreal, he secured the services of M. La Motte, a person of much energy and integrity of character. He also secured several missionaries before he reached Fort Frontenac. Among them were Louis Hennepin, Gabriel Ribourde and Zenabe Membre. All these were Flemings, all Recollets. Hennepin, of all of them, proved the best assistant. They arrived at the fort early in the autumn of 1678, and preparations were at once made to erect a vessel in which to navigate the lakes, and a fort at the mouth of the Niagara River. The Senecas were rather adverse to the latter proposals when La Motte and Hennepin came, but by the eloquence of the latter, they were pacified and rendered friendly. After a number of vexatious delays, the vessel, the Griffin, the first on the lakes, was built, and on the 7th of August, a year after La Salle came here, it was launched, passed over the waters of the northern lakes, and, after a tempestuous voyage, landed at Green Bay. It was soon after stored with furs and sent back, while La Salle and his men awaited its return. It was never afterward heard of. La Salle, becoming impatient, erected a fort, pushed on with a part of his men, leaving part at the fort, and passed over the St. Joseph and Kankakee Rivers, and thence to the Illinois, down whose flood they proceeded to Peoria Lake, where he was obliged to halt, and return to Canada for more men and supplies. He left Tonti and several men to complete a fort, called Fort "Crevecoeur"—broken-hearted. The Indians drove the French away, the men mutinied, and Tonti was obliged to flee. When La Salle returned, he found no one there, and going down as far as the mouth of the Illinois, he retraced his steps, to find some trace of his garrison. Tonti was found safe among the Pottawatomies at Green Bay, and Hennepin and his two followers, sent to explore the head-waters of the Mississippi, were again home, after a captivity among the Sioux.

La Salle renewed his force of men, and the third time set out for the outlet of the Great River.

He left Canada early in December, 1681, and by February 6, 1682, reached the majestic flood of the mighty stream. On the 24th, they ascended the Chickasaw Bluffs, and, while waiting to find a sailor who had strayed away, erected Fort Prudhomme. They passed several Indian villages further down the river, in some of which they met with no little opposition. Proceeding onward, ere-long they encountered the tide of the sea, and April 6, they emerged on the broad bosom of the Gulf, "tossing its restless billows, limitless, voiceless and lonely as when born of chaos, without a sign of life."

Coasting about a short time on the shores of the Gulf, the party returned until a sufficiently dry place was reached to effect a landing. Here another cross was raised, also a column, on which was inscribed these words:

"LOUIS LE GRAND, ROI DE FRANCE ET DE NAVARRE, REGNE; LE NEUVIEME, AVRIL, 1682." *

"The whole party," says a "proces verbal," in the archives of France, "chanted the Te Deum, the Eccardiat and the Domine salvum fac Regem, and then after a salute of fire-arms and cries of Vive le Roi, La Salle, standing near the column, said in a loud voice in French:

"In the name of the most high, mighty, invincible and victorious Prince, Louis the Great, by the grace of God, King of France and of Navarre, Fourteenth of that name, this ninth day of April, one thousand six hundred and eighty two, I, in virtue of the commission of His Majesty, which I hold in my hand, and which may be seen by all whom it may concern, have taken, and do now take, in the name of His Majesty and of his successors to the crown, possession of this country of Louisiana, the seas, harbor, ports, bays, adjacent straights, and all the nations, people, provinces, cities, towns, villages, mines, minerals, fisheries, streams and rivers, comprised in the extent of said Louisiana, from the north of the great river St. Louis, otherwise called the Ohio, Alighin, Sipore or Chukagona, and this with the consent of the Chavunons, Chickachaws, and other people dwelling therein, with whom we have made alliance; as also along the river Colbert or Mississippi, and rivers which discharge themselves therein from its source beyond the Kiou or Nadouessious, and this with their consent, and with the consent of the Illinois, Mesigameas, Natchez, Koroas, which are the most considerable nations dwelling therein, with whom also we have made alliance, either by ourselves or others in our behalf, as far as its mouth at the sea or Gulf of Mexico, about the twenty-seventh degree of its elevation of the North Pole, and also to the mouth of the River of Palms; upon the assurance which we have received from all these nations that we are the first Europeans who have descended or ascended the river Colbert, hereby protesting against all those who may in future undertake to invade any or all of these countries, peoples or lands, to the prejudice of the right of His Majesty, acquired by the consent of the nations herein named."

The whole assembly responded with shouts and the salutes of fire-arms. The Sieur de La Salle caused to be planted at the foot of the column a plate of lead, on one side of which was inscribed the arms of France and the following Latin inscription:

Robertvs Cavellier, cvm Domino de Tonly, Legato, R. P. Zenobi Membro, Recollecto, et, Viginti Gallis Primos Hoc Flumen inde ab ilineorvm Pago, enavigavit, ejvsque ostium fecit Pervivvm, nono Aprilis cio iac LXXXII.

The whole proceedings were acknowledged before La Metaire, a notary, and the conquest was considered complete.

Thus was the foundation of France laid in the new republic, and thus did she lay claim to the Northwest, which now includes Ohio, and the county, whose history this book perpetuates.

La Salle and his party returned to Canada soon after, and again that country, and France itself, rang with anthems of exultation. He went on to France, where he received the highest honors. He was given a fleet, and sailors as well as colonists to return to the New World by way of a southern voyage, expecting to find the mouth of the Mississippi by an ocean course. Sailing past the outlets, he was wrecked on the coast of Texas, and in his vain endeavors to find the river or return to Canada, he became lost on the plains of Arkansas, where he, in 1687, was basely murdered by one of his followers. "You are down now, Grand Bashaw," exclaimed his slayer, and despoiling his remains, they left them to be devoured by wild beasts. To such an ignominious end came this daring, bold adventurer. Alone in the wilderness, he was left, with no monument but the vast realm he had discovered, on whose bosom he was left without covering and without protection.

"For force of will and vast conception; for various knowledge, and quick adaptation of his genius to untried circumstances; for a sublime magnanimity, that resigned itself to the will of Heaven, and yet triumphed over affliction by energy of purpose and unfaltering hope—he had no superior among his countrymen. He had won the affections of the governor of Canada, the esteem of Colbert, the confidence of Seignelay, the favor of Louis XIV. After the beginning of the colonization of Upper Canada, he perfected the discovery of the Mississippi from the Falls of St. Anthony to its mouth; and he will be remembered through all time as the father of colonization in the great central valley of the West.*

Avarice, passion and jealousy were not calmed by the blood of La Salle. All of his conspirators perished by ignoble deaths, while only seven of the sixteen succeeded in continuing the journey until they reached Canada, and thence found their way to France.

Tonti, who had been left at Fort St. Louis, on "Starved Rock" on the Illinois, went down in search of his beloved commander. Failing to find him, he returned and remained here until 1700, thousands of miles away from friends. Then he went down the Mississippi to join D'Iberville, who had made the discovery of the mouth of the Mississippi by an ocean voyage. Two years later, he went on a mission to the Chickasaws, but of his subsequent history nothing is known.

The West was now in possession of the French. La Salle's plans were yet feasible. The period of exploration was now over. The great river and its outlet was known, and it only remained for that nation to enter in and occupy what to many a Frenchman was the "Promised Land." Only eighteen years had elapsed since Marquette and Joliet had descended the river and shown the course of its outlet. A spirit, less bold than La Salle's would never in so short a time have penetrated for more than a thousand miles an unknown wilderness, and solved the mystery of the world.

When Joutel and his companions reached France in 1688, all Europe was on the eve of war. Other nations than the French wanted part of the New World, and when they saw that nation greedily and rapidly accumulating territory there, they endeavored to stay its progress. The league of Augsburg was formed in 1687 by the princes of the Empire to restrain the ambition of Louis XIV, and in 1688, he began hostilities by the capture of Philippsburg. The next year, England, under the lead of William III, joined the alliance, and Louis found himself compelled, with only the aid of the Turks, to contend against the united forces of the Empires of England, Spain, Holland, Denmark, Sweden and Norway. Yet the tide of battle wavered. In 1689, the French were defeated at Walcourt, and the Turks at Widin; but in 1690, the French were victorious at Charleroy, and the Turks at Belgrade. The next year, and also the next, victory inclined to the French, but in 1693, Louvois and Luxemburg were dead and Namur surrendered to the allies. The war extended to the New World, where it was maintained with more than equal success by the French, though the English population exceeded it more than twenty to one. In 1688, the French were estimated at about twelve thousand souls in North America, while the English were more than two hundred thousand. At first the war was prosecuted vigorously. In 1689, De. Ste. Helene and D'Iberville, two of the sons of Charles le Morte, crossed the wilderness and reduced the English forts on Hudson's Bay. But in August of the same year, the Iroquois, the hereditary foes of the French, captured and burned Montreal. Frontenac, who had gone on an expedition against New York by sea, was recalled. Fort Frontenac was abandoned, and no French posts left in the West between Trois Rivieres and Mackinaw, and were it not for the Jesuits the entire West would now have been abandoned. To recover their influence, the French planned three expeditions. One resulted in the destruction of Schenectady, another, Salmon Falls, and the third, Casco Bay. On the other hand, Nova Scotia was reduced by the colonies, and an expedition against Montreal went as far as to Lake Champlain, where it failed, owing to the dissensions of the leaders. Another expedition, consisting of twenty-four vessels, arrived before Quebec, which also failed through the incompetency of Sir William Phipps. During the succeeding years, various border conflicts occurred, in all of which border scenes of savage cruelty and savage ferocity were enacted. The peace of Ryswick, in 1697, closed the war. France retained Hudson's Bay, and all the places of which she was in possession in 1688; but the boundaries of the English and French claims in the New World were still unsettled.

The conclusion of the conflict left the French at liberty to pursue their scheme of colonization in the Mississippi Valley. In 1698, D'Iberville was sent to the lower province, which, ere long, was made a separate independency, called Louisiana.

Forts were erected on Mobile Bay, and the division of the territory between the French and the Spaniards was settled. Trouble existed between the French and the Chickasaws, ending in the cruel deaths of many of the leaders, in the fruitless endeavors of the Canadian and Louisianian forces combining against the Chickasaws. For many years the conflict raged, with unequal successes, until the Indian power gave way before superior military tactics. In the end, New Orleans was founded, in 1718, and the French power secured.

Before this was consummated, however, France became entangled in another war against the allied powers, ending in her defeat and the loss of Nova Scotia, Hudson's Bay and Newfoundland. The peace of Utrecht closed the war in 1713.

The French, weary with prolonged strife, adopted the plan, more peaceful in its nature, of giving out to distinguished men the monopoly of certain districts in the fur trade, the most prosperous of any avocation then. Crozat and Cadillac—the latter the founder of Detroit, in 1701—were the chief ones concerned in this. The founding of the villages of Kaskaskia, Cahokia, Vincennes, and others in the Mississippi and Wabash Valleys, led to the rapid development, according to the French custom of all these parts of the West, while along all the chief water-courses, other trading posts and forts were established, rapidly fulfilling the hopes of La Salle, broached so many years before.

The French had, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, four principal routes to their western towns, two of which passed over the soil of Ohio. The first of these was the one followed by Marquette and Joliet, by way of the Lakes to Green Bay, in Wisconsin; thence across a portage to the Wisconsin River, down which they floated to the Mississippi. On their return they came up the Illinois River, to the site of Chicago, whence Joliet returned to Quebec by the Lakes. La Salle's route was first by the Lakes to the St. Joseph's River, which he followed to the portage to the Kankakee, and thence downward to the Mississippi. On his second and third attempt, he crossed the lower peninsula of Michigan to the Kankakee, and again traversed its waters to the Illinois. The third route was established about 1716. It followed the southern shores of Lake Erie to the mouth of the Maumee River; following this stream, the voyagers went on to the junction between it and the St. Mary's, which they followed to the "Oubache"—Wabash—and then to the French villages in Vigo and Knox Counties, in Indiana. Vincennes was the oldest and most important one here. It had been founded in 1702 by a French trader, and was, at the date of the establishment of the third route, in a prosperous condition. For many years, the traders crossed the plains of Southern Illinois to the French towns on the bottoms opposite St. Louis. They were afraid to go on down the "Waba" to the Ohio, as the Indians had frightened them with accounts of the great monsters below. Finally, some adventurous spirit went down the river, found it emptied into the Ohio, and solved the problem of the true outlet of the Ohio, heretofore supposed to be a tributary of the Wabash.

The fourth route was from the southern shore of Lake Erie, at Presqueville, over a portage of fifteen miles to the head of French Creek, at Waterford, Penn.; thence down that stream to the Ohio, and on to the Mississippi. Along all these routes, ports and posts were carefully maintained. Many were on the soil of Ohio, and were the first attempts of the white race to possess its domain. Many of the ruins of these posts are yet found on the southern shore of Lake Erie, and at the outlets of streams flowing into the lake and the Ohio River. The principal forts were at Mackinaw, at Presqueville, at the mouth of the St. Joseph's, on Starved Rock, and along the Father of Waters. Yet another power was encroaching on them: a sturdy race, clinging to the inhospitable Atlantic shores, were coming over the mountains. The murmurs of a conflict were already heard—a conflict that would change the fate of a nation.

The French were extending their explorations beyond the Mississippi; they were also forming a political organization, and increasing their influence over the natives. Of a passive nature, however, their power and their influence could not withstand a more aggressive nature, and they were obliged, finally, to give way. They had the fruitful valleys of the West more than a century; yet they developed no resources, opened no mines of wealth, and left the country as passive as they found it.

Of the growth of the West under French rule, but little else remains to be said. The sturdy Anglo-Saxon race on the Atlantic coast, and their progenitors in England, began, now, to turn their attention to this vast country. The voluptuousness of the French court, their neglect of the true basis of wealth, agriculture, and the repressive tendencies laid on the colonists, led the latter to adopt a hunter's life, and leave the country undeveloped and ready for the people who claimed the country from "sea to sea." Their explorers were now at work. The change was at hand.

Occasional mention has been made in the history of the State, in preceding pages, of settlements and trading-posts of the French traders, explorers and missionaries, within the limits of Ohio. The French were the first white men to occupy the northwestern part of the New World, and though their stay was brief, yet it opened the way to a sinewy race, living on the shores of the Atlantic, who in time came, saw, and conquered that part of America, making it what the people of to-day enjoy.

As early as 1669, four years before the discovery of the Mississippi by Joliet and Marquette, La Salle, the famous explorer, discovered the Ohio River, and paddled down its gentle current as far as the falls at the present city of Louisville, but he, like others of the day, made no settlement on its banks, only claiming the country for his King by virtue of this discovery.

Early in the beginning of the eighteenth century, French traders and voyagers passed along the southern shores of Lake Erie, to the mouth of the Maumee, up whose waters they rowed their bark canoes, on their way to their outposts in the Wabash and Illinois Valleys, established between 1675 and 1700. As soon as they could, without danger from their inveterate enemies, the Iroquois, masters of all the lower lake country, erect a trading-post at the mouth of this river, they did so. It was made a depot of considerable note, and was, probably, the first permanent habitation of white men in Ohio. It remained until after the peace of 1763, the termination of the French and Indian war, and the occupancy of this country by the English. On the site of the French trading-post, the British, in 1794, erected Fort Miami, which they garrisoned until the country came under the control of Americans. Now, Maumee City covers the ground.

The French had a trading-post at the mouth of the Huron River, in what is now Erie County. When it was built is not now known. It was, however, probably one of their early outposts, and may have been built before 1750. They had another on the shore of the bay, on or near the site of Sandusky City. Both this and the one at the mouth of the Huron River were abandoned before the war of the Revolution. On Lewis Evan's map of the British Middle Colonies, published in 1755, a French fort, called "Fort Junandat, built in 1754," is marked on the east bank of the Sandusky River, several miles below its mouth. Fort Sandusky, on the western bank, is also noted. Several Wyandot towns are likewise marked. But very little is known concerning any of these trading-posts. They were, evidently, only temporary, and were abandoned when the English came into possession of the country.

The mouth of the Cuyahoga River was another important place. On Evan's map there is marked on the west bank of the Cuyahoga, some distance from its mouth, the words "French House," doubtless, the station of a French trader. The ruins of a house, found about five miles from the mouth of the river, on the west bank, are supposed to be those of the trader's station.

In 1786, the Moravian missionary, Zeisberger, with his Indian converts, left Detroit in a vessel called the Mackinaw, and sailed to the mouth of the Cuyahoga. From there they went up the river about ten miles, and settled in an abandoned Ottawa village, where Independence now is, which place they called "Saint's Rest." Their stay was brief, for the following April, they left for the Huron River, and settled near the site of Milan, Erie County, at a locality they called New Salem.

There are but few records of settlements made by the French until after 1750. Even these can hardly be called settlements, as they were simply trading-posts. The French easily affiliated with the Indians, and had little energy beyond trading. They never cultivated fields, laid low forests, and subjugated the country. They were a half-Indian race, so to speak, and hence did little if anything in developing the West.

About 1749, some English traders came to a place in what is now Shelby County, on the banks of a creek since known as Loramie's Creek, and established a trading-station with the Indians. This was the first English trading-place or attempt at settlement in the State. It was here but a short time, however, when the French, hearing of its existence, sent a party of soldiers to the Twigtwees, among whom it was founded, and demanded the traders as intruders upon French territory. The Twigtwees refusing to deliver up their friends, the French, assisted by a large party of Ottawas and Chippewas, attacked the trading-house, probably a block-house, and, after a severe battle, captured it. The traders were taken to Canada. This fort was called by the English "Pickawillany," from which "Piqua" is probably derived. About the time that Kentucky was settled, a Canadian Frenchman, named Loramie, established a store on the site of the old fort. He was a bitter enemy of the Americans, and for a long time Loramie's store was the headquarters of mischief toward the settlers.

The French had the faculty of endearing themselves to the Indians by their easy assimilation of their habits; and, no doubt, Loramie was equal to any in this respect, and hence gained great influence over them. Col. Johnston, many years an Indian Agent from the United States among the Western tribes, stated that he had often seen the "Indians burst into tears when speaking of the times when their French father had dominion over them; and their attachment always remained unabated."

So much influence had Loramie with the Indians, that, when Gen. Clarke, from Kentucky, invaded the Miami Valley in 1782, his attention was attracted to the spot. He came on and burnt the Indian settlement here, and destroyed the store of the Frenchman, selling his goods among the men at auction. Loramie fled to the Shawanees, and, with a colony of that nation, emigrated west of the Mississippi, to the Spanish possessions, where he again began his life of a trader.

In 1794, during the Indian war, a fort was built on the site of the store by Wayne, and named Fort Loramie. The last officer who had command here was Capt. Butler, a nephew of Col. Richard Butler, who fell at St. Clair's defeat. While here with his family, he lost an interesting boy, about eight years of age. About his grave, the sorrowing father and mother built a substantial picket-fence, planted honeysuckles over it, which, long after, remained to mark the grave of the soldier's boy.

The site of Fort Loramie was always an important point, and was one of the places defined on the boundary line at the Greenville treaty. Now a barn covers the spot.

At the junction of the Auglaize and Maumee Rivers, on the site of Fort Defiance, built by Gen. Wayne in 1794, was a settlement of traders, established some time before the Indian war began. "On the high ground extending from the Maumee a quarter of a mile up the Auglaize, about two hundred yards in width, was an open space, on the west and south of which were oak woods, with hazel undergrowth. Within this opening, a few hundred yards above the point, on the steep bank of the Auglaize, were five or six cabins and log houses, inhabited principally by Indian traders. The most northerly, a large hewed-log house, divided below into three apartments, was occupied as a warehouse, store and dwelling, by George Ironside, the most wealthy and influential of the traders on the point. Next to his were the houses of Pirault (Pero) a French baker, and McKenzie, a Scot, who, in addition to merchandising, followed the occupation of a silversmith, exchanging with the Indians his brooches, ear-drops and other silver ornaments, at an enormous profit, for skins and furs.

Still further up were several other families of French and English; and two American prisoners, Henry Ball, a soldier taken in St. Clair's defeat, and his wife, Polly Meadows, captured at the same time, were allowed to live here and pay their masters the price of their ransom—he, by boating to the rapids of the Maumee, and she by washing and sewing. Fronting the house of Ironside, and about fifty yards from the bank, was a small stockade, inclosing two hewed-log houses, one of which was occupied by James Girty (a brother of Simon), the other, occasionally, by Elliott and McKee, British Indian Agents living at Detroit."*

The post, cabins and all they contained fell under the control of the Americans, when the British evacuated the shores of the lakes. While they existed, they were an undoubted source of Indian discontent, and had much to do in prolonging the Indian war. The country hereabouts did not settle until some time after the creation of the State government.

As soon as the French learned the true source of the Ohio and Wabash Rivers, both were made a highway to convey the products of their hunters. In coursing down the Ohio, they made trading-places, or depots, where they could obtain furs of the Indians, at accessible points, generally at the mouths of the rivers emptying into the Ohio. One of these old forts or trading-places stood about a mile and a half south of the outlet of the Scioto. It was here in 1740; but when it was erected no one could tell. The locality must have been pretty well known to the whites, however; for, in 1785, three years before the settlement of Marietta was made, four families made an ineffectual attempt to settle near the same place. They were from Kentucky, but were driven away by the Indians a short time after they arrived, not being allowed to build cabins, and had only made preparations to plant corn and other necessities of life. While the men were encamped near the vicinity of Piketown, in Pike County, when on a hunting expedition, they were surprised by the Indians, and two of them slain. The others hastened back to the encampment at the mouth of the Scioto, and hurriedly gathering the families together, fortunately got them on a flat-boat, at that hour on its way down the river. By the aid of the boat, they were enabled to reach Maysville, and gave up the attempt to settle north of the Ohio.

The famous "old Scioto Salt Works," in Jackson County, on the banks of Salt Creek, a tributary of the Scioto, were long known to the whites before any attempt was made to settle in Ohio. They were indicated on the maps published in 1755. They were the resort, for generations, of the Indians in all parts of the West, who annually came here to make salt. They often brought white prisoners with them, and thus the salt works became known. There were no attempts made to settle here, however, until after the Indian war, which closed in 1795. As soon as peace was assured, the whites came here for salt, and soon after made a settlement. Another early salt spring was in what is now Trumbull County. It is also noted on Evan's map of 1755. They were occupied by the Indians, French, and by the Americans as early as 1780, and perhaps earlier.

As early as 1761 Moravian missionaries came among the Ohio Indians and began their labors. In a few years, under the lead of Revs. Fredrick Post and John Heckewelder, permanent stations were established in several parts of the State, chiefly on the Tuscarawas River in Tuscarawas County. Here were the three Indian villages—Shoenburn, Gnadenhutten and Salem. The site of the first is about two miles south of New Philadelphia; Gnadenhutten was seven miles further south, and about five miles still on was Salem, a short distance from the present village of Port Washington. The first and last named of these villages were on the west side of the Tuscarawas River, near the margin of the Ohio Canal. Gnadenhutten was on the east side of the river. It was here that the brutal massacre of these Christian Indians, by the rangers under Col. Williamson, occurred March 8, 1782. The account of the massacre and of these tribes appears in these pages, and it only remains to notice what became of them.

The hospitable and friendly character of these Indians had extended beyond their white brethren on the Ohio. The American people at large looked on the act of Williamson and his men as an outrage on humanity. Congress felt its influence, and gave them a tract of twelve thousand acres, embracing their former homes, and induced them to return from the northern towns whither they had fled. As the whites came into the country, their manners degenerated until it became necessary to remove them. Through Gen. Cass, of Michigan, an agreement was made with them, whereby Congress paid them over $6,000, an annuity of $400, and 24,000 acres in some territory to be designated by the United States. This treaty, by some means, was never effectually carried out, and the principal part of them took up their residence near a Moravian missionary station on the River Thames, in Canada. Their old churchyard still exists on the Tuscarawas River, and here rest the bones of several of their devoted teachers. It is proper to remark here, that Mary Heckewelder, daughter of the missionary, is generally believed to have been the first white child born in Ohio. However, this is largely conjecture. Captive women among the Indians, before the birth of Mary Heckewelder, are known to have borne children, which afterward, with their mothers, were restored to their friends. The assertion that Mary Heckewelder was the first child born in Ohio, is therefore incorrect. She is the first of whom any definite record is made.

These outposts are about all that are known to have existed prior to the settlement at Marietta. About one-half mile below Bolivar, on the western line of Tuscarawas County, are the remains of Fort Laurens, erected in 1778, by a detachment of 1,000 men under Gen. McIntosh, from Fort Pitt. It was, however, occupied but a short time, vacated in August, 1779, as it was deemed untenable at such a distance from the frontier.

During the existence of the six years' Indian war, a settlement of French emigrants was made on the Ohio River, that deserves notice. It illustrates very clearly the extreme ignorance and credulity prevalent at that day. In May or June of 1788, Joel Barlow left this country for Europe, "authorized to dispose of a very large body of land in the West." In 1790, he distributed proposals in Paris for the disposal of lands at five shillings per acre, which, says Volney, "promised a climate healthy and delightful; scarcely such a thing as a frost in the winter; a river, called by way of eminence 'The Beautiful,' abounding in fish of an enormous size; magnificent forests of a tree from which sugar flows, and a shrub which yields candles; venison in abundance; no military enrollments, and no quarters to find for soldiers." Purchasers became numerous, individuals and whole families sold their property, and in the course of 1791 many embarked at the various French sea-ports, each with his title in his pocket. Five hundred settlers, among whom were many wood carvers and guilders to His Majesty, King of France, coachmakers, friseurs and peruke makers, and other artisans and artistes, equally well fitted for a frontier life, arrived in the United States in 1791-92, and acting without concert, traveling without knowledge of the language, customs and roads, at last managed to reach the spot designated for their residence. There they learned they had been cruelly deceived, and that the titles they held were worthless. Without food, shelterless, and danger closing around them, they were in a position that none but a Frenchman could be in without despair. Who brought them thither, and who was to blame, is yet a disputed point. Some affirm that those to whom large grants of land were made when the Ohio Company procured its charter, were the real instigators of the movement. They failed to pay for their lands, and hence the title reverted to the Government. This, coming to the ears of the poor Frenchmen, rendered their situation more distressing. They never paid for their lands, and only through the clemency of Congress, who afterward gave them a grant of land, and confirmed them in its title, were they enabled to secure a foothold. Whatever doubt there may be as to the causes of these people being so grossly deceived, there can be none regarding their sufferings. They had followed a jack-o-lantern into the howling wilderness, and must work or starve. The land upon which they had been located was covered with immense forest trees, to level which the coachmakers were at a loss. At last, hoping to conquer by a coup de main, they tied ropes to the branches, and while a dozen pulled at them as many fell at the trunk with all sorts of edged tools, and thus soon brought the monster to the earth. Yet he was a burden. He was down, to be sure, but as much in the way as ever. Several lopped off the branches, others dug an immense trench at his side, into which, with might and main, all rolled the large log, and then buried him from sight. They erected their cabins in a cluster, as they had seen them in their own native land, thus affording some protection from marauding bands of Indians. Though isolated here in the lonely wilderness, and nearly out of funds with which to purchase provisions from descending boats, yet once a week they met and drowned care in a merry dance, greatly to the wonderment of the scout or lone Indian who chanced to witness their revelry. Though their vivacity could work wonders, it would not pay for lands nor buy provisions. Some of those at Gallipolis (for such they called their settlement, from Gallia, in France) went to Detroit, some to Kaskaskia, and some bought land of the Ohio Company, who treated them liberally. Congress, too, in 1795, being informed of their sufferings, and how they had been deceived, granted them 24,000 acres opposite Little Sandy River, to which grant, in 1798, 12,000 acres more were added. The tract has since been known as French Grant. The settlement is a curious episode in early Western history, and deserves a place in its annals.

CHAPTER III.

ENGLISH EXPLORATIONS—TRADERS—FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR IN THE WEST—ENGLISH POSSESSION.

AS has been noted, the French title rested on the discoveries of their missionaries and traders, upon the occupation of the country, and upon the construction of the treaties of Ryswick, Utrecht and Aix la Chapelle. The English claims to the same region were based on the fact of a prior occupation of the corresponding coast, on an opposite construction of the same treaties, and an alleged cession of the rights of the Indians. The rights acquired by discovery were conventional, and in equity were good only between European powers, and could not affect the rights of the natives, but this distinction was disregarded by all European powers. The inquiry of an Indian chief embodies the whole controversy: "Where are the Indian lands, since the French claim all on the north side of the Ohio and the English all on the south side of it?"

The English charters expressly granted to all the original colonies the country westward to the South Sea, and the claims thus set up in the West, though held in abeyance, were never relinquished. The primary distinction between the two nations governed their actions in the New World, and led finally to the supremacy of the English. They were fixed agricultural communities. The French were mere trading-posts. Though the French were the prime movers in the exploration of the West, the English made discoveries during their occupation, however, mainly by their traders, who penetrated the Western wilderness by way of the Ohio River, entering it from the two streams which uniting form that river. Daniel Coxie, in 1722, published, in London, "A description of the English province of Carolina, by the Spaniards called Florida, and by the French called La Louisiane, as also the great and famous river Meschacebe, or Mississippi, the five vast navigable lakes of fresh water, and the parts adjacent, together with an account of the commodities of the growth and production of the said province." The title of this work exhibits very clearly the opinions of the English people respecting the West. As early as 1630, Charles I granted to Sir Robert Heath "All that part of America lying between thirty-one and thirty-six degrees north latitude, from sea to sea," out of which the limits of Carolina were afterward taken. This immense grant was conveyed in 1638, to the Earl of Arundel, and afterward came into the possession of Dr. Daniel Coxie. In the prosecution of this claim, it appeared that Col. Wood, of Virginia, from 1654 to 1664, explored several branches of the Ohio and "Meschacebe," as they spell the Mississippi. A Mr. Needham, who was employed by Col. Wood, kept a journal of the exploration. There is also the account of some one who had explored the Mississippi to the Yellow, or Missouri River, before 1676. These, and others, are said to have been there when La Salle explored the outlet of the Great River, as he found tools among the natives which were of European manufacture. They had been brought here by English adventurers. Also, when Iberville was colonizing the lower part of Louisiana, these same persons visited the Chickasaws and stirred them up against the French. It is also stated that La Salle found that some one had been among the Natchez tribes when he returned from the discovery of the outlet of the Mississippi, and excited them against him. There is, however, no good authority for these statements, and they are doubtless incorrect. There is also an account that in 1678, several persons went from New England as far south as New Mexico, "one hundred and fifty leagues beyond the Meschacebe," the narrative reads, and on their return wrote an account of the expedition. This, also, cannot be traced to good authority. The only accurate account of the English reaching the West was when Bienville met the British vessel at the "English Turn," about 1700. A few of their traders may have been in the valley west of the Alleghany Mountains before 1700, though no reliable accounts are now found to confirm these suppositions. Still, from the earliest occupation of the Atlantic Coast by the English, they claimed the country, and, though the policy of its occupation rested for a time, it was never fully abandoned. Its revival dates from 1710 properly, though no immediate endeavor was made for many years after. That year, Alexander Spotswood was made Governor of Virginia. No sooner did he assume the functions of ruler, than, casting his eye over his dominion, he saw the great West beyond the Alleghany Mountains unoccupied by the English, and rapidly filling with the French, who he observed were gradually confining the English to the Atlantic Coast. His prophetic eye saw at a glance the animus of the whole scheme, and he determined to act promptly on the defensive. Through his representation, the Virginia Assembly was induced to make an appropriation to defray the expense of an exploration of the mountains, and see if a suitable pass could not then be found where they could be crossed. The Governor led the expedition in person. The pass was discovered, a route marked out for future emigrants, and the party returned to Williamsburg. There the Governor established the order of the "Knights of the Golden Horseshoe," presented his report to the Colonial Assembly and one to his King. In each report, he exposed with great boldness the scheme of the French, and advised the building of a chain of forts across to the Ohio, and the formation of settlements to counteract them. The British Government, engrossed with other matters, neglected his advice. Forty years after, they remembered it, only to regret that it was so thoughtlessly disregarded.

Individuals, however, profited by his advice. By 1730, traders began in earnest to cross the mountains and gather from the Indians the stores beyond. They now began to adopt a system, and abandoned the heretofore renegade habits of those who had superseded them, many of whom never returned to the Atlantic Coast. In 1742, John Howard descended the Ohio in a skin canoe, and, on the Mississippi was taken prisoner by the French. His captivity did not in the least deter others from coming. Indeed, the date of his voyage was the commencement of a vigorous trade with the Indians by the English, who crossed the Alleghanies by the route discovered by Gov. Spotswood. In 1748, Conrad Weiser, a German of Herenberg, who had acquired in early life a knowledge of the Mohawk tongue by a residence among them, was sent on an embassy to the Shawanees on the Ohio. He went as far as Logstown, a Shawanee village on the north bank of the Ohio, about seventeen miles below the site of Pittsburgh. Here he met the chiefs in counsel, and secured their promise of aid against the French.

The principal ground of the claims of the English in the Northwest was the treaty with the Five Nations—the Iroquois. This powerful confederation claimed the jurisdiction over an immense extent of country. Their policy differed considerably from other Indian tribes. They were the only confederation which attempted any form of government in America. They were often termed the "Six Nations," as the entrance of another tribe into the confederacy made that number. They were the conquerors of nearly all tribes from Lower Canada, to and beyond the Mississippi. They only exacted, however, a tribute from the conquered tribes, leaving them to manage their own internal affairs, and stipulating that to them alone did the right of cession belong. Their country, under these claims, embraced all of America north of the Cherokee Nation, in Virginia; all Kentucky, and all the Northwest, save a district in Ohio and Indiana, and a small section in Southwestern Illinois, claimed by the Miami Confederacy. The Iroquois, or Six Nations, were the terror of all other tribes. It was they who devastated the Illinois country about Rock Fort in 1680, and caused wide-spread alarm among all the Western Indians. In 1684, Lord Howard, Governor of Virginia, held a treaty with the Iroquois at Albany, when, at the request of Col. Duncan, of New York, they placed themselves under the protection of the English. They made a deed of sale then, by treaty, to the British Government, of a vast tract of country south and east of the Illinois River, and extending into Canada. In 1726, another deed was drawn up and signed by the chiefs of the national confederacy by which their lands were conveyed in trust to England, "to be protected and defended by His Majesty, to and for the use of the grantors and their heirs."*

If the Six Nations had a good claim to the Western country, there is but little doubt but England was justified in defending their country against the French, as, by the treaty of Utrecht, they had agreed not to invade the lands of Britain's Indian allies. This claim was vigorously contested by France, as that country claimed the Iroquois had no lawful jurisdiction over the West. In all the disputes, the interests of the contending nations was, however, the paramount consideration. The rights of the Indians were little regarded.

The British also purchased land by the treaty of Lancaster, in 1744, wherein they agreed to pay the Six Nations for land settled unlawfully in Pennsylvania, Virginia and Maryland. The Indians were given goods and gold amounting to near a thousand pounds sterling. They were also promised the protection of the English. Had this latter provision been faithfully carried out, much blood would have been saved in after years. The treaties with the Six Nations were the real basis of the claims of Great Britain to the West; claims that were only settled by war. The Shawanee Indians, on the Ohio, were also becoming hostile to the English, and began to assume a threatening exterior. Peter Chartier, a half-breed, residing in Philadelphia, escaped from the authorities, those by whom he was held for a violation of the laws, and joining the Shawanees, persuaded them to join the French. Soon after, in 1743 or 1744, he placed himself at the head of 400 of their warriors, and lay in wait on the Alleghany River for the provincial traders. He captured two, exhibited to them a captain's commission from the French, and seized their goods, worth £1,600. The Indians, after this, emboldened by the aid given them by the French, became more and more hostile, and Weiser was again sent across the mountains in 1748, with presents to conciliate them and sound them on their feelings for the rival nations, and also to see what they thought of a settlement of the English to be made in the West. The visit of Conrad Weiser was successful, and Thomas Lee, with twelve other Virginians, among whom were Lawrence and Augustine Washington, brothers of George Washington, formed a company which they styled the Ohio Company, and, in 1748, petitioned the King for a grant beyond the mountains. The monarch approved the petition and the government of Virginia was ordered to grant the Company 500,000 acres within the bounds of that colony beyond the Alleghanies, 200,000 of which were to be located at once. This provision was to hold good for ten years, free of quit rent, provided the Company would settle 100 families within seven years, and build a fort sufficient for their protection. These terms the Company accepted, and sent at once to London for a cargo suitable for the Indian trade. This was the beginning of English Companies in the West; this one forming a prominent part in the history of Ohio, as will be seen hereafter. Others were also formed in Virginia, whose object was the colonization of the West. One of these, the Loyal Company, received, on the 12th of June, 1749, a grant of 800,000 acres, from the line of Canada on the north and west, and on the 29th of October, 1751, the Greenbriar Company received a grant of 100,000 acres.

To these encroachments, the French were by no means blind. They saw plainly enough that if the English gained a foothold in the West, they would inevitably endeavor to obtain the country, and one day the issue could only be decided by war. Vaudreuil, the French Governor, had long anxiously watched the coming struggle. In 1774, he wrote home representing the consequences that would surely come, should the English succeed in their plans. The towns of the French in Illinois were producing large amounts of bread-stuffs and provisions which they sent to New Orleans. These provinces were becoming valuable, and must not be allowed to come under control of a rival power. In 1749, Louis Celeron was sent by the Governor with a party of soldiers to plant leaden plates, suitably inscribed, along the Ohio at the mouths of the principal streams. Two of these plates were afterward exhumed. One was sent to the Maryland Historical Society, and the inscription* deciphered by De Witt Clinton. On these plates was clearly stated the claims of France, as will be seen from the translation below.

England's claim, briefly and clearly stated, read as follows: "That all lands, or countries westward from the Atlantic Ocean to the South Sea, between 48 and 34 degrees of North Latitude, were expressly included in the grant of King James the First, to divers of his subjects, so long time since as the year 1606, and afterwards confirmed in the year 1620; and under this grant, the colony of Virginia claims extent so far west as the South Sea, and the ancient colonies of Massachusetts Bay and Connecticut, were by their respective charters, made to extend to the said South Sea, so that not only the right to the sea coast, but to all the Inland countries from sea to sea, has at all times been asserted by the Crown of England."†

To make good their titles, both nations were now doing their utmost. Professedly at peace, it only needed a torch applied, as it were, to any point, to instantly precipitate hostilities. The French were busily engaged erecting forts from the southern shores of Lake Erie to the Ohio, and on down in the Illinois Valley; up at Detroit, and at all its posts, preparations were constantly going on for the crisis, now sure to come. The issue between the two governments was now fully made up. It admitted of no compromise but the sword. To that, however, neither power desired an immediate appeal, and both sought rather to establish and fortify their interests, and to conciliate the Indian tribes. The English, through the Ohio Company, sent out Christopher Gist in the fall of 1750, to explore the regions west of the mountains. He was instructed to examine the passes, trace the courses of the rivers, mark the falls, seek for valuable lands, observe the strength, and to conciliate the friendship of the Indian tribes. He was well fitted for such an enterprise. Hardy, sagacious, bold, an adept in Indian character, a hunter by occupation, no man was better qualified than he for such an undertaking. He visited Logstown, where he was jealously received, passed over to the Muskingum River and Valley in Ohio, where he found a village of Wyandots, divided in sentiment. At this village he met Crogan, another equally famous frontiersman, who had been sent out by Pennsylvania. Together they held a council with the chiefs, and received assurance of the friendship of the tribe. This done, they passed to the Shawnee towns on the Scioto, received their assurances of friendship, and went on to the Miami Valley, which they crossed, remarking in Crogan's journal of its great fertility. They made a raft of logs on which they crossed the Great Miami, visited Piqua, the chief town of the Pickawillanics, and here made treaties with the Weas and Piankeshaws. While here, a deputation of the Ottawas visited the Miami Confederacy to induce them to unite with the French. They were repulsed through the influence of the English agents, the Miami sending Gist word that they would "stand like the mountains." Crogan now returned and published an account of their wanderings. Gist followed the Miami to its mouth, passed down the Ohio till within fifteen miles of the falls, then returned by way of the Kentucky River, over the highlands of Kentucky to Virginia, arriving in May, 1751. He had visited the Mingoes, Delawares, Wyandots, Shawnees and Miamis, proposed a union among these tribes, and appointed a grand council to meet at Logstown to form an alliance among themselves and with Virginia. His journey was marvelous for the day. It was extremely hazardous, as he was part of the time among hostile tribes, who could have captured him and been well rewarded by the French Government. But Gist knew how to act, and was successful.

* The following is the translation of the inscription of the plate found at Venango: "In the year 1749, reign of Louis XV, King of France, we, Celeron, commandant of a detachment by Monsieur the Marquis of Gallisoniere, Commander-in-chief of New France, to establish tranquillity in certain Indian villages in these Cantons, have buried this plate at the confluence of the Toracalokin, this twenty-ninth of July, near the River Ohio, otherwise Beautiful River, as a monument of renewal of possession which we have taken of the said river, and all its tributaries; and of all the land on both sides, as far as the sources of said rivers; inasmuch as the preceding Kings of France have enjoyed it, and maintained it by their arms and by treaties; especially by those of Ryswick, Utrecht, and Aix La Chapelle."

While Gist was doing this, some English traders established themselves at a place in what is now known as Shelby County, Ohio, and opened a store for the purpose of trading with the Indians. This was clearly in the limits of the West, claimed by the French, and at once aroused them to action. The fort or stockade stood on the banks of Loramie's Creek, about sixteen miles northwest of the present city of Sydney. It received the name Loramie from the creek by the French, which received its name in turn from the French trader of that name, who had a trading-post on this creek. Loramie had fled to the Spanish country west of the Mississippi, and for many years was a trader there; his store being at the junction of the Kansas and Missouri, near the present city of Kansas City, Mo. When the English traders came to Loramie's Creek, and erected their trading-place, they gave it the name of Pickawillany, from the tribe of Indians there. The Miami confederacy granted them this privilege as the result of the presents brought by Crogan and Gist. It is also asserted that Andrew Montour, a half-breed, son of a Seneca chief and the famous Catharine Montour, who was an important factor afterward in the English treaties with the Indians, was with them, and by his influence did much to aid in securing the privilege. Thus was established the first English trading-post in the Northwest Territory and in Ohio. It, however, enjoyed only a short duration. The French could not endure so clear an invasion of their country, and gathering a force of Ottawas and Chippewas, now their allies, they attacked the stockade in June, 1752. At first they demanded of the Miamis the surrender of the fort, as they were the real cause of its location, having granted the English the privilege. The Miamis not only refused, but aided the British in the defense. In the battle that ensued, fourteen of the Miamis were slain, and all the traders captured. One account says they were burned, another, and probably the correct one, states that they were taken to Canada as prisoners of war. It is probable the traders were from Pennsylvania, as that commonwealth made the Miamis presents as condolence for their warriors that were slain.

Blood had now been shed. The opening gun of the French and Indian war had been fired, and both nations became more deeply interested in affairs in the West. The English were determined to secure additional title to the West, and, in 1752, sent Messrs. Fry, Lomax and Patton as commissioners to Logstown to treat with the Indians, and confirm the Lancaster treaty. They met the Indians on the 9th of June, stated their desires, and on the 11th received their answer. At first, the savages were not inclined to recognize the Lancaster treaty, but agreed to aid the English, as the French had already made war on the Twigtees (at Pickawillany), and consented to the establishment of a fort and trading-post at the forks of the Ohio. This was not all the Virginians wanted, however, and taking aside Andrew Montour, now chief of the Six Nations, persuaded him to use his influence with the red men. By such means, they were induced to treat, and on the 13th they all united in signing a deed, confirming the Lancaster treaty in its full extent, consenting to a settlement southwest of the Ohio, and covenanting that it should not be disturbed by them. By such means was obtained the treaty with the Indians in the Ohio Valley.

All this time, the home governments were endeavoring to out-manuever each other with regard to the lands in the West, though there the outlook only betokened war. The French understood better than the English how to manage the Indians, and succeeded in attaching them firmly to their cause. The English were not honest in their actions with them, and hence, in after years, the massacres that followed.

At the close of 1752, Gist was at work, in conformity with the Lancaster and Logstown treaties, laying out a fort and town on Chartier's Creek, about ten miles below the fork. Eleven families had crossed the mountains to settle at Gist's residence west of Laurel Hill, not far from the Youghiogheny. Goods had come from England for the Ohio Company, which were carried as far West as Will's Creek, where Cumberland now stands; and where they were taken by the Indians and traders.

On the other hand, the French were gathering cannon and stores on Lake Erie, and, without treaties or deeds of land, were gaining the good will of the inimical tribes, and preparing, when all was ready, to strike the blow. Their fortifications consisted of a chain of forts from Lake Erie to the Ohio, on the border. One was at Presque Isle, on the site of Erie; one on French Creek, on the site of Waterford, Penn.; one at the mouth of French Creek, in Venango County, Penn.; while opposite it was another, effectually commanding that section of country. These forts, it will be observed, were all in the limits of the Pennsylvania colony. The Governor informed the Assembly of their existence, who voted £600 to be used in purchasing presents for the Indians near the forts, and thereby hold their friendship. Virginia, also, took similar measures. Trent was sent, with guns and ammunition and presents, to the friendly tribes, and, while on his mission, learned of the plates of lead planted by the French. In October, 1753, a treaty was consummated with representatives of the Iroquois, Delawares, Shawanees, Twigtees and Wyandots, by commissioners from Pennsylvania, one of whom was the philosopher Franklin. At the conferences held at this time, the Indians complained of the actions of the French in forcibly taking possession of the disputed country, and also bitterly denounced them for using rum to intoxicate the red men, when they desired to gain any advantage. Not long after, they had similar grounds of complaint against the English, whose lawless traders cared for nothing but to gain the furs of the savage at as little expense as possible.

The encroachments of the French on what was regarded as English territory, created intense feeling in the colonies, especially in Virginia. The purpose of the French to inclose the English on the Atlantic Coast, and thus prevent their extension over the mountains, became more and more apparent, and it was thought that this was the opening of a scheme already planned by the French Court to reduce all North America under the dominion of France. Gov. Dinwiddie determined to send an ambassador to the French posts, to ascertain their real intentions and to observe the amount and disposition of their forces. He selected a young Virginian, then in his twenty-first year, a surveyor by trade and one well qualified for the duty. That young man afterward led the American Colonies in their struggle for liberty. George Washington and one companion, Mr. Gist, successfully made the trip, in the solitude of a severe winter, received assurance from the French commandant that they would by no means abandon their outposts, and would not yield unless compelled by force of arms. The commandant was exceedingly polite, but firm, and assured the young American that "we claim the country on the Ohio by virtue of the discovery of La Salle (in 1669) and will not give it up to the English. Our orders are to make prisoners of every Englishman found trading in the Ohio Valley."

During Washington's absence steps were taken to fortify the point formed by the junction of the Monongahela and Alleghany; and when, on his return, he met seventeen horses loaded with materials and stores for a fort at the forks of the Ohio, and, soon after, some families going out to settle, he knew the defense had begun. As soon as Washington made his report, Gov. Dinwiddie wrote to the Board of Trade, stating that the French were building a fort at Venango, and that, in March, twelve or fifteen hundred men would be ready to descend the river with their Indian allies, for which purpose three hundred canoes had been collected; and that Logstown was to be made headquarters, while forts were to be built in other places. He sent expresses to the Governors of Pennsylvania and New York, apprising them of the nature of affairs, and calling upon them for assistance. He also raised two companies, one of which was raised by Washington, the other by Trent. The one under Trent was to be raised on the frontiers, and was, as soon as possible, to repair to the Fork and erect there a fort, begun by the Ohio Company. Owing to various conflicting opinions between the Governor of Pennsylvania and his Assembly, and the conference with the Six Nations, held by New York, neither of those provinces put forth any vigorous measures until stirred to action by the invasions on the frontiers, and until directed by the Earl of Holderness, Secretary of State.

The fort at Venango was finished by the French in April, 1754. All along the creek resounded the clang of arms and the preparations for war. New York and Pennsylvania, though inactive, and debating whether the French really had invaded English territory or not, sent aid to the Old Dominion, now all alive to the conquest. The two companies had been increased to six; Washington was raised to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, and made second under command of Joshua Fry. Ten cannon, lately from England, were forwarded from Alexandria; wagons were got ready to carry westward provisions and stores through the heavy spring roads; and everywhere men were enlisting under the King's promise of two hundred thousand acres of land to those who would go. They were gathering along Will's Creek and far beyond, while Trent, who had come for more men and supplies, left a little band of forty-one men, working away in hunger and want at the Fork, to which both nations were looking with anxious eyes. Though no enemy was near, and only a few Indian scouts were seen, keen eyes had observed the low fortifications at the Fork. Swift feet had borne the news of it up the valley, and though Ensign Ward, left in command, felt himself secure, on the 17th of April he saw a sight that made his heart sick. Sixty batteaux and three hundred canoes were coming down the Alleghany. The commandant sent him a summons, which evaded no words in its meaning. It was useless to contend, that evening he supped with his conqueror; the next day he was bowed out by the polite Frenchman, and with his men and tools marched up the Monongahela. The first birds of spring were filling the air with their song; the rivers rolled by, swollen by April showers and melting snows; all nature was putting on her robes of green; and the fortress, which the English had so earnestly strived to obtain and fortify, was now in the hands of the French. Fort Du Quesne arose on the incomplete fortifications. The seven years' war that followed not only affected America, but spread to all quarters of the world. The war made England a great imperial power; drove the French from Asia and America; dispelled the brilliant and extended scheme of Louis and his voluptuous empire.

The active field of operations was in the Canadas principally, and along the western borders of Pennsylvania. There were so few people then in the present confines of Ohio, that only the possession of the country, in common with all the West, could be the animus of the conflict. It so much concerned this part of the New World, that a brief resumé of the war will be necessary to fully understand its history.

The fall of the post at the fork of the Ohio, Fort Du Quesne, gave the French control of the West. Washington went on with his few militia to retake the post. Though he was successful at first, he was in the end defeated, and surrendered, being allowed to return with all his munitions of war. The two governments, though trying to come to a peaceful solution of the question, were getting ready for the conflict. France went steadily on, though at one time England gave, in a measure, her consent to allow the French to retain all the country west of the Alleghanies and south of the lakes. Had this been done, what a different future would have been in America! Other destinies were at work, however, and the plan fell stillborn.

England sent Gen. Braddock and a fine force of men, who marched directly toward the post on the Ohio. His ill-fated expedition resulted only in the total defeat of his army, and his own death.

Washington saved a remnant of the army, and made his way back to the colonies. The English needed a leader. They next planned four campaigns; one against Fort Du Quesne; one against Crown Point; one against Niagara, and one against the French settlements in Nova Scotia. Nearly every one proved a failure. The English were defeated on sea and on land, all owing to the incapacity of Parliament, and the want of a suitable, vigorous leader. The settlements on the frontiers, now exposed to a cruel foe, prepared to defend themselves, and already the signs of a government of their own, able to defend itself, began to appear. They received aid from the colonies. Though the French were not repulsed, they and their red allies found they could not murder with impunity. Self-preservation was a stronger incentive in conflict than aggrandizement, and the cruelty of the Indians found avengers.

The great Pitt became Prime Minister June 29, 1757. The leader of the English now appeared. The British began to regain their losses on sea and land, and for them a brighter day was at hand. The key to the West must be retaken, and to Gen. Forbes was assigned the duty. Preceding him, a trusty man was sent to the Western Indians at the head-waters of the Ohio, and along the Monongahela and Alleghany, to see if some compromise with them could not be made, and their aid secured. The French had been busy through their traders inciting the Indians against the English. The lawless traders were another source of trouble. Caring nothing for either nation, they carried on a distressing traffic in direct violation of the laws, continually engendering ill-feeling among the natives. "Your traders," said one of them, "bring scarce anything but rum and flour. They bring little powder and lead, or other valuable goods. The rum ruins us. We beg you would prevent its coming in such quantities by regulating the traders. * * * These wicked whisky sellers, when they have got the Indians in liquor, make them sell the very clothes off their backs. If this practice be continued, we must be inevitably ruined. We most earnestly, therefore, beseech you to remedy it." They complained of the French traders the same way. They were also beginning to see the animus of the whole conflict. Neither power cared as much for them as for their land, and flattered and bullied by turns as served their purposes best.

The man selected to go upon this undertaking was Christian Frederic Post, a Moravian, who had lived among the Indians seventeen years, and married into one of their tribes. He was a missionary, and though obliged to cross a country whose every stream had been dyed by blood, and every hillside rung with the death-yell, and grown red with the light of burning huts, he went willingly on his way. Of his journey, sufferings and doings, his own journal tells the story. He left Philadelphia on the 15th of July, 1758, and on the 7th of August safely passed the French post at Venango, went on to Big Beaver Creek, where he held a conference with the chiefs of the Indians gathered there. It was decided that a great conference should be held opposite Fort Du Quesne, where there were Indians of eight nations. "We will bear you in our bosoms," said the natives, when Post expressed a fear that he might be delivered over to the French, and royally they fulfilled their promises. At the conference, it was made clear to Post that all the Western Indians were wavering in their allegiance to the French, owing largely to the failure of that nation to fulfill their promises of aid to prevent them from being deprived of their land by the Six Nations, and through that confederacy, by the English. The Indians complained bitterly, moreover, of the disposition of the whites in over-running and claiming their lands. "Why did you not fight your battles at home or on the sea, instead of coming into our country to fight them?" they asked again and again, and mournfully shook their heads when they thought of the future before them. "Your heart is good," said they to Post. "You speak sincerely; but we know there is always a great number who wish to get rich; they have enough; look! we do not want to be rich and take away what others have. The white people think we have no brains in our heads; that they are big, and we are a handful; but remember when you hunt for a rattlesnake, you cannot always find it, and perhaps it will turn and bite you before you see it."* When the war of Pontiac came, and all the West was desolated, this saying might have been justly remembered. After concluding a peace, Post set out for Philadelphia, and after incredible hardships, reached the settlement uninjured early in September. His mission had more to do than at first is apparent, in the success of the English. Had it not been for him, a second Braddock's defeat might have befallen Forbes, now on his way to subjugate Fort Du Quesne.

Through the heats of August, the army hewed its way toward the West. Early in September it reached Raystown, whither Washington had been ordered with his troops. Sickness had prevented him from being here already. Two officers were sent out to reconnoiter the fort, who returned and gave a very good account of its condition. Gen. Forbes desired to know more of it, and sent out Maj. Grant, with 800 men, to gain more complete knowledge. Maj. Grant, supposing not more than 200 soldiers to be in the fort, marched near it and made a feint to draw them out, and engage them in battle. He was greatly misinformed as to the strength of the French, and in the engagement that followed he was badly beaten—270 of his men killed, 42 wounded, and several, including himself, taken prisoners. The French, elated with their victory, attacked the main army, but were repulsed and obliged to retreat to the fort. The army continued on its march. On the 24th of November they reached Turtle Creek, where a council of war was held, and where Gen. Forbes, who had been so ill as to be carried on a litter from the start, declared, with a mighty oath, he would sleep that night in the fort, or in a worse place. The Indians had, however, carried the news to the French that the English were as plenty as the trees of the woods, and in their fright they set fire to the fort in the night and left up and down the Ohio River. The next morning the English, who had heard the explosion of the magazine, and seen the light of the burning walls, marched in and took peaceable possession. A small fortification was thrown up on the bank, and, in honor of the great English statesman, it was called Fort Pitt. Col. Hugh Mercer was left in command, and the main body of the army marched back to the settlements. It reached Philadelphia January 17, 1759. On the 11th of March, Gen. Forbes died, and was buried in the chancel of Christ's Church, in that city.

Post was now sent on a mission to the Six Nations, with a report of the treaty of Easton. He was again instrumental in preventing a coalition of the Indians and the French. Indeed, to this obscure Moravian missionary belongs, in a large measure, the honor of the capture of Fort Du Quesne, for by his influence had the Indians been restrained from attacking the army on its march.

The garrison, on leaving the fort, went up and down the Ohio, part to Presque Isle by land, part to Fort Venango, while some of them went on down the Ohio nearly to the Mississippi, and there, in what is now Massac County, Ill., erected a fort, called by them Fort Massac. It was afterward named by many Fort Massacre, from the erroneous supposition that a garrison had been massacred there.

The French, though deprived of the key to the West, went on preparing stores and ammunition, expecting to retake the fort in the spring. Before they could do this, however, other places demanded their attention.

The success of the campaign of 1758 opened the way for the consummation of the great scheme of Pitt—the complete reduction of Canada. Three expeditions were planned, by which Canada, already well nigh annihilated and suffering for food, was to be subjugated. On the west, Prideaux was to attack Niagara; in the center, Amherst was to advance on Ticonderoga and Crown Point; on the east, Wolfe was to besiege Quebec. All these points gained, the three armies were to be united in the center of the province.

Amherst appeared before Ticonderoga July 22. The French blew up their works, and retired to Crown Point. Driven from there, they retreated to Isle Aux Nois and entrenched themselves. The lateness of the season prevented further action, and Amherst went into winter quarters at Crown Point. Early in June, Wolfe appeared before Quebec with an army of 8,000 men. On the night of September 12, he silently ascended the river, climbed the heights of Abraham, a spot considered impregnable by the French, and on the summit formed his army of 5,000 men. Montcalm, the French commander, was compelled to give battle. The British columns, flushed with success, charged his half-formed lines, and dispersed them.

"They fly! they fly!" heard Wolfe, just as he expired from the effect of a mortal wound, though not till he had ordered their retreat cut off, and exclaimed, "Now, God be praised, I die happy." Montcalm, on hearing from the surgeon that death would come in a few hours, said, "I am glad of it. I shall not live to see the surrender of Quebec." At five the next morning he died happy.

Prideaux moved up Lake Ontario, and on the 6th of July invested Niagara. Its capture would cut off the French from the west, and every endeavor was made to hold it. Troops, destined to take the small garrison at Fort Pitt, were held to assist in raising the siege of Niagara. M. de Aubry, commandant in Illinois, came up with 400 men and 200,000 pounds of flour. Cut off by the abandonment of Fort Du Quesne from the Ohio route, he ascended that river as far as the Wabash, thence to portage of Fort Miami, or Fort Wayne, down the Maumee to Lake Erie, and on to Presqu'ville, or Presque Isle, over the portage to Le Bœuf, and thence down French Creek to Fort Venango. He was chosen to lead the expedition for the relief of Niagara. They were pursued by Sir William Johnson, successor to Prideaux, who had lost his life by the bursting of a cannon, and were obliged to flee. The next day Niagara, cut off from succor, surrendered.

All America rang with exultation. Towns were bright with illuminations; the hillsides shone with bonfires. From press, from pulpit, from platform, and from speakers' desks, went up one glad song of rejoicing. England was victorious everywhere. The colonies had done their full share, and now learned their strength. That strength was needed now, for ere long a different conflict raged on the soil of America—a conflict ending in the birth of a new nation.

The English sent Gen. Stanwix to fortify Fort Pitt, still looked upon as one of the principal fortresses in the West. He erected a good fortification there, which remained under British control fifteen years. Now nothing of the fort is left. No memorial of the British possession remains in the West but a single redoubt, built in 1764 by Col. Bouquet, outside of the fort. Even this can hardly now be said to exist.

The fall of Quebec did not immediately produce the submission of Canada. M. de Levi, on whom the command devolved, retired with the French Army to Montreal. In the spring of 1760, he besieged Quebec, but the arrival of an English fleet caused him to again retreat to Montreal.

Amherst and Johnson, meanwhile, effected a union of their forces, the magnitude of whose armies convinced the French that resistance would be useless, and on the 8th of September, M. de Vaudreuil, the Governor of Canada, surrendered Montreal, Quebec, Detroit, Mackinaw and all other posts in Canada, to the English commander-in-chief, Amherst, on condition that the French inhabitants should, during the war, be "protected in the full and free exercise of their religion, and the full enjoyment of their civil rights, leaving their future destinies to be decided by the treaty of peace."

Though peace was concluded in the New World, on the continent the Powers experienced some difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory settlement. It was finally settled by what is known in history as the "family compact." France and Spain saw in the conquest the growing power of England, and saw, also, that its continuance only extended that power. Negotiations were re-opened, and on the 3d of November, 1762, preliminaries were agreed to and signed, and afterward ratified in Paris, in February, 1763. By the terms of the compact, Spain ceded to Great Britain East and West Florida. To compensate Spain, France ceded to her by a secret article, all Louisiana west of the Mississippi.

The French and Indian war was now over. Canada and all its dependencies were now in possession of the English, who held undisputed sway over the entire West as far as Mississippi. It only remained for them to take possession of the outposts. Major Robert Rogers was sent to take possession of Detroit and establish a garrison there. He was a partisan officer on the borders of New Hampshire, where he earned a name for bravery, but afterward tarnished it by treasonable acts. On his way to Detroit, on the 7th of November, 1760, he was met by the renowned chief, Pontiac, who authoritatively commanded him to pause and explain his acts. Rogers replied by explaining the conquest of Canada, and that he was acting under orders from his King. Through the influence of Pontiac, the army was saved from the Indians sent out by the French, and was allowed to proceed on its way. Pontiac had assured his protection as long as the English treated him with due deference. Beletre, the commandant at Detroit, refused to surrender to the English commander, until he had received positive assurance from his Governor, Vaudreuil, that the country was indeed conquered. On the 29th of September, the colors of France gave way to the ensign of Great Britain amid the shouts of the soldiery and the astonishment of the Indians, whose savage natures could not understand how such a simple act declared one nation victors of another, and who wondered at the forbearance displayed. The lateness of the season prevented further operations, but early the next spring, Mackinaw, Green Bay, Ste. Marie, St. Joseph and the Outeuon surrounded, and nothing was left but the Illinois towns. These were secured as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made.

Though the English were now masters of the West, and had, while many of these events narrated were transpiring, extended their settlements beyond the Alleghanies, they were by no means secure in their possession. The woods and prairies were full of Indians, who, finding the English like the French, caring more for gain than the welfare of the natives, began to exhibit impatience and resentment as they saw their lands gradually taken from them. The English policy differed very materially from the French. The French made the Indian, in a measure, independent and taught him a desire for European goods. They also affiliated easily with them, and became thereby strongly endeared to the savage. The French were a merry, easy-going race, fond of gayety and delighting in adventure. The English were harsh, stern, and made no advances to gain the friendship of the savage. They wanted land to cultivate and drove away the Indian's game, and forced him farther west. "Where shall we go?" said the Indian, despondently; "you drive us farther and farther west; by and by you will want all the land." And the Anglo-Saxon went sturdily on, paying no heed to the complaints. The French traders incited the Indian to resent the encroachment. "The English will annihilate you and take all your land," said they. "Their father, the King of France, had been asleep, now he had awakened and was coming with a great army to reclaim Canada, that had been stolen from him while he slept."

Discontent under such circumstances was but natural. Soon all the tribes, from the mountains to the Mississippi, were united in a plot. It was discovered in 1761, and arrested. The next summer, another was detected and arrested. The officers, and all the people, failed to realize the danger. The rattlesnake, though not found, was ready to strike. It is only an Indian discontent, thought the people, and they went on preparing to occupy the country. They were mistaken—the crisis only needed a leader to direct it. That leader appeared.

CHAPTER IV.

PONTIAC'S CONSPIRACY—ITS FAILURE—BOUQUET'S EXPEDITION—OCCUPATION BY THE ENGLISH.

PONTIAC, the great chief of the Ottawas, was now about fifty years old. He had watched the conflict between the nations with a jealous eye, and as he saw the gradual growth of the English people, their encroachment on the lands of the Indians, their greed, and their assumption of the soil, his soul was stirred within him to do something for his people. He had been a true friend of the French, and had led the Indians at the defeat of Braddock. Amid all the tumult, he alone saw the true state of affairs. The English would inevitably crush out the Indians. To save his race he saw another alliance with the French was necessary, and a restoration of their power and habits needed. It was the plan of a statesman. It only failed because of the perfidy of the French. Maturing his plans late in the autumn of 1762, he sent messengers to all the Western and Southern tribes, with the black wampum and red tomahawk, emblems of war, from the great Pontiac. "On a certain day in the next year," said the messenger, "all the tribes are to rise, seize all the English posts, and then attack the whole frontier."

The great council of all the tribes was held at the river Ecorces, on the 27th of April, 1763. There, before the assembled chiefs, Pontiac delivered a speech, full of eloquence and art. He recounted the injuries and encroachments of the English, and disclosed their designs. The French king was now awake and would aid them. Should they resign their homes and the graves of their fathers without an effort? Were their young men no longer brave? Were they squaws? The Great Master of Life had chided them for their inactivity, and had sent his commands to drive the "Red Dogs" from the earth. The chiefs eagerly accepted the wampum and the tomahawk, and separated to prepare for the coming strife.

The post at Detroit was informed of the plot the evening before it was to occur, by an Ojibway girl of great beauty, the mistress of the commander, Major Gladwin. Pontiac was foiled here, his treachery discovered, and he was sternly ordered from the conference. A regular siege followed, but he could not prevail. He exhibited a degree of sagacity unknown in the annals of savage warfare, but all to no purpose; the English were too strong for him.

At all the other posts, save one, however, the plans of Pontiac were carried out, and atrocities, unheard of before in American history, resulted. The Indians attacked Detroit on the first of May, and, foiled in their plans, a siege immediately followed. On the 16th, a party of Indians appeared before the fort at Sandusky. Seven of them were admitted. Suddenly, while smoking, the massacre begins. All but Ensign Pauli, the commander, fall. He is carried as a trophy to Pontiac.

At the mouth of the St. Joseph's, the missionaries had maintained a mission station over sixty years. They gave way to an English garrison of fourteen soldiers and a few traders. On the morning of May 25, a deputation of Pottawatomies are allowed to enter. In less than two minutes, all the garrison but the commander are slain. He is sent to Pontiac.

Near the present city of Fort Wayne, Ind., at the junction of the waters, stood Fort Miami, garrisoned by a few men. Holmes, the commander, is asked to visit a sick woman. He is slain on the way, the sergeant following is made prisoner, and the nine soldiers surrender.

On the night of the last day of May, the wampum reaches the Indian village below La Fayette, Ind., and near Fort Outenon. The commander of the fort is lured into a cabin, bound, and his garrison surrender. Through the clemency of French settlers, they are received into their houses and protected.

At Michilimackinac, a game of ball is projected. Suddenly the ball is thrown through the gate of the stockade. The Indians press in, and, at a signal, almost all are slain or made prisoners.

The fort at Presque Isle, now Erie, was the point of communication between Pittsburgh and Niagara and Detroit. It was one of the most tenable, and had a garrison of four and twenty men. On the 22d of June, the commander, to save his forces from total annihilation, surrenders, and all are carried prisoners to Detroit.

The capitulation at Erie left Le Bœuf without hope. He was attacked on the 18th, but kept off the Indians till midnight, when he made a successful retreat. As they passed Venango, on their way to Fort Pitt, they saw only the ruins of that garrison. Not one of its inmates had been spared.

Fort Pitt was the most important station west of the Alleghanies. "Escape!" said Turtle's Heart, a Delaware warrior; "you will all be slain. A great army is coming." "There are three large English armies coming to my aid," said Ecuyer, the commander. "I have enough provisions and ammunition to stand a siege of three years' time." A second and third attempt was made by the savages to capture the post, but all to no avail. Baffled on all sides here, they destroy Ligonier, a few miles below, and massacre men, women and children. Fort Pitt was besieged till the last day of July, but withstood all attacks. Of all the outposts, only it and Detroit were left. All had been captured, and the majority of the garrison slain. Along the frontier, the war was waged with fury. The Indians were fighting for their homes and their hunting-grounds; and for these they fought with the fury and zeal of fanatics.

Detachments sent to aid Detroit are cut off. The prisoners are burnt, and Pontiac, infusing his zealous and demoniacal spirit into all his savage allies, pressed the siege with vigor. The French remained neutral, yet Pontiac made requisitions on them and on their neighbors in Illinois, issuing bills of credit on birch-bark, all of which were faithfully redeemed. Though these two posts could not be captured, the frontier could be annihilated, and vigorously the Indians pursued their policy. Along the borders of Pennsylvania and Virginia a relentless warfare was waged, sparing no one in its way. Old age, feeble infancy, strong man and gentle woman, fair girl and hopeful boy—all fell before the scalping-knife of the merciless savage. The frontiers were devastated. Thousands were obliged to flee, leaving their possessions to the torch of the Indian.

The colonial government, under British direction, was inimical to the borders, and the colonists saw they must depend only upon their own arms for protection. Already the struggle for freedom was upon them. They could defend only themselves. They must do it, too; for that defense is now needed in a different cause than settling disputes between rival powers. "We have millions for defense, but not a cent for tribute," said they, and time verified the remark.

Gen. Amherst bestirred himself to aid the frontiers. He sent Col. Henry Bouquet, a native of Switzerland, and now an officer in the English Army, to relieve the garrison at Fort Pitt. They followed the route made by Gen. Forbes, and on the way relieved Forts Bedford and Ligonier, both beleaguered by the Indians. About a day's journey beyond Ligonier, he was attacked by a body of Indians at a place called Bushy Run. For awhile, it seemed that he and all his army would be destroyed; but Bouquet was bold and brave and, under a feint of retreat, routed the savages. He passed on, and relieved the garrison at Fort Pitt, and thus secured it against the assaults of the Indians.

The campaign had been disastrous to the English, but fatal to the plans of Pontiac. He could not capture Detroit, and he knew the great scheme must fail. The battle of Bushy Run and the relief of Fort Pitt closed the campaign, and all hope of co-operation was at an end. Circumstances were combined against the confederacy, and it was fast falling to pieces. A proclamation was issued to the Indians, explaining to them the existing state of affairs, and showing to them the futility of their plans. Pontiac, however, would not give up. Again he renewed the siege of Detroit, and Gen. Gage, now in command of the army in the colonies, resolved to carry the war into their own country. Col. Bradstreet was ordered to lead one army by way of the lakes, against the Northern Indians, while Col. Bouquet was sent against the Indians of the Ohio. Col. Bradstreet went on his way at the head of 1,200 men, but trusting too much to the natives and their promises, his expedition proved largely a failure. He relieved Detroit in August, 1764, which had been confined in the garrison over fifteen months, and dispersed the Indians that yet lay around the fort. But on his way back, he saw how the Indians had duped him, and that they were still plundering the settlements. His treaties were annulled by Gage, who ordered him to destroy their towns. The season was far advanced, his provisions were getting low, and he was obliged to return to Niagara chagrined and disappointed.

Col. Bouquet knew well the character of the Indians, and shaped his plans accordingly. He had an army of 1,500 men, 500 regulars and 1,000 volunteers. They had had experience in fighting the savages, and could be depended on. At Fort Loudon, he heard of Bradstreet's ill luck, and saw through the deception practiced by the Indians. He arrived at Fort Pitt the 17th of September, where he arrested a deputation of chiefs, who met him with the same promises that had deceived Bradstreet. He sent one of their number back, threatening to put to death the chiefs unless they allowed his messengers to safely pass through their country to Detroit. The decisive tone of his words convinced them of the fate that awaited them unless they complied. On the 3d of October the army left Fort Pitt, marched down the river to and across the Tuscarawas, arriving in the vicinity of Fredrick Post's late mission on the 17th. There a conference was held with the assembled tribes. Bouquet sternly rebuked them for their faithlessness, and when told by the chiefs they could not restrain their young men, he as sternly told them they were responsible for their acts. He told them he would trust them no longer. If they delivered up all their prisoners within twelve days they might hope for peace, otherwise there would be no mercy shown them. They were completely humbled, and, separating hastily, gathered their captives. On the 25th, the army proceeded down to the Tuscarawas, to the junction with White Woman River, near the town of Coshocton, in Coshocton County, Ohio, and there made preparations for the reception of the captives. There they remained until the 18th of November; from day to day prisoners were brought in—men, women and children—and delivered to their friends. Many were the touching scenes enacted during this time. The separated husband and wife met, the latter often carrying a child born in captivity. Brothers and sisters, separated in youth, met; lovers rushed into each other's arms; children found their parents, mothers their sons, fathers their daughters, and neighbors those from whom they had been separated many years. Yet, there were many distressing scenes. Some looked in vain for long-lost relatives and friends, that never should return. Others, that had been captured in their infancy, would not leave their savage friends, and when force was used some fled away. One mother looked in vain for a child she had lost years before. Day by day, she anxiously watched, but no daughter's voice reached her ears. One, clad in savage attire, was brought before her. It could not be her daughter, she was grown. So was the maiden before her. "Can not you remember some mark?" asked Bouquet, whose sympathies were aroused in this case. "There is none," said the anxious and sorrowful mother. "Sing a song you sang over her cradle, she may remember," suggested the commander. One is sung by her mother. As the song of childhood floats out among the trees the maiden stops and listens, then approaches. Yes, she remembers. Mother and daughter are held in a close embrace, and the stern Bouquet wipes away a tear at the scene.

On the 18th, the army broke up its encampment and started on its homeward march. Bouquet kept six principal Indians as hostages, and returned to the homes of the captives. The Indians kept their promises faithfully, and the next year representatives of all the Western tribes met Sir William Johnson, at the German Flats, and made a treaty of peace. A tract of land in the Indian country was ceded to the whites for the benefit of those who had suffered in the late war. The Indians desired to make a treaty with Johnson, whereby the Alleghany River should be the western boundary of the English, but he excused himself on the ground of proper power.

Not long after this the Illinois settlements, too remote to know much of the struggle or of any of the great events that had convulsed an empire, and changed the destiny of a nation, were brought under the English rule. There were five villages at this date: Kaskaskia, Cahokia, St. Philip, Vincennes and Prairie du Rocher, near Fort Chartres, the military headquarters of these French possessions. They were under the control or command of M. de Abadie, at New Orleans. They had also extended explorations west of the Mississippi, and made a few settlements in what was Spanish territory. The country had been, however, ceded to France, and in February, 1764, the country was formally taken possession of and the present city of St. Louis laid out.

As soon as the French knew of the change of government, many of them went to the west side of the river, and took up their residence there. They were protected in their religion and civil rights by the terms of the treaty, but preferred the rule of their own King.

The British took possession of this country early in 1765. Gen. Gage sent Capt. Stirling, of the English Army, who arrived before summer, and to whom St. Ange, the nominal commandant, surrendered the authority. The British, through a succession of commanders, retained control of the country until defeated by George Rogers Clarke, and his "ragged Virginia militia."

After a short time, the French again ceded the country west of the Mississippi to Spain, and relinquished forever their control of all the West in the New World.

The population of Western Louisiana, when the exchange of governments occurred, was estimated to be 13,538, of which 891 were in the Illinois country—as it was called—west of the Mississippi. East of the river, and before the French crossed into Spanish country, the population was estimated to be about 3,000. All these had grown into communities of a peculiar character. Indeed, that peculiarity, as has been observed, never changed until a gradual amalgamation with the American people effected it, and that took more than a century of time to accomplish.

The English now owned the Northwest. True, they did not yet occupy but a small part of it, but traders were again crossing the mountains, explorers for lands were on the Ohio, and families for settlement were beginning to look upon the West as their future home. Companies were again forming to purchase large tracts in the Ohio country, and open them for emigration. One thing yet stood in the way—a definite boundary line. That line, however, was between the English and the Indians, and not, as had heretofore been the case, between rival European Powers. It was necessary to arrange some definite boundary before land companies, who were now actively pushing their claims, could safely survey and locate their lands.

Sir William Johnson, who had at previous times been instrumental in securing treaties, wrote repeatedly to the Board of Trade, who controlled the greater part of the commercial transactions in the colonies—and who were the first to exclaim against extending English settlements beyond a limit whereby they would need manufactures, and thereby become independent of the Mother Country—urging upon them, and through them the Crown, the necessity of a fixed boundary, else another Indian war was probable. The Indians found themselves gradually hemmed in by the growing power of the whites, and began to exhibit hostile feelings. The irritation became so great that in the summer of 1767, Gage wrote to the Governor of Pennsylvania concerning it. The Governor communicated his letter to the General Assembly, who sent representatives to England, to urge the immediate settlement of the question. In compliance with these requests, and the letters of prominent citizens, Franklin among the number, instructions were sent to Johnson, ordering him to complete the purchase from the Six Nations, and settle all differences. He sent word to all the Western tribes to meet him at Fort Stanwix, in October, 1768. The conference was held on the 24th of that month, and was attended by colonial representatives, and by Indians from all parts of the Northwest. It was determined that the line should begin on the Ohio, at the mouth of the Cherokee (Tennessee), thence up the river to the Alleghany and on to Kittanning, and thence across to the Susquehanna. By this line, the whole country south of the Ohio and Alleghany, to which the Six Nations had any claim, was transferred. Part of this land was made to compensate twenty-two traders, whose goods had been stolen in 1763. The deeds made, were upon the express agreement that no claims should ever be based on the treaties of Lancaster, Logstown, etc., and were signed by the chiefs of the Six Nations for themselves, their allies and dependents, and the Shawanees, Delawares, Mingoes of Ohio, and others; though the Shawanees and Delaware deputies did not sign them. On this treaty, in a great measure, rests the title by purchase to Kentucky, Western Virginia and Western Pennsylvania. The rights of the Cherokees were purchased by Col. Donaldson, either for the King, Virginia, or for himself, it is impossible to say which.

The grant of the northern confederacy was now made. The white man could go in and possess these lands, and know that an army would protect him if necessary. Under such a guarantee, Western lands came rapidly into market. In addition to companies already in existence for the purchase of land, others, the most notable of these being the "Walpole" and the "Mississippi" Land Companies, were formed. This latter had among its organizers such men as Francis Lightfoot Lee, Richard Henry Lee, George Washington and Arthur Lee. Before any of these companies, some of whom absorbed the Ohio Company, could do anything, the Revolution came on, and all land transactions were at an end. After its close, Congress would not sanction their claims, and they fell through. This did not deter settlers, however, from crossing the mountains, and settling in the Ohio country. In spite of troubles with the Indians—some of whom regarded the treaties with the Six Nations as unlawful, and were disposed to complain at the rapid influx of whites—and the failure of the land companies, settlers came steadily during the decade from 1768 to 1778, so that by the close of that time, there was a large population south of the Ohio River; while scattered along the northern banks, extending many miles into the wilderness, were hardy adventurers, who were carving out homes in the magnificent forests everywhere covering the country.

Among the foremost speculators in Western lands, was George Washington. As early as 1763, he employed Col. Crawford, afterward the leader in "Crawford's campaign," to purchase lands for him. In 1770, he crossed the mountains in company with several gentlemen, and examined the country along the Ohio, down which stream he passed to the mouth of the Great Kanawha, where he shot some buffalo, then plenty, camped out a few nights, and returned, fully convinced, it seems, that one day the West would be the best part of the New-World. He owned, altogether, nearly fifty thousand acres in the West, which he valued at $3.33 per acre. Had not the war of the Revolution just then broken out, he might have been a resident of the West, and would have been, of course, one of its most prominent citizens.

CHAPTER V.

AMERICAN EXPLORATIONS—DUNMORE'S WAR—CAMPAIGN OF GEORGE ROGERS CLARKE—LAND TROUBLES—SPAIN IN THE REVOLUTION—MURDER OF THE MORAVIAN INDIANS.

MEANWHILE, Kentucky was filling with citizens, and though considerable trouble was experienced with the Indians, and the operations of Col. Richard Henderson and others, who made unlawful treaties with the Indians, yet Daniel Boone and his associates had established a commonwealth, and, in 1777, a county was formed, which, ere long, was divided into three. Louisville was laid out on land belonging to Tories, and an important start made in this part of the West. Emigrants came down the Ohio River, saw the northern shores were inviting, and sent back such accounts that the land north of the river rapidly grew in favor with Eastern people.

One of the most important Western characters, Col. (afterward Gen.) George Rogers Clarke, had had much to do in forming its character. He was born November 19, 1752, in Albemarle County, Va., and early came West. He had an unusually sagacious spirit, was an excellent surveyor and general, and took an active interest in all State and national affairs. He understood the animus of the Revolution, and was prepared to do his part. Col. Clarke was now meditating a move unequalled in its boldness, and one that had more to do with the success of America in the struggle for independence than at first appears. He saw through the whole plan of the British, who held all the outposts, Kaskaskia, Detroit, Vincennes and Niagara, and determined to circumvent them and wrest the West from their power. The British hoped to encircle the Americans by these outposts, and also unite the Indians in a common war against them. That had been attempted by the French when the English conquered them. Then the French had a powerful ally in the person of Pontiac, yet the brave frontiersmen held their homes in many places, though the Indians "drank the blood of many a Briton, scooping it up in the hollow of joined hands." Now the Briton had no Pontiac to lead the scattered tribes—tribes who now feared the unerring aim of a settler, and would not attack him openly—Clarke knew that the Delawares were divided in feeling and that the Shawanees were but imperfectly united in favor of England since the murder of their noted chiefs. He was convinced that, if the British could be driven from the Western posts, the natives could easily be awed into submission, or bribed into neutrality or friendship. They admired, from their savage views of valor, the side that became victorious. They cared little for the cause for which either side was fighting. Clarke sent out spies among them to ascertain the feasibility of his plans. The spies were gone from April 20 to June 22, and fully corroborated his views concerning the English policy and the feelings of the Indians and French.

Before proceeding in the narrative of this expedition, however, it will be well to notice a few acts transpiring north of the Ohio River, especially relating to the land treaties, as they were not without effect on the British policy. Many of the Indians north and south of the Ohio would not recognize the validity of the Fort Stanwix treaty, claiming the Iroquois had no right to the lands, despite their conquest. These discontented natives harassed the emigrants in such a manner that many Indians were slain in retaliation. This, and the working of the French traders, who at all times were bitterly opposed to the English rule, filled the breasts of the natives with a malignant hate, which years of bloodshed could not wash out. The murder of several Indians by lawless whites fanned the coal into a blaze, and, by 1774, several retaliatory murders occurred, committed by the natives in revenge for their fallen friends. The Indian slew any white man he found, as a revenge on some friend of his slain; the frontiersman, acting on the same principle, made the borders extremely dangerous to invaders and invaded. Another cause of fear occurred about this time, which threatened seriously to retard emigration.

Pittsburgh had been claimed by both Pennsylvania and Virginia, and, in endeavoring to settle the dispute, Lord Dunmore's war followed. Dr. John Connelly, an ambitious, intriguing person, induced Lord Dunmore to assert the claims of Virginia, in the name of the King. In attempting to carry out his intentions, he was arrested by Arthur St. Clair, representing the proprietors of Pennsylvania, who was at Pittsburgh at the time. Connelly was released on bail, but went at once to Staunton, where he was sworn in as a Justice of Peace. Returning, he gathered a force of one hundred and fifty men, suddenly took possession of Pittsburgh, refused to allow the magistrates to enter the Court House, or to exercise the functions of their offices, unless in conformity to his will. Connelly refused any terms offered by the Pennsylvania deputies, kept possession of the place, acted very harshly toward the inhabitants, stirred up the neutral Indians, and, for a time, threatened to make the boundary line between the two colonies a very serious question. His actions led to hostile deeds by some Indians, when the whites, no doubt urged by him, murdered seven Indians at the mouth of the Captina River, and at the house of a settler named Baker, where the Indians were decoyed under promises of friendship and offers of rum. Among those murdered at the latter place, was the entire family of the famous Mingoe chief, Logan. This has been charged to Michael Cresap; but is untrue. Daniel Greathouse had command of the party, and though Cresap may have been among them, it is unjust to lay the blame at his feet. Both murders, at Captina and Yellow Creek, were cruel and unwarranted, and were, without doubt, the cause of the war that followed, though the root of the matter lay in Connelly's arbitrary actions, and in his needlessly alarming the Indians. Whatever may have been the facts in relation to the murder of Logan's family, they were of such a nature as to make all feel sure of an Indian war, and preparations were made for the conflict.

An army was gathered at Wheeling, which, some time in July, under command of Col. McDonald, descended the Ohio to the mouth of Captina Creek. They proposed to march against an Indian town on the Muskingum. The Indians sued for peace, but their pretensions being found spurious, their towns and crops were destroyed. The army then retreated to Williamsburg, having accomplished but little.

The Delawares were anxious for peace; even the Mingoes, whose relatives had been slain at Yellow Creek, and Captina, were restrained; but Logan, who had been turned to an inveterate foe to the Americans, came suddenly upon the Monongahela settlements, took thirteen scalps in revenge for the loss of his family, returned home and expressed himself ready to treat with the Long Knives, the Virginians. Had Connelly acted properly at this juncture, the war might have been ended; but his actions only incensed both borderers and Indians. So obnoxious did he become that Lord Dunmore lost faith in him, and severely reprimanded him.

To put a stop to the depredations of the Indians, two large bodies of troops were gathered in Virginia, one under Gen. Andrew Lewis, and one under command of Dunmore himself. Before the armies could meet at the mouth of the Great Kanawha, their objective point, Lewis' army, which arrived first, was attacked by a furious band of Delawares, Shawanees, Iroquois and Wyandots. The conflict was bitterly prolonged by the Indians, who, under the leadership of Cornstalk, were determined to make a decisive effort, and fought till late at night (October 10, 1774), and then only by a strategic move of Lewis' command—which resulted in the defeat of the Indians, compelling them to cross the Ohio—was the conflict ended. Meanwhile, Dunmore's army came into the enemy's country, and, being joined by the remainder of Lewis' command, pressed forward intending to annihilate the Indian towns. Cornstalk and his chiefs, however, sued for peace, and the conflict closed. Dunmore established a camp on Sippo Creek, where he held conferences with the natives and concluded the war. When he left the country, he stationed 100 men at the mouth of the Great Kanawha, a few more at Pittsburgh, and another corps at Wheeling, then called Fort Fincastle. Dunmore intended to return to Pittsburgh the next spring, meet the Indians and form a definite peace; but the revolt of the colonies prevented. However, he opened several offices for the sale of lands in the West, some of which were in the limits of the Pennsylvania colony. This led to the old boundary dispute again; but before it could be settled, the Revolution began, and Lord Dunmore's, as well as almost all other land speculations in the West, were at an end.

In 1775 and 1776, the chief events transpiring in the West relate to the treaties with the Indians, and the endeavor on the part of the Americans to have them remain neutral in the family quarrel now coming on, which they could not understand. The British, like the French, however, could not let them alone, and finally, as a retaliatory measure, Congress, under advice of Washington, won some of them over to the side of the colonies, getting their aid and holding them neutral. The colonies only offered them rewards for prisoners; never, like the British, offering rewards for scalps. Under such rewards, the atrocities of the Indians in some quarters were simply horrible. The scalp was enough to get a reward, that was a mark of Indian valor, too, and hence, helpless innocence and decrepit old age were not spared. They stirred the minds of the pioneers, who saw the protection of their firesides a vital point, and led the way to the scheme of Col. Clarke, who was now, as has been noted, the leading spirit in Kentucky. He saw through the scheme of the British, and determined, by a quick, decisive blow, to put an end to it, and to cripple their power in the West.

Among the acts stimulating Clarke, was the attack on Fort Henry, a garrison about one-half mile above Wheeling Creek, on the Ohio, by a renegade white man, Simon Girty, an agent in the employ of the British, it is thought, and one of the worst wretches ever known on the frontier. When Girty attacked Fort Henry, he led his red allies in regular military fashion, and attacked it without mercy. The defenders were brave, and knew with whom they were contending. Great bravery was displayed by the women in the fort, one of whom, a Miss Zane, carried a keg of gunpowder from a cabin to the fort. Though repeatedly fired at by the savages, she reached the fort in safety. After awhile, however, the effect of the frontiersmen's shots began to be felt, and the Indians sullenly withdrew. Re-enforcements coming, the fort was held, and Girty and his band were obliged to flee.

Clarke saw that if the British once got control over the Western Indians the scene at Fort Henry would be repeated, and would not likely, in all cases, end in favor of the Americans. Without communicating any of his designs, he left Harrodsburg about the 1st of October, 1777, and reached the capital of Virginia by November 5. Still keeping his mind, he awaited a favorable opportunity to broach his plans to those in power, and, in the meanwhile, carefully watched the existing state of feeling. When the opportunity came, Clarke broached his plans to Patrick Henry, Governor of Virginia, who at once entered warmly into them, recognizing their great importance.

Through his aid, Clarke procured the necessary authority to prosecute his plans, and returned at once to Pittsburgh. He intended raising men about this post, but found them fearful of leaving their homes unprotected. However, he secured three companies, and, with these and a number of volunteers, picked up on the way down the Ohio River, he fortified Corn Island, near the falls, and made ready for his expedition. He had some trouble in keeping his men, some of those from Kentucky refusing to aid in subduing stations out of their own country. He did not announce his real intentions till he had reached this point. Here Col. Bowman joined him with his Kentucky militia, and, on the 24th of June, 1778, during a total eclipse of the sun, the party left the fort. Before his start, he learned of the capture of Burgoyne, and, when nearly down to Fort Massac, he met some of his spies, who informed him of the exaggerated accounts of the ferocity of the Long Knives that the French had received from the British. By proper action on his part, Clarke saw both these items of information could be made very beneficial to him. Leaving the river near Fort Massac, he set out on the march to Kaskaskia, through a hot summer's sun, over a country full of savage foes. They reached the town unnoticed, on the evening of July 4, and, before the astonished British and French knew it, they were all prisoners. M. Rocheblave, the English commander, was secured, but his wife adroitly concealed the papers belonging to the garrison. In the person of M. Gibault, the French priest, Clarke found a true friend. When the true character of the Virginians became apparent, the French were easily drawn to the American side, and the priest secured the surrender and allegiance of Cahokia through his personal influence. M. Gibault told him he would also secure the post at St. Vincent's, which he did, returning from the mission about the 1st of August. During the interval, Clarke re-enlisted his men, formed his plans, sent his prisoners to Kentucky, and was ready for future action when M. Gibault arrived. He sent Capt. Helm and a single soldier to Vincennes to hold that fort until he could put a garrison there. It is but proper to state that the English commander, Col. Hamilton, and his band of soldiers, were absent at Detroit when the priest secured the village on the "Ouabache." When Hamilton returned, in the autumn, he was greatly surprised to see the American flag floating from the ramparts of the fort, and when approaching the gate he was abruptly halted by Capt. Helm, who stood with a lighted fuse in his hand by a cannon, answering Hamilton's demand to surrender with the imperative inquiry, "Upon what terms, sir?" "Upon the honors of war," answered Hamilton, and he marched in greatly chagrined to see he had been halted by two men. The British commander sat quietly down, intending to go on down the river and subdue Kentucky in the spring, in the mean time offering rewards for American scalps, and thereby gaining the epithet "Hair-buyer General." Clarke heard of his actions late in January, 1779, and, as he says, "I knew if I did not take him he would take me," set out early in February with his troops and marched across the marshy plains of Lower Illinois, reaching the Wabash post by the 22d of that month. The unerring aim of the Westerner was effectual. "They will shoot your eyes out," said Helm to the British troops. "There, I told you so," he further exclaimed, as a soldier ventured near a port-hole and received a shot directly in his eye. On the 24th the fort surrendered. The American flag waved again over its ramparts. The "Hair-buyer General" was sent a prisoner to Virginia, where he was kept in close confinement for his cruel acts. Clarke returned to Kaskaskia, perfected his plans to hold the Illinois settlements, went on to Kentucky, from where he sent word to the colonial authorities of the success of his expedition. Had he received the aid promised him, Detroit, in easy reach, would have fallen too, but Gen. Green, failing to send it as promised, the capture of that important post was delayed.

Had Clarke failed, and Hamilton succeeded, the whole West would have been swept, from the Alleghamies to the Mississippi. But for this small army of fearless Virginians, the union of all the tribes from Georgia to Maine against the colonies might have been effected, and the whole current of American history changed. America owes Clarke and his band more than it can ever pay. Clarke reported the capture of Kaskaskia and the Illinois country early after its surrender, and in October the county of Illinois was established, extending over an unlimited expanse of country, by the Virginia Legislature. John Todd was appointed Lieutenant Colonel and Civil Governor. In November, Clarke and his men received the thanks of the same body, who, in after years, secured them a grant of land, which they selected on the right bank of the Ohio River, opposite Louisville. They expected here a city would rise one day, to be the peer of Louisville, then coming into prominence as an important place. By some means, their expectations failed, and only the dilapidated village of Clarkesburg perpetuates their hopes.

The conquest of Clarke changed the face of affairs in relation to the whole country north of the Ohio River, which would, in all probability, have been made the boundary between Canada and the United States. When this was proposed, the strenuous arguments based on this conquest, by the American Commissioners, secured the present boundary line in negotiating the treaty of 1793.

Though Clarke had failed to capture Detroit, Congress saw the importance of the post, and resolved on securing it. Gen. McCosh, commander at Fort Pitt, was put in command, and $1,000,000 and 3,000 men placed at his disposal. By some dilatory means, he got no further than the Tuscarawas River, in Ohio, where a half-way house, called Fort Laurens, for the President of Congress, was built. It was too far out to be of practicable value, and was soon after abandoned.

Indian troubles and incursions by the British were the most absorbing themes in the West. The British went so far as Kentucky at a later date, while they intended reducing Fort Pitt, only abandoning it when learning of its strength. Expeditions against the Western Indians were led by Gen. Sullivan, Col. Daniel Broadhead, Col. Bowman and others, which, for awhile, silenced the natives and taught them the power of the Americans. They could not organize so readily as before, and began to attach themselves more closely to the British, or commit their depredations in bands, fleeing into the wilderness as soon as they struck a blow. In this way, several localities suffered, until the settlers became again exasperated; other expeditions were formed, and a second chastisement given. In 1781, Col. Broadhead led an expedition against the Central Ohio Indians. It did not prove so successful, as the Indians were led by the noted chief Brant, who, though not cruel, was a foe to the Americans, and assisted the British greatly in their endeavors to secure the West.

Another class of events occurred now in the West, civil in their relations, yet destined to form an important part of its history—its land laws.

It must be borne in mind, that Virginia claimed the greater portion of the country north of the Ohio River, as well as a large part south. The other colonies claimed land also in the West under the old Crown grants, which extended to the South or Western Sea. To more complicate matters, several land companies held proprietary rights to portions of these lands gained by grants from the Crown, or from the Colonial Assemblies. Others were based on land warrants issued in 1763; others on selection and survey and still others on settlement. In this state of mixed affairs, it was difficult to say who held a secure claim. It was a question whether the old French grants were good or not, especially since the change in government, and the eminent prospect of still another change. To, in some way, aid in settling these claims, Virginia sent a commission to the West to sit as a court and determine the proprietorship of these claims. This court, though of as doubtful authority as the claims themselves, went to work in Kentucky and along the Ohio River in 1779, and, in the course of one year, granted over three thousand certificates. These were considered as good authority for a definite title, and were so regarded in after purchases. Under them, many pioneers, like Daniel Boone, lost their lands, as all were required to hold some kind of a patent, while others, who possessed no more principle than "land-sharks" of to-day, acquired large tracts of land by holding a patent the court was bound to accept. Of all the colonies, Virginia seemed to have the best title to the Northwest, save a few parcels, such as the Connecticut or Western Reserve and some similar tracts held by New York, Massachusetts and New Jersey. When the territory of the Northwest was ceded to the General Government, this was recognized, and that country was counted as a Virginia county.

The Spanish Government, holding the region west of the Mississippi, and a portion east toward its outlet, became an important but secret ally of the Americans. When the French revolt was suppressed by O'Reilly, and the Spanish assumed the government of Louisiana, both Upper and Lower, there was a large tract of country, known as Florida (East and West), claimed by England, and duly regarded as a part of her dominion. The boundaries had been settled when the French first occupied Lower Louisiana. The Spaniards adopted the patriarchal form of rule, as much as was consistent with their interests, and allowed the French full religious and civil liberty, save that all tribunals were after the Spanish fashion, and governed by Spanish rules. The Spaniards, long jealous of England's growing power, secretly sent the Governors of Louisiana word to aid the Americans in their struggle for freedom. Though they controlled the Mississippi River, they allowed an American officer (Capt. Willing) to descend the river in January, 1778, with a party of fifty men, and ravage the British shore from Manchey Bayou to Natchez.

On the 8th of May, 1779, Spain declared war against Great Britain; and, on the 8th of July, the people of Louisiana were allowed to take a part in the war. Accordingly, Galvez collected a force of 1,400 men, and, on the 7th of September, took Fort Manchac. By the 21st of September, he had taken Baton Rouge and Natchez. Eight vessels were captured by the Spaniards on the Mississippi and on the lakes. In 1780 Mobile fell; in March, 1781, Pensacola, the chief British post in West Florida, succumbed after a long siege, and, on the 9th of May, all West Florida was surrendered to Spain.

This war, or the war on the Atlantic Coast, did not immediately affect Upper Louisiana. Great Britain, however, attempted to capture St. Louis. Though the commander was strongly suspected of being bribed by the English, yet the place stood the siege from the combined force of Indians and Canadians, and the assailants were dispersed. This was done during the summer of 1680, and in the autumn, a company of Spanish and French residents, under La Balme, went on an expedition against Detroit. They marched as far north as the British trading-post Ke-ki-ong-a, at the head of the Maumee River, but being surprised in the night, and the commander slain, the expedition was defeated, having done but little.

Spain may have had personal interests in aiding the Americans. She was now in control of the Mississippi River, the natural outlet of the Northwest, and, in 1780, began the troubles relative to the navigation of that stream. The claims of Spain were considered very unjust by the Continental Congress, and, while deliberating over the question, Virginia, who was jealously alive to her Western interests, and who yet held jurisdiction over Kentucky, sent through Jefferson, the Governor, Gen. George Rogers Clarke, to erect a fort below the mouth of the Ohio. This proceeding was rather unwarrantable, especially as the fort was built in the country of the Chickasaws, who had thus far been true friends to the Americans, and who looked upon the fort as an innovation on their territory. It was completed and occupied but a short time, Clarke being recalled.

Virginia, in 1780, did a very important thing; namely, establishing an institution for higher education. The Old Dominion confiscated the lands of "Robert McKenzie, Henry Collins and Alexander McKee, Britons, eight thousand acres," and invested the proceeds of the sale in a public seminary. Transylvania University now lives, a monument to that spirit.

While Clarke was building Fort Jefferson, a force of British and Indians, under command of Capt. Bryd, came down from Canada and attacked the Kentucky settlements, getting into the country before any one was aware. The winter before had been one of unusual severity, and game was exceedingly scarce, hence the army was not prepared to conduct a campaign. After the capture of Ruddle's Station, at the south fork of the Licking, Bryd abandoned any further attempts to reduce the settlements, except capturing Martin's Station, and returned to Detroit.

This expedition gave an additional motive for the chastisement of the Indians, and Clarke, on his return from Fort Jefferson, went on an expedition against the Miami Indians. He destroyed their towns at Loramie's store, near the present city of Sydney, Ohio, and at Piqua, humbling the natives. While on the way, a part of the army remained on the north bank of the Ohio, and erected two block-houses on the present site of Cincinnati.

The exploits of Clarke and his men so effectually chastised the Indians, that, for a time, the West was safe. During this period of quiet, the measures which led to the cession of Western lands to the General Government, began to assume a definite form. All the colonies claiming Western lands were willing to cede them to the Government, save Virginia, which colony wanted a large scope of Southern country southeast of the Ohio, as far as South Carolina. All recognized the justice of all Western lands becoming public property, and thereby aiding in extinguishing the debts caused by the war of the Revolution, now about to close. As Virginia held a somewhat different view, the cession was not made until 1783.

The subject, however, could not be allowed to rest. The war of the Revolution was now drawing to a close; victory on the part of the colonies was apparent, and the Western lands must be a part of the public domain. Subsequent events brought about the desired cession, though several events transpired before the plan of cession was consummated.

Before the close of 1780, the Legislature of Virginia passed an act, establishing the "town of Louisville," and confiscated the lands of John Connelly, who was one of its original proprietors, and who distinguished himself in the commencement of Lord Dunmore's war, and who was now a Tory, and doing all he could against the patriot cause. The proceeds of the sale of his lands were divided between Virginia and the county of Jefferson. Kentucky, the next year, was divided into three counties, Jefferson, Lincoln and Fayette. Courts were appointed in each, and the entry and location of lands given into their hands. Settlers, in spite of Indian troubles and British intrigue, were pouring over the mountains, particularly so during the years 1780 and 1781. The expeditions of Clarke against the Miami Indians; Boone's captivity, and escape from them; their defeat when attacking Boonesboro, and other places—all combined to weaken their power, and teach them to respect a nation whose progress they could not stay.

The pioneers of the West, obliged to depend on themselves, owing to the struggle of the colonies for freedom, grew up a hardy, self-reliant race, with all the vices and virtues of a border life, and with habits, manners and customs necessary to their peculiar situation, and suited to their peculiar taste. A resume of their experiences and daily lives would be quite interesting, did the limits of this history admit it here. In the part relating directly to this county, the reader will find such lives given; here, only the important events can be noticed.

The last event of consequence occurring in the West before the close of the Revolution, is one that might well have been omitted. Had such been the case, a great stain would have been spared the character of Western pioneers. Reference is made to the massacre of the Moravian Christian Indians.

These Indians were of the Delaware nation chiefly, though other Western tribes were visited and many converts made. The first converts were made in New York and Connecticut, where, after a good start had been made, and a prospect of many souls being saved, they incurred the enmity of the whites, who, becoming alarmed at their success, persecuted them to such an extent that they were driven out of New York into Pennsylvania, where, in 1744, four years after their arrival in the New World, they began new missions. In 1748, the New York and Connecticut Indians followed their teachers, and were among the founders of Friedenshutzen, "Tents of Peace," a hamlet near Bethlehem, where their teachers were stationed. Other hamlets grew around them, until in the interior of the colony, existed an Indian community, free from all savage vices, and growing up in Christian virtues. As their strength grew, lawless whites again began to oppress them. They could not understand the war of 1754, and were, indeed, in a truly embarrassing position. The savages could form no conception of any cause for neutrality, save a secret sympathy with the English; and if they could not take up the hatchet, they were in the way, and must be removed. Failing to do this, their red brothers became hostile. The whites were but little better. The old suspicions which drove them from New York were aroused. They were secret Papists, in league with the French, and furnished them with arms and intelligence; they were interfering with the liquor traffic; they were enemies to the Government, and the Indian and the white man combined against them. They were obliged to move from place to place; were at one time protected nearly a year, near Philadelphia, from lawless whites, and finally were compelled to go far enough West to be out of the way of French and English arms, or the Iroquois and Cherokee hatchets. They came finally to the Muskingum, where they made a settlement called Schonbrun, "beautiful clear spring," in what is now Tuscarawas County. Other settlements gathered, from time to time, as the years went on, till in 1772 large numbers of them were within the borders of the State.

Until the war of independence broke out, they were allowed to peacefully pursue their way. When that came, they were between Fort Pitt and Detroit, one of which contained British, the other Americans. Again they could not understand the struggle, and could not take up the hatchet. This brought on them the enmity of both belligerent parties, and that of their own forest companions, who could not see wherein their natures could change. Among the most hostile persons, were the white renegades McKee, Girty and Elliott. On their instigation, several of them were slain, and by their advice they were obliged to leave their fields and homes, where they had many comforts, and where they had erected good chapels in which to worship. It was just before one of these forced removals that Mary, daughter of the missionary Heckewelder, was born. She is supposed to be the first white female child born north of the Ohio River. Her birth occurred April 16, 1781. It is but proper to say here, that it is an open question, and one that will probably never be decided, i. e. Who was the first white child born in Ohio? In all probability, the child was born during the captivity of its mother, as history plainly shows that when white women were released from the Indians, some of them carried children born while among the natives.

When the Moravians were forced to leave their settlements on the Muskingum, and taken to Sandusky, they left growing fields of corn, to which they were obliged to return, to gather food. This aroused the whites, only wanting some pretext whereby they might attack them, and a party, headed by Col. David Williamson, determined to exterminate them. The Moravians, hearing of their approach, fled, but too late to warn other settlements, and Gnadenhutten, Salem and one or two smaller settlements, were surprised and taken. Under deceitful promises, the Indians gave up all their arms, showed the whites their treasures, and went unknowingly to a terrible death. When apprised of their fate, determined on by a majority of the rangers, they begged only time to prepare. They were led two by two, the men into one, the women and children into another "slaughter-house," as it was termed, and all but two lads were wantonly slain. An infamous and more bloody deed never darkened the pages of feudal times; a deed that, in after years, called aloud for vengeance, and in some measure received it. Some of Williamson's men wrung their hands at the cruel fate, and endeavored, by all the means in their power, to prevent it; but all to no purpose. The blood of the rangers was up, and they would not spare "man, woman or child, of all that peaceful band."

Having completed their horrible work, (March 8, 1782), Williamson and his men returned to Pittsburgh. Everywhere, the Indians lamented the untimely death of their kindred, their savage relatives determining on their revenge; the Christian ones could only be resigned and weep.

Williamson's success, for such it was viewed by many, excited the borderers to another invasion, and a second army was raised, this time to go to the Sandusky town, and annihilate the Wyandots. Col. William Crawford was elected leader; he accepted reluctantly; on the way, the army was met by hordes of savages on the 5th of June, and totally routed. They were away north, in what is now Wyandot County, and were obliged to flee for their lives. The blood of the murdered Moravians called for revenge. The Indians desired it; were they not relatives of the fallen Christians? Crawford and many of his men fell into their hands; all suffered unheard-of tortures, that of Crawford being as cruel as Indian cruelty could devise. He was pounded, pierced, cut with knives and burned, all of which occupied nearly three hours, and finally lay down insensible on a bed of coals, and died. The savage captors, in demoniacal glee, danced around him, and upbraided him for the cruel murder of their relatives, giving him this only consolation, that had they captured Williamson, he might go free, but he must answer for Williamson's brutality.

The war did not cease here. The Indians, now aroused, carried their attack as far south as into Kentucky, killing Capt. Estill, a brave man, and some of his companions. The British, too, were active in aiding them, and the 14th of August a large force of them, under Girty, gathered silently about Bryant's Station. They were obliged to retreat. The Kentuckians pursued them, but were repulsed with considerable loss.

The attack on Bryant's Station aroused the people of Kentucky to strike a blow that would be felt. Gen. Clarke was put at the head of an army of one thousand and fifty men, and the Miami country was a second time destroyed. Clarke even went as far north as the British trading-post at the head of the Miami, where he captured a great amount of property, and destroyed the post. Other outposts also fell, the invading army suffering but little, and, by its decisive action, practically closing the Indian wars in the West. Pennsylvania suffered some, losing Hannahstown and one or two small settlements. Williamson's and Crawford's campaigns aroused the fury of the Indians that took time and much blood and war to subdue. The Revolution was, however, drawing to a close. American arms were victorious, and a new nation was now coming into existence, who would change the whole current of Western matters, and make of the Northwest a land of liberty, equality and union. That nation was now on the stage.

CHAPTER VI.

AMERICAN OCCUPATION—INDIAN CLAIMS—SURVEYS—EARLY LAND COMPANIES—COMPACT OF 1787—ORGANIZATION OF THE TERRITORY—EARLY AMERICAN SETTLEMENTS IN THE OHIO VALLEY—FIRST TERRITORIAL OFFICERS—ORGANIZATION OF COUNTIES.

THE occupation of the West by the American, really dates from the campaign of Gen. Clarke in 1778, when he captured the British posts in the Illinois country, and Vincennes on the Wabash. Had he been properly supported, he would have reduced Detroit, then in easy reach, and poorly defended. As it was, however, that post remained in charge of the British till after the close of the war of the Revolution. They also held other lake posts; but these were included in the terms of peace, and came into the possession of the Americans. They were abandoned by the British as soon as the different commanders received notice from their chiefs, and British rule and English occupation ceased in that part of the New World.

The war virtually closed by the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Va., October 19, 1781. The struggle was prolonged, however, by the British, in the vain hope that they could retrieve the disaster, but it was only a useless waste of men and money. America would not be subdued. "If we are to be taxed, we will be represented," said they, "else we will be a free government, and regulate our own taxes." In the end, they were free.

Provisional articles of peace between the United States and Great Britain were signed in Paris on the 30th of November, 1782. This was followed by an armistice negotiated at Versailles on the 20th of January, 1783; and finally, a definite treaty of peace was concluded at Paris on the 3d of the next September, and ratified by Congress on the 4th of January, 1784. By the second article of the definite treaty of 1783, the boundaries of the United States were fixed. A glance at the map of that day shows the boundary to have been as follows: Beginning at Passamaquoddy Bay, on the coast of Maine, the line ran north a little above the forty-fifth parallel of latitude, when it diverged southwesterly, irregularly, until it reached that parallel, when it followed it until it reached the St. Lawrence River. It followed that river to Lake Ontario, down its center; up the Niagara River; through Lake Erie, up the Detroit River and through Lakes Huron and Superior, to the northwest extremity of the latter. Then it pursued another irregular western course to the Lake of the Woods, when it turned southward to the Mississippi River. The commissioners insisted that should be the western boundary, as the lakes were the northern. It followed the Mississippi south until the mouth of Red River was reached, when, turning east, it followed almost a direct line to the Atlantic Coast, touching the coast a little north of the outlet of St. John's River.

From this outline, it will be readily seen what boundary the United States possessed. Not one-half of its present domain.

At this date, there existed the original thirteen colonies: Virginia occupying all Kentucky and all the Northwest, save about half of Michigan and Wisconsin, claimed by Massachusetts; and the upper part of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and the lower part (a narrow strip) of Michigan, claimed by Connecticut. Georgia included all of Alabama and Mississippi. The Spaniards claimed all Florida and a narrow part of lower Georgia. All the country west of the Father of Waters belonged to Spain, to whom it had been secretly ceded when the family compact was made. That nation controlled the Mississippi, and gave no small uneasiness to the young government. It was, however, happily settled finally, by the sale of Louisiana to the United States.

Pending the settlement of these questions and the formation of the Federal Union, the cession of the Northwest by Virginia again came before Congress. That body found itself unable to fulfill its promises to its soldiers regarding land, and again urged the Old Dominion to cede the Territory to the General Government, for the good of all. Congress forbade settlers from occupying the Western lands till a definite cession had been made, and the title to the lands in question made good. But speculation was stronger than law, and without waiting for the slow processes of courts, the adventurous settlers were pouring into the country at a rapid rate, only retarded by the rifle and scalping-knife of the savage—a temporary check. The policy of allowing any parties to obtain land from the Indians was strongly discouraged by Washington. He advocated the idea that only the General Government could do that, and, in a letter to James Duane, in Congress, he strongly urged such a course, and pointed out the danger of a border war, unless some such measure was stringently followed.

Under the circumstances, Congress pressed the claims of cession upon Virginia, and finally induced the Dominion to modify the terms proposed two years before. On the 20th of December, 1783, Virginia accepted the proposal of Congress, and authorized her delegates to make a deed to the United States of all her right in the territory northwest of the Ohio.

The Old Dominion stipulated in her deed of cession, that the territory should be divided into States, to be admitted into the Union as any other State, and to bear a proportionate share in the maintenance of that Union; that Virginia should be re-imburshed for the expense incurred in subduing the British posts in the territory; that the French and Canadian inhabitants should be protected in their rights; that the grant to Gen. George Rogers Clarke and his men, as well as all other similar grants, should be confirmed, and that the lands should be considered as the common property of the United States, the proceeds to be applied to the use of the whole country. Congress accepted these conditions, and the deed was made March 1, 1784. Thus the country came from under the dominion of Virginia, and became common property.

A serious difficulty arose about this time, that threatened for awhile to involve England and America anew in war. Virginia and several other States refused to abide by that part of the treaty relating to the payment of debts, especially so, when the British carried away quite a number of negroes claimed by the Americans. This refusal on the part of the Old Dominion and her abettors, caused the English to retain her Northwestern outposts, Detroit, Mackinaw, etc. She held these till 1786, when the questions were finally settled, and then readily abandoned them.

The return of peace greatly augmented emigration to the West, especially to Kentucky. When the war closed, the population of that county (the three counties having been made one judicial district, and Danville designated as the seat of government) was estimated to be about twelve thousand. In one year, after the close of the war, it increased to 30,000, and steps for a State government were taken. Owing to the divided sentiment among its citizens, its perplexing questions of land titles and proprietary rights, nine conventions were held before a definite course of action could be reached. This prolonged the time till 1792, when, in December of that year, the election for persons to form a State constitution was held, and the vexed and complicated questions settled. In 1783, the first wagons bearing merchandise came across the mountains. Their contents were received on flat-boats at Pittsburgh, and taken down the Ohio to Louisville, which that spring boasted of a store, opened by Daniel Broadhead. The next year, James Wilkinson opened one at Lexington.

Pittsburgh was now the principal town in the West. It occupied the same position regarding the outposts that Omaha has done for several years to Nebraska. The town of Pittsburgh was laid out immediately after the war of 1764, by Col. Campbell. It then consisted of four squares about the fort, and received its name from that citadel. The treaty with the Six Nations in 1768, conveyed to the proprietaries of Pennsylvania all the lands of the Alleghany below Kittanning, and all the country south of the Ohio, within the limits of Penn's charter. This deed of cession was recognized when the line between Pennsylvania and Virginia was fixed, and gave the post to the Keystone State. In accordance with this deed, the manor of Pittsburgh was withdrawn from market in 1769, and was held as the property of the Penn family. When Washington visited it in 1770, it seems to have declined in consequence of the afore-mentioned act. He mentions it as a "town of about twenty log houses, on the Monongahela, about three hundred yards from the fort." The Penn's remained true to the King, and hence all their land that had not been surveyed and returned to the land office, was confiscated by the commonwealth. Pittsburgh, having been surveyed, was still left to them. In the spring of 1784, Tench Francis, the agent of the Penns, was induced to lay out the manor into lots and offer them for sale. Though, for many years, the place was rather unpromising, it eventually became the chief town in that part of the West, a position it yet holds. In 1786, John Scull and Joseph Hall started the Pittsburgh Gazette, the first paper published west of the mountains. In the initial number, appeared a lengthy article from the pen of H. H. Brackenridge, afterward one of the most prominent members of the Pennsylvania bar. He had located in Pittsburgh in 1781. His letter gives a most hopeful prospect in store for the future city, and is a highly descriptive article of the Western country. It is yet preserved in the "Western Annals," and is well worth a perusal.

Under the act of peace in 1783, no provision was made by the British for their allies, especially the Six Nations. The question was ignored by the English, and was made a handle by the Americans in gaining them to their cause before the war had fully closed. The treaties made were regarded by the Indians as alliances only, and when the English left the country the Indians began to assume rather a hostile bearing. This excited the whites, and for a while a war with that formidable confederacy was imminent. Better councils prevailed, and Congress wisely adopted the policy of acquiring their lands by purchase. In accordance with this policy, a treaty was made at Fort Stanwix with the Six Nations, in October, 1784. By this treaty, all lands west of a line drawn from the mouth of Oswego Creek, about four miles east of Niagara, to the mouth of Buffalo Creek, and on to the northern boundary of Pennsylvania, thence west along that boundary to its western extremity, thence south to the Ohio River, should be ceded to the United States. (They claimed west of this line by conquest.) The Six Nations were to be secured in the lands they inhabited, reserving only six miles square around Oswego fort for the support of the same. By this treaty, the indefinite claim of the Six Nations to the West was extinguished, and the question of its ownership settled.

It was now occupied by other Western tribes, who did not recognize the Iroquois claim, and who would not yield without a purchase. Especially was this the case with those Indians living in the northern part. To get possession of that country by the same process, the United States, through its commissioners, held a treaty at Fort McIntosh on the 21st of January, 1785. The Wyandot, Delaware, Chippewa and Ottawa tribes were present, and, through their chiefs, sold their lands to the Government. The Wyandot and Delaware nations were given a reservation in the north part of Ohio, where they were to be protected. The others were allotted reservations in Michigan. To all was given complete control of their lands, allowing them to punish any white man attempting to settle thereon, and guaranteeing them in their rights.

By such means Congress gained Indian titles to the vast realms north of the Ohio, and, a few months later, that legislation was commenced that should determine the mode of its disposal and the plan of its settlements.

To facilitate the settlement of lands thus acquired, Congress, on May 20, 1785, passed an act for disposing of lands in the Northwest Territory. Its main provisions were: A surveyor or surveyors should be appointed from the States; and a geographer, and his assistants to act with them. The surveyors were to divide the territory into townships of six miles square, by lines running due north and south, and east and west. The starting-place was to be on the Ohio River, at a point where the western boundary of Pennsylvania crossed it. This would give the first range, and the first township. As soon as seven townships were surveyed, the maps and plats of the same were to be sent to the Board of the Treasury, who would record them and proceed to place the land in the market, and so on with all the townships as fast as they could be prepared ready for sale. Each township was to be divided into thirty-six sections, or lots. Out of these sections, numbers 8, 11, 26 and 29 were reserved for the use of the Government, and lot No. 16, for the establishment of a common-school fund. One-third of all mines and minerals was also reserved for the United States. Three townships on Lake Erie were reserved for the use of officers, men and others, refugees from Canada and from Nova Scotia, who were entitled to grants of land. The Moravian Indians were also exempt from molestation, and guaranteed in their homes. Soldiers' claims, and all others of a like nature, were also recognized, and land reserved for them.

Without waiting for the act of Congress, settlers had been pouring into the country, and, when ordered by Congress to leave undisturbed Indian lands, refused to do so. They went into the Indian country at their peril, however, and when driven out by the Indians could get no redress from the Government, even when life was lost.

The Indians on the Wabash made a treaty at Fort Finney, on the Miami, January 31, 1786, promising allegiance to the United States, and were allowed a reservation. This treaty did not include the Piankeshaws, as was at first intended. These, refusing to live peaceably, stirred up the Shawnees, who began a series of predatory excursions against the settlements. This led to an expedition against them and other restless tribes. Gen. Clarke commanded part of the army on that expedition, but got no farther than Vincennes, when, owing to the discontent of his Kentucky troops, he was obliged to return. Col. Benjamin Logan, however, marched, at the head of four or five hundred mounted riflemen, into the Indian country, penetrating as far as the head-waters of Mad River. He destroyed several towns, much corn, and took about eighty prisoners. Among these, was the chief of the nation, who was wantonly slain, greatly to Logan's regret, who could not restrain his men. His expedition taught the Indians submission, and that they must adhere to their contracts.

Meanwhile, the difficulties of the navigation of the Mississippi arose. Spain would not relinquish the right to control the entire southern part of the river, allowing no free navigation. She was secretly hoping to cause a revolt of the Western provinces, especially Kentucky, and openly favored such a move. She also claimed, by conquest, much of the land on the east side of the river. The slow movements of Congress; the failure of Virginia to properly protect Kentucky, and the inherent restlessness in some of the Western men, well-nigh precipitated matters, and, for a while, serious results were imminent. The Kentuckians, and, indeed, all the people of the West, were determined the river should be free, and even went so far as to raise a regiment, and forcibly seize Spanish property in the West. Great Britain stood ready, too, to aid the West should it succeed, providing it would make an alliance with her. But while the excitement was at its height, Washington counseled better ways and patience. The decisive tone of the new republic, though almost overwhelmed with a burden of debt, and with no credit, debarred the Spanish from too forcible measures to assert their claims, and held back the disloyal ones from attempting a revolt.

New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut ceded their lands, and now the United States were ready to fulfill their promises of land grants, to the soldiers who had preserved the nation. This did much to heal the breach in the West, and restore confidence there; so that the Mississippi question was overlooked for a time, and Kentucky forgot her animosities.

The cession of their claims was the signal for the formation of land companies in the East; companies whose object was to settle the Western country, and, at the same time, enrich the founders of the companies. Some of these companies had been formed in the old colonial days, but the recent war had put a stop to all their proceedings. Congress would not recognize their claims, and new companies, under old names, were the result. By such means, the Ohio Company emerged from the past, and, in 1786, took an active existence.

Benjamin Tupper, a Revolutionary soldier, and since then a government surveyor, who had been west as far as Pittsburgh, revived the question. He was prevented from prosecuting his surveys by hostile Indians, and returned to Massachusetts. He broached a plan to Gen. Rufus Putnam, as to the renewal of their memorial of 1783, which resulted in the publication of a plan, and inviting all those interested, to meet in February in their respective counties, and choose delegates to a convention to be held at the "Bunch-of-grapes Tavern," in Boston, on the first of March, 1786. On the day appointed, eleven persons appeared, and by the 3d of March an outline was drawn up, and subscriptions under it began at once. The leading features of the plan were: "A fund of $1,000,000, mainly in Continental certificates, was to be raised for the purpose of purchasing lands in the Western country; there were to be 1,000 shares of $1,000 each, and upon each share $10 in specie were to be paid for contingent expenses. One year's interest was to be appropriated to the charges of making a settlement, and assisting those unable to move without aid. The owners of every twenty shares were to choose an agent to represent them and attend to their interests, and the agents were to choose the directors. The plan was approved, and in a year's time from that date, the Company was organized."*

By the time this Company was organized, all claims of the colonies in the coveted territory were done away with by their deeds of cession, Connecticut being the last.

While troubles were still existing south of the Ohio River, regarding the navigation of the Mississippi, and many urged the formation of a separate, independent State, and while Congress and Washington were doing what they could to allay the feeling north of the Ohio, the New England associates were busily engaged, now that a Company was formed, to obtain the land they wished to purchase. On the 8th of March, 1787, a meeting of the agents chose Gen. Parsons, Gen. Putnam and the Rev. Mannassah Cutler, Directors for the Company. The last selection was quite a fitting one for such an enterprise. Dr. Cutler was an accomplished scholar, an excellent gentleman, and a firm believer in freedom. In the choice of him as the agent of the Company, lies the fact, though unforeseen, of the beginning of anti-slavery in America. Through him the famous "compact of 1787," the true corner-stone of the Northwest, originated, and by him was safely passed. He was a good "wire-puller," too, and in this had an advantage. Mr. Hutchins was at this time the geographer for the United States, and was, probably, the best-posted man in America regarding the West. Dr. Cutler learned from him that the most desirable portions were on the Muskingum River, north of the Ohio, and was advised by him to buy there if he could.

Congress wanted money badly, and many of the members favored the plan. The Southern members, generally, were hostile to it, as the Doctor would listen to no grant which did not embody the New England ideas in the charter. These members were finally won over, some bribery being used, and some of their favorites made officers of the Territory, whose formation was now going on. This took time, however, and Dr. Cutler, becoming impatient, declared they would purchase from some of the States, who held small tracts in various parts of the West. This intimation brought the tardy ones to time, and, on the 23d of July, Congress authorized the Treasury Board to make the contract. On the 26th, Messrs. Cutler and Sargent, on behalf of the Company, stated in writing their conditions; and on the 27th, Congress referred their letter to the Board, and an order of the same date was obtained. Of this Dr. Cutler's journal says:

"By this grant we obtained near five millions of acres of land, amounting to $3,500,000; 1,500,000 acres for the Ohio Company, and the remainder for a private speculation, in which many of the principal characters of America are concerned. Without connecting this speculation, similar terms and advantages for the Ohio Company could not have been obtained."

Messrs. Cutler and Sargent at once closed a verbal contract with the Treasury Board, which was executed in form on the 27th of the next October.*

By this contract, the vast region bounded on the south by the Ohio, west by the Scioto, east by the seventh range of townships then surveying, and north by a due west line, drawn from the north boundary of the tenth township from the Ohio, direct to the Scioto, was sold to the Ohio associates and their secret copartners, for $1 per acre, subject to a deduction of one-third for bad lands and other contingencies.

The whole tract was not, however, paid for nor taken by the Company—even their own portion of a million and a half acres, and extending west to the eighteenth range of townships, was not taken; and in 1792, the boundaries of the purchase proper were fixed as follows: the Ohio on the south, the seventh range of townships on the east, the sixteenth range on the west, and a line on the north so drawn as to make the grant 750,000 acres, besides reservations; this grant being the portion which it was originally agreed the Company might enter into at once. In addition to this, 214,285 acres were granted as army bounties, under the resolutions of 1779 and 1780, and 100,000 acres as bounties to actual settlers; both of the latter tracts being within the original grant of 1787, and adjoining the purchase as before mentioned.

While these things were progressing, Congress was bringing into form an ordinance for the government and social organization of the Northwest Territory. Virginia made her cession in March, 1784, and during the month following the plan for the temporary government of the newly acquired territory came under discussion. On the 19th of April, Mr. Spaight, of North Carolina, moved to strike from the plan reported by Mr. Jefferson, the emancipationist of his day, a provision for the prohibition of slavery north of the Ohio after the year 1800. The motion prevailed. From that day till the 23d, the plan was discussed and altered, and finally passed unanimously with the exception of South Carolina. The South would have slavery, or defeat every measure. Thus this hideous monster early began to assert himself. By the proposed plan, the Territory was to have been divided into States by parallels of latitude and meridian lines. This division, it was thought, would make ten States, whose names were as follows, beginning at the northwest corner, and going southwardly: Sylvania, Michigania, Cheresonius, Assenisipia, Metropotamia, Illinoia, Saratoga, Washington, Polypotamia and Pelisipia.*

A more serious difficulty existed, however, to this plan, than its catalogue of names—the number of States and their boundaries. The root of the evil was in the resolution passed by Congress in October,

* Land Laws.

* Spark's Washington.

1780, which fixed the size of the States to be formed from the ceded lands, at one hundred to one hundred and fifty miles square. The terms of that resolution being called up both by Virginia and Massachusetts, further legislation was deemed necessary to change them. July 7, 1786, this subject came up in Congress, and a resolution passed in favor of a division into not less than three nor more than five States. Virginia, at the close of 1788, assented to this proposition, which became the basis upon which the division should be made. On the 29th of September, Congress having thus changed the plan for dividing the Northwestern Territory into ten States, proceeded again to consider the terms of an ordinance for the government of that region. At this juncture, the genius of Dr. Cutler displayed itself. A graduate in medicine, law and divinity; an ardent lover of liberty; a celebrated scientist, and an accomplished, portly gentleman, of whom the Southern senators said they had never before seen so fine a specimen from the New England colonies, no man was better prepared to form a government for the new Territory, than he. The Ohio Company was his real object. He was backed by them, and enough Continental money to purchase more than a million acres of land. This was augmented by other parties until, as has been noticed, he represented over five million acres. This would largely reduce the public debt. Jefferson and Virginia were regarded as authority concerning the land Virginia had just ceded to the General Government. Jefferson's policy was to provide for the national credit, and still check the growth of slavery. Here was a good opportunity. Massachusetts owned the Territory of Maine, which she was crowding into market. She opposed the opening of the Northwest. This stirred Virginia. The South caught the inspiration and rallied around the Old Dominion and Dr. Cutler. Thereby he gained the credit and good will of the South, an auxiliary he used to good purpose. Massachusetts could not vote against him, because many of the constituents of her members were interested in the Ohio Company. Thus the Doctor, using all the arts of the lobbyist, was enabled to hold the situation. True to deeper convictions, he dictated one of the most compact and finished documents of wise statesmanship that has ever adorned any statute-book. Jefferson gave it the term, "Articles of Compact," and rendered him valuable aid in its construction. This "Compact" preceded the Federal Constitution, in both of which are seen Jefferson's master-mind. Dr. Cutler followed closely the constitution of Massachusetts, adopted three years before. The prominent features were: The exclusion of slavery from the Territory forever. Provision for public schools, giving one township for a seminary, and every sixteenth section. (That gave one thirty-sixth of all the land for public education.) A provision prohibiting the adoption of any constitution or the enactment of any law that would nullify pre-existing contracts.

The compact further declared that "Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall always be encouraged."

The Doctor planted himself firmly on this platform, and would not yield. It was that or nothing. Unless they could make the land desirable, it was not wanted, and, taking his horse and buggy, he started for the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia. His influence succeeded. On the 13th of July, 1787, the bill was put upon its passage and was unanimously adopted. Every member from the South voted for it; only one man, Mr. Yates, of New York, voted against the measure; but as the vote was made by States, his vote was lost, and the "Compact of 1787" was beyond repeal. Thus the great States of the Northwest Territory were consecrated to freedom, intelligence and morality. This act was the opening step for freedom in America. Soon the South saw their blunder, and endeavored, by all their power, to repeal the compact. In 1803, Congress referred it to a committee, of which John Randolph was chairman. He reported the ordinance was a compact and could not be repealed. Thus it stood, like a rock, in the way of slavery, which still, in spite of these provisions, endeavored to plant that infernal institution in the West. Witness the early days of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. But the compact could not be violated; New England ideas could not be put down, and her sons stood ready to defend the soil of the West from that curse.

The passage of the ordinance and the grant of land to Dr. Cutler and his associates, were soon followed by a request from John Cleve Symmes, of New Jersey, for the country between the Miamis. Symmes had visited that part of the West in 1786, and, being pleased with the valleys of the Miamis, had applied to the Board of the Treasury for their purchase, as soon as they were open to settlement. The Board was empowered to act by Congress, and, in 1788, a contract was signed, giving him the country he desired. The terms of his purchase were similar to those of the Ohio Company. His application was followed by others, whose success or failure will appear in the narrative.

The New England or Ohio Company was all this time busily engaged perfecting its arrangements to occupy its lands. The Directors agreed to reserve 5,760 acres near the confluence of the Ohio and Muskingum for a city and commons, for the old ideas of the English plan of settling a country yet prevailed. A meeting of the Directors was held at Bracket's tavern, in Boston, November 23, 1787, when four surveyors, and twenty-two attendants, boat-builders, carpenters, blacksmiths and common workmen, numbering in all forty persons, were engaged. Their tools were purchased, and wagons were obtained to transport them across the mountains. Gen. Rufus Putnam was made superintendent of the company, and Ebenezer Sproat, of Rhode Island, Anselm Tupper and John Matthews, from Massachusetts, and R. J. Meigs, from Connecticut, as surveyors. At the same meeting, a suitable person to instruct them in religion, and prepare the way to open a school when needed, was selected. This was Rev. Daniel Storey, who became the first New England minister in the Northwest.

The Indians were watching this outgrowth of affairs, and felt, from what they could learn in Kentucky, that they would be gradually surrounded by the whites. This they did not relish, by any means, and gave the settlements south of the Ohio no little uneasiness. It was thought best to hold another treaty with them. In the mean time, to insure peace, the Governor of Virginia, and Congress, placed troops at Venango, Forts Pitt and McIntosh, and at Miami, Vincennes, Louisville, and Muskingum, and the militia of Kentucky were held in readiness should a sudden outbreak occur. These measures produced no results, save insuring the safety of the whites, and not until January, 1789, was Clarke able to carry out his plans. During that month, he held a meeting at Fort Harmar,* at the mouth of the Muskingum, where the New England Colony expected to locate.

The hostile character of the Indians did not deter the Ohio Company from carrying out its plans. In the winter of 1787, Gen. Rufus Putnam and forty-seven pioneers advanced to the mouth of the Youghiogheny River, and began building a boat for transportation down the Ohio in the spring. The boat was the largest craft that had ever descended the river, and, in allusion to their Pilgrim Fathers, it was called the Mayflower. It was 45 feet long and 12 feet wide, and estimated at 50 tons burden. Truly a formidable affair for the time. The bows were raking and curved like a galley, and were strongly timbered. The sides were made bullet-proof, and it was covered with a deck roof. Capt. Devol, the first ship-builder in the West, was placed in command. On the 2d of April, the Mayflower was launched, and for five days the little band of pioneers sailed down the Monongahela and the Ohio, and, on the 7th, landed at the mouth of the Muskingum. There, opposite Fort Harmar, they chose a location, moored their boat for a temporary shelter, and began to erect houses for their occupation.

Thus was begun the first English settlement in the Ohio Valley. About the 1st of July, they were re-enforced by the arrival of a colony from Massachusetts. It had been nine weeks on the way. It had hauled its wagons and driven its stock to Wheeling, where, constructing flat-boats, it had floated down the river to the settlement.

In October preceding this occurrence, Arthur St. Clair had been appointed Governor of the Territory by Congress, which body also appointed Winthrop Sargent, Secretary, and Samuel H. Parsons, James M. Varnum and John Armstrong Judges. Subsequently Mr. Armstrong declined the appointment, and Mr. Symmes was given the vacancy. None of these were on the ground when the first settlement was made, though the Judges came soon after. One of the first things the colony found necessary to do was to organize some form of government, whereby difficulties might be settled, though to the credit of the colony it may be said, that during the first three months of its existence but one difference arose, and that was settled by a compromise.* Indeed, hardly a better set of men for the purpose could have been selected. Washington wrote concerning this colony:

"No colony in America was ever settled under such favorable auspices as that which has commenced at the Muskingum. Information, property and strength will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers personally, and there never were men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community."

* Fort Harmar was built in 1785, by a detachment of United States soldiers, under command of Maj. John Doughty. It was named in honor of Col. Josiah Harmar, to whose regiment Maj. Doughty was attached. It was the first military post erected by the Americans within the limits of Ohio, except Fort Laurens, a temporary structure built in 1778. When Marietta was founded it was the military post of that part of the country, and was for many years an important station.

On the 2d of July, a meeting of the Directors and agents was held on the banks of the Muskingum for the purpose of naming the newborn city and its squares. As yet, the settlement had been merely "The Muskingum;" but the name Marietta was now formally given it, in honor of Marie Antoinette. The square upon which the blockhouses stood was called Campus Martius; Square No. 19, Capitolium; Square No. 61, Cecilia, and the great road running through the covert-way, Sacra Via.* Surely, classical scholars were not scarce in the colony.

On the Fourth, an oration was delivered by James M. Varnum, one of the Judges, and a public demonstration held. Five days after, the Governor arrived, and the colony began to assume form. The ordinance of 1787 provided two distinct grades of government, under the first of which the whole power was under the Governor and the three Judges. This form was at once recognized on the arrival of St. Clair. The first law established by this court was passed on the 25th of July. It established and regulated the militia of the Territory. The next day after its publication, appeared the Governor's proclamation erecting all the country that had been ceded by the Indians east of the Scioto River, into the county of Washington. Marietta was, of course, the county seat, and, from that day, went on prosperously. On September 2, the first court was held with becoming ceremonies. It is thus related in the American Pioneer:

"The procession was formed at the Point (where the most of the settlers resided), in the following order: The High Sheriff, with his drawn sword; the citizens; the officers of the garrison at Fort Harmar; the members of the bar; the Supreme Judges; the Governor and clergyman; the newly appointed Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, Gens. Rufus Putnam and Benjamin Tupper.

"They marched up the path that had been cleared through the forest to Campus Martius Hall (stockade), where the whole countermarched, and the Judges (Putnam and Tupper) took their seats. The clergyman, Rev. Dr. Cutler, then invoked the divine blessing. The Sheriff, Col. Ebenezer Sproat, proclaimed with his solemn 'Oh yes!' that a court is open for the administration of even-handed justice, to the poor and to the rich, to the guilty and to the innocent, without respect of persons; none to be punished without a trial of their peers, and then in pursuance of the laws and evidence in the case.

"Although this scene was exhibited thus early in the settlement of the West, few ever equaled it in the dignity and exalted character of its principal participators. Many of them belonged to the history of our country in the darkest, as well as the most splendid, period of the Revolutionary war."

Many Indians were gathered at the same time to witness the (to them) strange spectacle, and for the purpose of forming a treaty, though how far they carried this out, the Pioneer does not relate.

The progress of the settlement was quite satisfactory during the year. Some one writing a letter from the town says:

"The progress of the settlement is sufficiently rapid for the first year. We are continually erecting houses, but arrivals are constantly coming faster than we can possibly provide convenient covering. Our first ball was opened about the middle of December, at which were fifteen ladies, as well accomplished in the manner of polite circles as any I have ever seen in the older States. I mention this to show the progress of society in this new world, where, I believe, we shall vie with, if not excel, the old States in every accomplishment necessary to render life agreeable and happy."

The emigration westward at this time was, indeed, exceedingly large. The commander at Fort Harmar reported 4,500 persons as having passed that post between February and June, 1788, many of whom would have stopped there, had the associates been prepared to receive them. The settlement was free from Indian depredations until January, 1791, during which interval it daily increased in numbers and strength.

Symmes and his friends were not idle during this time. He had secured his contract in October, 1787, and, soon after, issued a pamphlet stating the terms of his purchase and the mode he intended to follow in the disposal of the lands. His plan was, to issue warrants for not less than one-quarter section, which might be located anywhere, save on reservations, or on land previously entered. The locator could enter an entire section should he desire to do so. The price was to be 60½ cents per acre till May, 1788; then, till November, $1; and after that time to be regulated by the demand for land. Each purchaser was bound to begin improvements within two years, or forfeit one-sixth of the land to whoever would settle thereon and remain seven years. Military bounties might be taken in this, as in the purchase of the associates. For himself, Symmes reserved one township near the mouth of the Miami. On this he intended to build a great city, rivaling any Eastern port. He offered any one a lot on which to build a house, providing he would remain three years. Continental certificates were rising, owing to the demand for land created by these two purchases, and Congress found the burden of debt correspondingly lessened. Symmes soon began to experience difficulty in procuring enough to meet his payments. He had also some trouble in arranging his boundary with the Board of the Treasury. These, and other causes, laid the foundation for another city, which is now what Symmes hoped his city would one day be.

In January, 1788, Mathias Denman, of New Jersey, took an interest in Symmes' purchase, and located, among other tracts, the sections upon which Cincinnati has since been built. Retaining one-third of this purchase, he sold the balance to Robert Patterson and John Filson, each getting the same share. These three, about August, agreed to lay out a town on their land. It was designated as opposite the mouth of the Licking River, to which place it was intended to open a road from Lexington, Ky. These men little thought of the great emporium that now covers the modest site of this town they laid out that summer. Mr. Filson, who had been a schoolmaster, and was of a somewhat poetic nature, was appointed to name the town. In respect to its situation, and as if with a prophetic perception of the mixed races that were in after years to dwell there, he named it Losantiville,* "which, being interpreted," says the "Western Annals," "means vill, the town; anti, opposite to; os, the mouth; L, of Licking. This may well put to the blush the Campus Martius of the Marietta scholars, and the Fort Solon of the Spaniards."

Meanwhile, Symmes was busy in the East, and, by July, got thirty people and eight four-horse wagons under way for the West. These reached Limestone by September, where they met Mr. Stites, with several persons from Redstone. All came to Symmes' purchase, and began to look for homes.

Symmes' mind was, however, ill at rest. He could not meet his first payment on so vast a realm, and there also arose a difference of opinion between him and the Treasury Board regarding the Ohio boundary. Symmes wanted all the land between the two Miamis, bordering on the Ohio, while the Board wished him confined to no more than twenty miles of the river. To this proposal he would not agree, as he had made sales all along the river. Leaving the bargain in an unsettled state, Congress considered itself released from all its obligations, and, but for the representations of many of Symmes' friends, he would have lost all his money and labor. His appointment as Judge was not favorably received by many, as they thought that by it he would acquire unlimited power. Some of his associates also complained of him, and, for awhile, it surely seemed that ruin only awaited him. But he was brave and hopeful, and determined to succeed. On his return from a visit to his purchase in September, 1788, he wrote Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, one of his best friends and associates, that he thought some of the land near the Great Miami "positively worth a silver dollar the acre in its present state."

A good many changes were made in his original contract, growing out of his inability to meet his payments. At first, he was to have not less than a million acres, under an act of Congress passed in October, 1787, authorizing the Treasury Board to contract with any one who could pay for such tracts, on the Ohio and Wabash Rivers, whose fronts should not exceed one-third of their depth.

Dayton and Marsh, Symmes' agents, contracted with the Board for one tract on the Ohio, beginning twenty miles up the Ohio from the mouth of the Great Miami, and to run back for quantity between the Miami and a line drawn from the Ohio, parallel to the general course of that river. In 1791, three years after Dayton and Marsh made the contract, Symmes found this would throw the purchase too far back from the Ohio, and applied to Congress to let him have all between the Miamis, running back so as to include 1,000,000 acres, which that body, on April 12, 1792, agreed to do. When the lands were surveyed, however, it was found that a line drawn from the head of the Little Miami due west to the Great Miami, would include south of it less than six hundred thousand acres. Even this Symmes could not pay for, and when his patent was issued in September, 1794, it gave him and his associates 248,540 acres, exclusive of reservations which amounted to 63,142 acres. This tract was bounded by the Ohio, the two Miamis and a due east and west line run so as to include the desired quantity. Symmes, however, made no further payments, and the rest of his purchase reverted to the United States, who gave those who had bought under him ample pre-emption rights.

* Judge Burnett, in his notes, disputes the above account of the origin of the city of Cincinnati. He says the name "Losantiville" was determined on, but not adopted, when the town was laid out. This version is probably the correct one, and will be found fully given in the detailed history of the settlements.

The Government was able, also, to give him and his colonists but little aid, and as danger from hostile Indians was in a measure imminent (though all the natives were friendly to Symmes), settlers were slow to come. However, the band led by Mr. Stites arrived before the 1st of January, 1789, and locating themselves near the mouth of the Little Miami, on a tract of 10,000 acres which Mr. Stites had purchased from Symmes, formed the second settlement in Ohio. They were soon afterward joined by a colony of twenty-six persons, who assisted them to erect a block-house, and gather their corn. The town was named Columbia. While here, the great flood of January, 1789, occurred, which did much to ensure the future growth of Losantiville, or more properly, Cincinnati. Symmes City, which was laid out near the mouth of the Great Miami, and which he vainly strove to make the city of the future, Marietta and Columbia, all suffered severely by this flood, the greatest, the Indians said, ever known. The site of Cincinnati was not overflowed, and hence attracted the attention of the settlers. Denman's warrants had designated his purchase as opposite the mouth of the Licking; and that point escaping the overflow, late in December the place was visited by Israel Ludlow, Symmes' surveyor, Mr. Patterson and Mr. Denman, and about fourteen others, who left Maysville to "form a station and lay off a town opposite the Licking." The river was filled with ice "from shore to shore;" but, says Symmes in May, 1789, "Perseverance triumphing over difficulty, and they landed safe on a most delightful bank of the Ohio, where they founded the town of Losantiville, which populates considerably." The settlers of Losantiville built a few log huts and block-houses, and proceeded to improve the town. Symmes, noticing the location, says: "Though they placed their dwellings in the most marked position, yet they suffered nothing from the freshet." This would seem to give credence to Judge Burnett's notes regarding the origin of Cincinnati, who states the settlement was made at this time, and not at the time mentioned when

Mr. Filson named the town. It is further to be noticed, that, before the town was located by Mr. Ludlow and Mr. Patterson, Mr. Filson had been killed by the Miami Indians, and, as he had not paid for his one-third of the site, the claim was sold to Mr. Ludlow, who thereby became one of the original owners of the place. Just what day the town was laid out is not recorded. All the evidence tends to show it must have been late in 1788, or early in 1789.

While the settlements on the north side of the Ohio were thus progressing, south of it fears of the Indians prevailed, and the separation sore was kept open. The country was, however, so torn by internal factions that no plan was likely to succeed, and to this fact, in a large measure, may be credited the reason it did not secede, or join the Spanish or French faction, both of which were intriguing to get the commonwealth. During this year the treasonable acts of James Wilkinson came into view. For a while he thought success was in his grasp, but the two governments were at peace with America, and discountenanced any such efforts. Wilkinson, like all traitors, relapsed into nonentity, and became mistrusted by the governments he attempted to befriend. Treason is always odious.

It will be borne in mind, that in 1778 preparations had been made for a treaty with the Indians, to secure peaceful possession of the lands owned in the West. Though the whites held these by purchase and treaty, yet many Indians, especially the Wabash and some of the Miami Indians, objected to their occupation, claiming the Ohio boundary as the original division line. Clarke endeavored to obtain, by treaty at Fort Harmar, in 1778, a confirmation of these grants, but was not able to do so till January, 9, 1789. Representatives of the Six Nations, and of the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pottawatomies and Sacs, met him at this date, and confirmed and extended the treaties of Fort Stanwix and Fort McIntosh, the one in 1784, the other in 1785. This secured peace with the most of them, save a few of the Wabash Indians, whom they were compelled to conquer by arms. When this was accomplished, the borders were thought safe, and Virginia proposed to withdraw her aid in support of Kentucky. This opened old troubles, and the separation dogma came out afresh. Virginia offered to allow the erection of a separate State, providing Kentucky would assume part of the old debts. This the young commonwealth would not do, and sent a remonstrance. Virginia withdrew the proposal, and ordered a ninth convention, which succeeded in evolving a plan whereby Kentucky took her place among the free States of the Union.

North of the Ohio, the prosperity continued. In 1789, Rev. Daniel Story, who had been appointed missionary to the West, came out as a teacher of the youth and a preacher of the Gospel. Dr. Cutler had preceded him, not in the capacity of a minister, though he had preached; hence Mr. Story is truly the first missionary from the Protestant Church who came to the Ohio Valley in that capacity. When he came, in 1789, he found nine associations on the Ohio Company's purchase, comprising two hundred and fifty persons in all; and, by the close of 1790, eight settlements had been made: two at Belpre (belle prairie), one at Newbury, one at Wolf Creek, one at Duck Creek, one at the mouth of Meigs' Creek, one at Anderson's Bottom, and one at Big Bottom. An extended sketch of all these settlements will be found farther on in this volume.

Symmes had, all this time, strenuously endeavored to get his city—called Cleves City—favorably noticed, and filled with people. He saw a rival in Cincinnati. That place, if made military headquarters to protect the Miami Valley, would out-rival his town, situated near the bend of the Miami, near its mouth. On the 15th of June, Judge Symmes received news that the Wabash Indians threatened the Miami settlements, and as he had received only nineteen men for defense, he applied for more. Before July, Maj. Doughty arrived at the "Slaughter House"—as the Miami was sometimes called, owing to previous murders that had, at former times, occurred therein. Through the influence of Symmes, the detachment landed at the North Bend, and, for awhile, it was thought the fort would be erected there. This was what Symmes wanted, as it would secure him the headquarters of the military, and aid in getting the headquarters of the civil government. The truth was, however, that neither the proposed city on the Miami—North Bend, as it afterward became known, from its location—or South Bend, could compete, in point of natural advantages, with the plain on which Cincinnati is built. Had Fort Washington been built elsewhere, after the close of the Indian war, nature would have asserted her advantages, and insured the growth of a city, where even the ancient and mysterious dwellers of the Ohio had reared the earthen walls of one of their vast temples. Another fact is given in relation to the erection of Fort Washington at Losantiville, which partakes somewhat of romance. The Major, while waiting to decide at which place the fort should be built, happened to make the acquaintance of a black-eyed beauty, the wife of one of the residents. Her husband, noticing the affair, removed her to Losantiville. The Major followed; he told Symmes he wished to see how a fort would do there, but promised to give his city the preference. He found the beauty there, and on his return Symmes could not prevail on him to remain. If the story be true, then the importance of Cincinnati owes its existence to a trivial circumstance, and the old story of the ten years' war which terminated in the downfall of Troy, which is said to have originated owing to the beauty of a Spartan dame, was re-enacted here. Troy and North Bend fell because of the beauty of a woman; Cincinnati was the result of the downfall of the latter place.

About the first of January, 1790, Governor St. Clair, with his officers, descended the Ohio River from Marietta to Fort Washington. There he established the county of Hamilton, comprising the immense region of country contiguous to the Ohio, from the Hocking River to the Great Miami; appointed a corps of civil and military officers, and established a Court of Quarter Sessions. Some state that at this time, he changed the name of the village of Losantiville to Cincinnati, in allusion to a society of that name which had recently been formed among the officers of the Revolutionary army, and established it as the seat of justice for Hamilton. This latter fact is certain; but as regards changing the name of the village, there is no good authority for it. With this importance attached to it, Cincinnati began at once an active growth, and from that day Cleves' city declined. The next summer, frame houses began to appear in Cincinnati, while at the same time forty new log cabins appeared about the fort.

On the 8th of January, the Governor arrived at the falls of the Ohio, on his way to establish a government at Vincennes and Kaskaskia. From Clarksville, he dispatched a messenger to Major Hamtramck, commander at Vincennes, with speeches to the various Indian tribes in this part of the Northwest, who had not fully agreed to the treaties. St. Clair and Sargent followed in a few days, along an Indian trail to Vincennes, where he organized the county of Knox, comprising all the country along the Ohio, from the Miami to the Wabash, and made Vincennes the county seat. Then they proceeded across the lower part of Illinois to Kaskaskia, where he established the county of St. Clair (so named by Sargent), comprising all the country from the Wabash to the Mississippi. Thus the Northwest was divided into three counties, and courts established therein. St. Clair called upon the French inhabitants at Vincennes and in the Illinois country, to show the titles to their lands, and also to defray the expense of a survey. To this latter demand they replied through their priest, Pierre Gibault, showing their poverty, and inability to comply. They were confirmed in their grants, and, as they had been good friends to the patriot cause, were relieved from the expense of the survey.

While the Governor was managing these affairs, Major Hamtramck was engaged in an effort to conciliate the Wabash Indians. For this purpose, he sent Antoine Gamelin, an intelligent French merchant, and a true friend of America, among them to carry messages sent by St. Clair and the Government, and to learn their sentiments and dispositions. Gamelin performed this important mission in the spring of 1790 with much sagacity, and, as the French were good friends of the natives, he did much to conciliate these half-hostile tribes. He visited the towns of these tribes along the Wabash and as far north and east as the Miami village, Ke-ki-ong-ga—St. Mary's—at the junction of the St. Mary's and St. Joseph's Rivers (Fort Wayne).

Gamelin's report, and the intelligence brought by some traders from the Upper Wabash, were conveyed to the Governor at Kaskaskia. The reports convinced him that the Indians of that part of the Northwest were preparing for a war on the settlements north of the Ohio, intending, if possible, to drive them south of it; that river being still considered by them as the true boundary. St. Clair left the administration of affairs in the Western counties to Sargent, and returned at once to Fort Washington to provide for the defense of the frontier.

The Indians had begun their predatory incursions into the country settled by the whites, and had committed some depredations. The Kentuckians were enlisted in an attack against the Scioto Indians. April 18, Gen. Harmar, with 100 regulars, and Gen. Scott, with 230 volunteers, marched from Limestone, by a circuitous route, to the Scioto, accomplishing but little. The savages had fled.

CHAPTER VII.

THE INDIAN WAR OF 1795—HARMAR'S CAMPAIGN—ST. CLAIR'S CAMPAIGN—WAYNE'S CAMPAIGN—CLOSE OF THE WAR.

A GREAT deal of the hostility at this period was directly traceable to the British. They yet held Detroit and several posts on the lakes, in violation of the treaty of 1783. They alleged as a reason for not abandoning them, that the Americans had not fulfilled the conditions of the treaty regarding the collection of debts. Moreover, they did all they could to remain at the frontier and enjoy the emoluments derived from the fur trade. That they aided the Indians in the conflict at this time, is undeniable. Just how, it is difficult to say. But it is well known the savages had all the ammunition and fire-arms they wanted, more than they could have obtained from American and French renegade traders. They were also well supplied with clothing, and were able to prolong the war some time. A great confederation was on the eve of formation. The leading spirits were

Cornplanter, Brant, Little Turtle and other noted chiefs, and had not the British, as Brant said, "encouraged us to the war, and promised us aid, and then, when we were driven away by the Americans, shut the doors of their fortresses against us and refused us food, when they saw us nearly conquered, we would have effected our object."

McKee, Elliott and Girty were also actively engaged in aiding the natives. All of them were in the interest of the British, a fact clearly proven by the Indians themselves, and by other traders.

St. Clair and Gen. Harmar determined to send an expedition against the Maumee towns, and secure that part of the country. Letters were sent to the militia officers of Western Pennsylvania, Virginia and Kentucky, calling on them for militia to co-operate with the regular troops in the campaign. According to the plan of the campaign, 300 militia were to rendezvous at Fort Steuben (Jeffersonville), march thence to Fort Knox, at Vincennes, and join Maj. Hamtramck in an expedition up the Wabash; 700 were to rendezvous at Fort Washington to join the regular army against the Maumee towns.

While St. Clair was forming his army and arranging for the campaign, three expeditions were sent out against the Miami towns. One against the Miami villages, not far from the Wabash, was led by Gen. Harmar. He had in his army about fourteen hundred men, regulars and militia. These two parts of the army could not be made to affiliate, and, as a consequence, the expedition did little beyond burning the villages and destroying corn. The militia would not submit to discipline, and would not serve under regular officers. It will be seen what this spirit led to when St. Clair went on his march soon after.

The Indians, emboldened by the meager success of Harmar's command, continued their depredations against the Ohio settlements, destroying the community at Big Bottom. To hold them in check, and also punish them, an army under Charles Scott went against the Wabash Indians. Little was done here but destroy towns and the standing corn. In July, another army, under Col. Wilkinson, was sent against the Eel River Indians. Becoming entangled in extensive morasses on the river, the army became endangered, but was finally extricated, and accomplished no more than either the other armies before it. As it was, however, the three expeditions directed against the Miamis and Shawanees, served only to exasperate them. The burning of their towns, the destruction of their corn, and the captivity of their women and children, only aroused them to more desperate efforts to defend their country and to harass their invaders. To accomplish this, the chiefs of the Miamis, Shawanees and the Delawares, Little Turtle, Blue Jacket and Buckongahelas, were engaged in forming a confederacy of all the tribes of the Northwest, strong enough to drive the whites beyond the Ohio. Pontiac had tried that before, even when he had open allies among the French. The Indians now had secret allies among the British, yet, in the end, they did not succeed. While they were preparing for the contest, St. Clair was gathering his forces, intending to erect a chain of forts from the Ohio, by way of the Miami and Maumee valleys, to the lakes, and thereby effectually hold the savages in check. Washington warmly seconded this plan, and designated the junction of the St. Mary's and St. Joseph's Rivers as an important post. This had been a fortification almost from the time the English held the valley, and only needed little work to make it a formidable fortress. Gen. Knox, the Secretary of War, also favored the plan, and gave instructions concerning it. Under these instructions, St. Clair organized his forces as rapidly as he could, although the numerous drawbacks almost, at times, threatened the defeat of the campaign. Through the summer the arms and accouterments of the army were put in readiness at Fort Washington. Many were found to be of the poorest quality, and to be badly out of repair. The militia came poorly armed, under the impression they were to be provided with arms. While waiting in camp, habits of idleness engendered themselves, and drunkenness followed. They continued their accustomed freedom, disdaining to drill, and refused to submit to the regular officers. A bitter spirit broke out between the regular troops and the militia, which none could heal. The insubordination of the militia and their officers, caused them a defeat afterward, which they in vain attempted to fasten on the busy General, and the regular troops.

The army was not ready to move till September 17. It was then 2,300 strong. It then moved to a point upon the Great Miami, where they erected Fort Hamilton, the first in the proposed chain of fortresses. After its completion, they moved on forty-four miles farther, and, on the 12th of October, began the erection of Fort Jefferson, about six miles south of the present town of Greenville, Darke County. On the 24th, the army again took up its line of march, through a wilderness, marshy and boggy, and full of savage foes. The army rapidly declined under the hot sun; even the commander was suffering from an indisposition. The militia deserted, in companies at a time, leaving the bulk of the work to the regular troops. By the 3d of November, the army reached a stream twelve yards wide, which St. Clair supposed to be a branch of the St. Mary of the Maumee, but which in reality was a tributary of the Wabash. Upon the banks of that stream, the army, now about fourteen hundred strong, encamped in two lines. A slight protection was thrown up as a safeguard against the Indians, who were known to be in the neighborhood. The General intended to attack them next day, but, about half an hour before sunrise, just after the militia had been dismissed from parade, a sudden attack was made upon them. The militia were thrown into confusion, and disregarded the command of the officers. They had not been sufficiently drilled, and now was seen, too late and too plainly, the evil effects of their insubordination. Through the morning the battle waged furiously, the men falling by scores. About nine o'clock the retreat began, covered by Maj. Cook and his troops. The retreat was a disgraceful, precipitate flight, though, after four miles had been passed, the enemy returned to the work of scalping the dead and wounded, and of pillaging the camp. Through the day and the night their dreadful work continued, one squaw afterward declaring "her arm was weary scalping the white men." The army reached Fort Jefferson a little after sunset, having thrown away much of its arms and baggage, though the act was entirely unnecessary. After remaining here a short time, it was decided by the officers to move on toward Fort Hamilton, and thence to Fort Washington.

The defeat of St. Clair was the most terrible reverse the Americans ever suffered from the Indians. It was greater than even Braddock's defeat. His army consisted of 1,200 men and 86 officers, of whom 714 men and 63 officers were killed or wounded. St. Clair's army consisted of 1,400 men and 86 officers, of whom 890 men and 16 officers were killed or wounded. The comparative effects of the two engagements very inadequately represent the crushing effect of St. Clair's defeat. An unprotected frontier of more than a thousand miles in extent was now thrown open to a foe made merciless, and anxious to drive the whites from the north side of the Ohio. Now, settlers were scattered along all the streams, and in all the forests, exposed to the cruel enemy, who stealthily approached the homes of the pioneer, to murder him and his family. Loud calls arose from the people to defend and protect them. St. Clair was covered with abuse for his defeat, when he really was not alone to blame for it. The militia would not be controlled. Had Clarke been at their head, or Wayne, who succeeded St. Clair, the result might have been different. As it was, St. Clair resigned; though ever after he enjoyed the confidence of Washington and Congress.

Four days after the defeat of St. Clair, the army, in its straggling condition, reached Fort Washington, and paused to rest. On the 9th, St. Clair wrote fully to the Secretary of War. On the 12th, Gen. Knox communicated the information to Congress, and on the 26th, he laid before the President two reports, the second containing suggestions regarding future operations. His suggestions urged the establishment of a strong United States Army, as it was plain the States could not control the matter. He also urged a thorough drill of the soldiers. No more insubordination could be tolerated. General Wayne was selected by Washington as the commander, and at once proceeded to the task assigned to him. In June, 1792, he went to Pittsburgh to organize the army now gathering, which was to be the ultimate argument with the Indian confederation. Through the summer he was steadily at work. "Train and discipline them for the work they are meant for," wrote Washington, "and do not spare powder and lead, so the men be made good marksmen." In December, the forces, now recruited and trained, gathered at a point twenty-two miles below Pittsburgh, on the Ohio, called Legionville, the army itself being denominated the Legion of the United States, divided into four sub-legions, and provided with the proper officers. Meantime, Col. Wilkinson succeeded St. Clair as commander at Fort Washington, and sent out a force to examine the field of defeat, and bury the dead. A shocking sight met their view, revealing the deeds of cruelty enacted upon their comrades by the savage enemy.

While Wayne's army was drilling, peace measures were pressed forward by the United States with equal perseverance. The Iroquois were induced to visit Philadelphia, and partially secured from the general confederacy. They were wary, however, and, expecting aid from the British, held aloof. Brant did not come, as was hoped, and it was plain there was intrigue somewhere. Five independent embassies were sent among the Western tribes, to endeavor to prevent a war, and win over the inimical tribes. But the victories they had won, and the favorable whispers of the British agents, closed the ears of the red men, and all propositions were rejected in some form or other. All the ambassadors, save Putnam, suffered death. He alone was able to reach his goal—the Wabash Indians—and effect any treaty. On the 27th of December, in company with Heckewelder, the Moravian missionary, he reached Vincennes, and met thirty-one chiefs, representing the Weas, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias, Peorias, Illinois, Pottawatomies, Mascoutins, Kickapoos and Eel River Indians, and concluded a treaty of peace with them.

The fourth article of this treaty, however, contained a provision guaranteeing to the Indians their lands, and when the treaty was laid before Congress, February 13, 1793, that body, after much discussion, refused on that account to ratify it.

A great council of the Indians was to be held at Auglaize during the autumn of 1792, when the assembled nations were to discuss fully their means of defense, and determine their future line of action. The council met in October, and was the largest Indian gathering of the time. The chiefs of all the tribes of the Northwest were there. The representatives of the seven nations of Canada, were in attendance. Cornplanter and forty-eight chiefs of the New York (Six Nations) Indians repaired thither. "Besides these," said Cornplanter, "there were so many nations we cannot tell the names of them. There were three men from the Gora nation; it took them a whole season to come; and," continued he, "twenty-seven nations from beyond Canada were there." The question of peace or war was long and earnestly debated. Their future was solemnly discussed, and around the council fire native eloquence and native zeal shone in all their simple strength. One nation after another, through their chiefs, presented their views. The deputies of the Six Nations, who had been at Philadelphia to consult the "Thirteen Fires," made their report. The Western boundary was the principal question. The natives, with one accord, declared it must be the Ohio River. An address was prepared, and sent to the President, wherein their views were stated, and agreeing to abstain from all hostilities, until they could meet again in the spring at the rapids of the Maumee, and there consult with their white brothers. They desired the President to send agents, "who are men of honesty, not proud land-jobbers, but men who love and desire peace." The good work of Penn was evidenced here, as they desired that the ambassadors "be accompanied by some Friend or Quaker."

The armistice they had promised was not, however, faithfully kept. On the 6th of November, a detachment of Kentucky cavalry at Fort St. Clair, about twenty-five miles above Fort Hamilton, was attacked. The commander, Maj. Adair, was an excellent officer, well versed in Indian tactics, and defeated the savages.

This infraction of their promises did not deter the United States from taking measures to meet the Indians at the rapids of the Maumee "when the leaves were fully out." For that purpose, the President selected as commissioners, Charles Carroll and Charles Thompson, but, as they declined the nomination, he appointed Benjamin Lincoln, Beverly Randolph and Timothy Pickering, the 1st of March, 1793, to attend the convention, which, it was thought best, should be held at the Sandusky outpost. About the last of April, these commissioners left Philadelphia, and, late in May, reached Niagara, where they remained guests of Lieut. Gov. Simcoe, of the British Government. This officer gave them all the aid he could, yet it was soon made plain to them that he would not object to the confederation, nay, even rather favored it. They speak of his kindness to them, in grateful terms. Gov. Simcoe advised the Indians to make peace, but not to give up any of their lands. That was the pith of the whole matter. The British rather claimed land in New York, under the treaty of 1783, alleging the Americans had not fully complied with the terms of that treaty, hence they were not as anxious for peace and a peaceful settlement of the difficult boundary question as they sometimes represented.

By July, "the leaves were fully out," the conferences among the tribes were over, and, on the 15th of that month, the commissioners met Brant and some fifty natives. In a strong speech, Brant set forth their wishes, and invited them to accompany him to the place of holding the council. The Indians were rather jealous of Wayne's continued preparations for war, hence, just before setting out for the Maumee, the commissioners sent a letter to the Secretary of War, asking that all warlike demonstrations cease until the result of their mission be known.

On 21st of July, the embassy reached the head of the Detroit River, where their advance was checked by the British authorities at Detroit, compelling them to take up their abode at the house of Andrew Elliott, the famous renegade, then a British agent under Alexander McKee. McKee was attending the council, and the commissioners addressed him a note, borne by Elliott, to inform him of their arrival, and asking when they could be received. Elliott returned on the 29th, bringing with him a deputation of twenty chiefs from the council. The next day, a conference was held, and the chief of the Wyandots, Sa-wagh-da-wunk, presented to the commissioners, in writing, their explicit demand in regard to the boundary, and their purposes and powers. "The Ohio must be the boundary," said he, "or blood will flow."

The commissioners returned an answer to the proposition brought by the chiefs, recapitulating the treaties already made, and denying the Ohio as the boundary line. On the 16th of August, the council sent them, by two Wyandot runners, a final answer, in which they recapitulated their former assertions, and exhibited great powers of reasoning and clear logic in defense of their position. The commissioners reply that it is impossible to accept the Ohio as the boundary, and declare the negotiation at an end.

This closed the efforts of the Government to negotiate with the Indians, and there remained of necessity no other mode of settling the dispute but war. Liberal terms had been offered them, but nothing but the boundary of the Ohio River would suffice. It was the only condition upon which the confederation would lay down its arms. "Among the rude statesmen of the wilderness, there was exhibited as pure patriotism and as lofty devotion to the good of their race, as ever won applause among civilized men. The white man had, ever since he came into the country, been encroaching on their lands. He had long occupied the regions beyond the mountains. He had crushed the conspiracy formed by Pontiac, thirty years before. He had taken possession of the common hunting-ground of all the tribes, on the faith of treaties they did not acknowledge. He was now laying out settlements and building forts in the heart of the country to which all the tribes had been driven, and which now was all they could call their own. And now they asked that it should be guaranteed to them, that the boundary which they had so long asked for should be drawn, and a final end be made to the continual aggressions of the whites; or, if not, they solemnly determined to stake their all, against fearful odds, in defense of their homes, their country and the inheritance of their children. Nothing could be more patriotic than the position they occupied, and nothing could be more noble than the declarations of their council."*

They did not know the strength of the whites, and based their success on the victories already gained. They hoped, nay, were promised, aid from the British, and even the Spanish had held out to them assurances of help when the hour of conflict came.

The Americans were not disposed to yield even to the confederacy of the tribes backed by the two rival nations, forming, as Wayne characterized it, a "hydra of British, Spanish and Indian hostility." On the 16th of August, the commissioners received the final answer of the council. The 17th, they left the mouth of the Detroit River, and the 23d, arrived at Fort Erie, where they immediately dispatched messengers to Gen. Wayne to inform him of the issue of the negotiation. Wayne had spent the winter of 1792-93, at Legionville, in collecting and organizing his army. April 30, 1793, the army moved down the river and encamped at a point, called by the soldiers "Hobson's choice," because from the extreme height of the river they were prevented from landing elsewhere. Here Wayne was engaged, during the negotiations for peace, in drilling his soldiers, in cutting roads, and collecting supplies for the army. He was ready for an immediate campaign in case the council failed in its object.

While here, he sent a letter to the Secretary of War, detailing the circumstances, and suggesting the probable course he should follow. He remained here during the summer, and, when apprised of the issue, saw it was too late to attempt the campaign then. He sent the Kentucky militia home, and, with his regular soldiers, went into winter quarters at a fort he built on a tributary of the Great Miami. He called the fort Greenville. The present town of Greenville is near the site of the fort. During the winter, he sent a detachment to visit the scene of St. Clair's defeat. They found more than six hundred skulls, and were obliged to "scrape the bones together and carry them out to get a place to make their beds." They buried all they could find. Wayne was steadily preparing his forces, so as to have everything ready for a sure blow when the time came. All his information showed the faith in the British which still animated the doomed red men, and gave them a hope that could end only in defeat.

The conduct of the Indians fully corroborated the statements received by Gen. Wayne. On the 30th of June, an escort of ninety riflemen and fifty dragoons, under command of Maj. McMahon, was attacked under the walls of Fort Recovery by a force of more than one thousand Indians under charge of Little Turtle. They were repulsed and badly defeated, and, the next day, driven away. Their mode of action, their arms and ammunition, all told plainly of British aid. They also expected to find the cannon lost by St. Clair November 4, 1791, but which the Americans had secured. The 26th of July, Gen. Scott, with 1,600 mounted men from Kentucky, joined Gen. Wayne at Fort Greenville, and, two days after, the legion moved forward. The 8th of August, the army reached the junction of the Auglaize and Maumee, and at once proceeded to erect Fort Defiance, where the waters meet. The Indians had abandoned their towns on the approach of the army, and were congregating further northward.

While engaged on Fort Defiance, Wayne received continual and full reports of the Indians—of their aid from Detroit and elsewhere; of the nature of the ground, and the circumstances, favorable or unfavorable. From all he could learn, and considering the spirits of his army, now thoroughly disciplined, he determined to march forward and settle matters at once. Yet, true to his own instincts, and to the measures of peace so forcibly taught by Washington, he sent Christopher Miller, who had been naturalized among the Shawanees, and taken prisoner by Wayne's spies, as a messenger of peace, offering terms of friendship.

Unwilling to waste time, the troops began to move forward the 15th of August, and the next day met Miller with the message that if the Americans would wait ten days at Auglaize the Indians would decide for peace or war. Wayne knew too well the Indian character, and answered the message by simply marching on. The 18th, the legion had advanced forty-one miles from Auglaize, and, being near the long-looked-for foe, began to take some measures for protection, should they be attacked. A slight breastwork, called Fort Deposit, was erected, wherein most of their heavy baggage was placed. They remained here, building their works, until the 20th, when, storing their baggage, the army began again its march. After advancing about five miles, they met a large force of the enemy, two thousand strong, who fiercely attacked them. Wayne was, however, prepared, and in the short battle that ensued they were routed, and large numbers slain. The American loss was very slight. The horde of savages were put to flight, leaving the Americans victorious almost under the walls of the British garrison, under Maj. Campbell. This officer sent a letter to Gen. Wayne, asking an explanation of his conduct in fighting so near, and in such evident hostility to the British. Wayne replied, telling him he was in a country that did not belong to him, and one he was not authorized to hold, and also charging him with aiding the Indians. A spirited correspondence followed, which ended in the American commander marching on, and devastating the Indian country, even burning McKee's house and stores under the muzzles of the English guns.

The 14th of September, the army marched from Fort Defiance for the Miami village at the junction of the St. Mary's and St. Joseph Rivers. It reached there on the 17th, and the next day Gen. Wayne selected a site for a fort. The 22d of October, the fort was completed, and garrisoned by a detachment under Maj. Hamtramck, who gave it the name of Fort Wayne. The 14th of October, the mounted Kentucky volunteers, who had become dissatisfied and mutinous, were started to Fort Washington, where they were immediately mustered out of service and discharged. The 28th of October, the legion marched from Fort Wayne to Fort Greenville, where Gen. Wayne at once established his headquarters.

The campaign had been decisive and short, and had taught the Indians a severe lesson. The British, too, had failed them in their hour of need, and now they began to see they had a foe to contend whose resources were exhaustless. Under these circumstances, losing faith in the English, and at last impressed with a respect for American power, after the defeat experienced at the hands of the "Black Snake," the various tribes made up their minds, by degrees, to ask for peace. During the winter and spring, they exchanged prisoners, and made ready to meet Gen. Wayne at Greenville, in June, for the purpose of forming a definite treaty, as it had been agreed should be done by the preliminaries of January 24.

During the month of June, 1795, representatives of the Northwestern tribes began to gather at Greenville, and, the 16th of the month, Gen. Wayne met in council the Delawares, Ottawas, Pottawatomies and Eel River Indians, and the conferences, which lasted till August 10, began. The 21st of June, Buckongahelas arrived; the 23d, Little Turtle and other Miamis; the 13th of July, Tarhe and other Wyandot chiefs; and the 18th, Blue Jacket, and thirteen Shawanees and Massas with twenty Chippewas.

Most of these, as it appeared by their statements, had been tampered with by the English, especially by McKee, Girty and Brant, even after the preliminaries of January 24, and while Mr. Jay was perfecting his treaty. They had, however, all determined to make peace with the "Thirteen Fires," and although some difficulty as to the ownership of the lands to be ceded, at one time seemed likely to arise, the good sense of Wayne and the leading chiefs prevented it, and, the 30th of July, the treaty was agreed to which should bury the hatchet forever. Between that day and the 3d of August, it was engrossed, and, having been signed by the various nations upon the day last named, it was finally acted upon the 7th, and the presents from the United States distributed. The basis of this treaty was the previous one made at Fort Harmar. The boundaries made at that time were re-affirmed; the whites were secured on the lands now occupied by them or secured by former treaties; and among all the assembled nations, presents, in value not less than one thousand pounds, were distributed to each through its representatives, many thousands in all. The Indians were allowed to remove and punish intruders on their lands, and were permitted to hunt on the ceded lands.

"This great and abiding peace document was signed by the various tribes, and dated August 3, 1795. It was laid before the Senate December 9, and ratified the 22d. So closed the old Indian wars in the West." *

CHAPTER VIII.

JAY'S TREATY—THE QUESTION OF STATE RIGHTS AND NATIONAL SUPREMACY—EXTENSION OF OHIO SETTLEMENTS—LAND CLAIMS—SPANISH BOUNDARY QUESTION.

WHILE these six years of Indian wars were in progress, Kentucky was admitted as a State, and Pinckney's treaty with Spain was completed. This last occurrence was of vital importance to the West, as it secured the free navigation of the Mississippi, charging only a fair price for the storage of goods at Spanish ports. This, though not all that the Americans wished, was a great gain in their favor, and did much to stop those agitations regarding a separation on the part of Kentucky. It also quieted affairs further south than Kentucky, in the Georgia and South Carolina Territory, and put an end to French and Spanish intrigue for the Western Territory. The treaty was signed November 24, 1794. Another treaty was concluded by Mr. John Jay between the two governments, Lord Greenville representing the English, and Mr. Jay, the Americans. The negotiations lasted from April to November 19, 1795, when, on that day, the treaty was signed and duly recognized. It decided effectually all the questions at issue, and was the signal for the removal of the British troops from the Northwestern outposts. This was effected as soon as the proper transfers could be made. The second article of the treaty provided that, "His Majesty will withdraw all his troops and garrisons from all posts and places within the boundary lines assigned by the treaty of peace to the United States. This evacuation shall take place on or before the 1st day of June, 1796, and all the proper measures shall be taken, in the interval, by concert, between the Government of the United States and His Majesty's Governor General in America, for settling the previous arrangements which may be necessary respecting the delivery of the said posts; the United States, in the mean time, at their discretion, extending their settlements to any part within the said boundary line, except within the precincts or jurisdiction of any of the said posts.

"All settlers and all traders within the precincts or jurisdiction of the said posts shall continue to enjoy, unmolested, all their property of every kind, and shall be protected therein. They shall be at full liberty to remain there or to remove with all, or any part, of their effects, or retain the property thereof at their discretion; such of them as shall continue to reside within the said boundary lines, shall not be compelled to become citizens of the United States, or take any oath of allegiance to the Government thereof; but they shall be at full liberty so to do, if they think proper; they shall make or declare their election one year after the evacuation aforesaid. And all persons who shall continue therein after the expiration of the said year, without having declared their intention of remaining subjects to His Britannic Majesty, shall be considered as having elected to become citizens of the United States."

The Indian war had settled all fears from that source; the treaty with Great Britain had established the boundaries between the two countries and secured peace, and the treaty with Spain had secured the privilege of navigating the Mississippi, by paying only a nominal sum. It had also bound the people of the West together, and ended the old separation question. There was no danger from that now. Another difficulty arose, however, relating to the home rule, and the organization of the home government. There were two parties in the country, known as Federalist and Anti-Federalist. One favored a central government, whose authority should be supreme; the other, only a compact, leaving the States supreme. The worthlessness of the old colonial system became, daily, more apparent. While it existed no one felt safe. There was no prospect of paying the debt, and, hence, no credit. When Mr. Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, offered his financial plan to the country, favoring centralization, it met, in many places, violent opposition. Washington was strong enough to carry it out, and gave evidence that he would do so. When, therefore, the excise law passed, and taxes on whisky were collected, an open revolt occurred in Pennsylvania, known as the "Whisky Insurrection." It was put down, finally, by military power, and the malcontents made to know that the United States was a government, not a compact liable to rupture at any time, and by any of its members. It taught the entire nation a lesson. Centralization meant preservation. Should a "compact" form of government prevail, then anarchy and ruin, and ultimate subjection to some foreign power, met their view. That they had just fought to dispel, and must it all go for naught? The people saw the rulers were right, and gradually, over the West, spread a spirit antagonistic to State supremacy. It did not revive till Jackson's time, when he, with an iron hand and iron will, crushed out the evil doctrine of State supremacy. It revived again in the late war, again to be crushed. It is to be hoped that ever thus will be its fate. "The Union is inseparable," said the Government, and the people echoed the words.

During the war, and while all these events had been transpiring, settlements had been taking place upon the Ohio, which, in their influence upon the Northwest, and especially upon the State, as soon as it was created, were deeply felt. The Virginia and the Connecticut Reserves were at this time peopled, and, also, that part of the Miami Valley about Dayton, which city dates its origin from that period.

As early as 1787, the reserved lands of the Old Dominion north of the Ohio were examined, and, in August of that year, entries were made. As no good title could be obtained from Congress at this time, the settlement practically ceased until 1790, when the prohibition to enter them was withdrawn. As soon as that was done, surveying began again. Nathaniel Massie was among the foremost men in the survey of this tract, and locating the lands, laid off a town about twelve miles above Maysville. The place was called Manchester, and yet exists. From this point, Massie continued through all the Indian war, despite the danger, to survey the surrounding country, and prepare it for settlers.

Connecticut had, as has been stated, ceded her lands, save a tract extending one hundred and twenty miles beyond the western boundary of Pennsylvania. Of this Connecticut Reserve, so far as the Indian title was extinguished, a survey was ordered in October, 1786, and an office opened for its disposal. Part was soon sold, and, in 1792, half a million of acres were given to those citizens of Connecticut who had lost property by the acts of the British troops during the Revolutionary war at New London, New Haven and elsewhere. These lands thereby became known as "Fire lands" and the "Sufferer's lands," and were located in the western part of the Reserve. In May, 1795, the Connecticut Legislature authorized a committee to dispose of the remainder of the Reserve. Before autumn the committee sold it to a company known as the Connecticut Land Company for $1,200,000, and about the 5th of September quit-claimed the land to the Company. The same day the Company received it, it sold 3,000,000 acres to John Morgan, John Caldwell and Jonathan Brace, in trust. Upon these quit-claim titles of the land all deeds in the Reserve are based. Surveys were commenced in 1796, and, by the close of the next year, all the land east of the Cuyahoga was divided into townships five miles square. The agent of the Connecticut Land Company was Gen. Moses Cleveland, and in his honor the leading city of the Reserve was named. That township and five others were reserved for private sale; the balance were disposed of by lottery, the first drawing occurring in February, 1798.

Dayton resulted from the treaty made by Wayne. It came out of the boundary ascribed to Symmes, and for a while all such lands were not recognized as sold by Congress, owing to the failure of Symmes and his associates in paying for them. Thereby there existed, for a time, considerable uneasiness regarding the title to these lands. In 1799, Congress was induced to issue patents to the actual settlers, and thus secure them in their preemption.

Seventeen days after Wayne's treaty, St. Clairs Wilkinson, Jonathan Dayton and Israel Ludlow contracted with Symmes for the seventh and eighth ranges, between Mad River and the Little Miami. Three settlements were to be made: one at the mouth of Mad River, one on the Little Miami, in the seventh range, and another on Mad River. On the 21st of September, 1795, Daniel C. Cooper started to survey and mark out a road in the purchase, and John Dunlap to run its boundaries, which was completed before October 4. On November 4, Mr. Ludlow laid off the town of Dayton, which, like land in the Connecticut Reserve, was sold by lottery.

A gigantic scheme to purchase eighteen or twenty million acres in Michigan, and then procure a good title from the Government—who alone had such a right to procure land—by giving members of Congress an interest in the investment, appeared shortly after Wayne's treaty. When some of the members were approached, however, the real spirit of the scheme appeared, and, instead of gaining ground, led to the exposure, resulting in the reprimanding severely of Robert Randall, the principal mover in the whole plan, and in its speedy disappearance.

Another enterprise, equally gigantic, also appeared. It was, however, legitimate, and hence successful. On the 20th of February, 1795, the North American Land Company was formed in Philadelphia, under the management of such patriots as Robert Morris, John Nicholson and James Greenleaf. This Company purchased large tracts in the West, which it disposed of to actual settlers, and thereby aided greatly in populating that part of the country.

Before the close of 1795, the Governor of the Territory, and his Judges, published sixty-four statutes. Thirty-four of these were adopted at Cincinnati during June, July and August of that year. They were known as the Maxwell code, from the name of the publisher, but were passed by Governor St. Clair and Judges Symmes and Turner. Among them was that which provided that the common law of England, and all its statutes, made previous to the fourth year of James the First, should be in full force within the Territory. "Of the system as a whole," says Mr. Case, "with its many imperfections, it may be doubted that any colony, at so early a period after its first establishment, ever had one so good and applicable to all."

The Union had now safely passed through its most critical period after the close of the war of independence. The danger from an irruption of its own members; of a war or alliance of its Western portion with France and Spain, and many other perplexing questions, were now effectually settled, and the population of the Territory began rapidly to increase. Before the close of the year 1796, the Northwest contained over five thousand inhabitants, the requisite number to entitle it to one representative in the national Congress.

Western Pennsylvania also, despite the various conflicting claims regarding the land titles in that part of the State, began rapidly to fill with emigrants. The "Triangle" and the "Struck District" were surveyed and put upon the market under the act of 1792. Treaties and purchases from the various Indian tribes, obtained control of the remainder of the lands in that part of the State, and, by 1796, the State owned all the land within its boundaries. Towns were laid off, land put upon the market, so that by the year 1800, the western part of the Keystone State was divided into eight counties, viz., Beaver, Butler, Mercer, Crawford, Erie, Warren, Venango and Armstrong.

The ordinance relative to the survey and disposal of lands in the Northwest Territory has already been given. It was adhered to, save in minor cases, where necessity required a slight change. The reservations were recognized by Congress, and the titles to them all confirmed to the grantees. Thus, Clarke and his men, the Connecticut Reserve, the Refugee lands, the French inhabitants, and all others holding patents to land from colonial or foreign governments, were all confirmed in their rights and protected in their titles.

Before the close of 1796, the upper Northwestern posts were all vacated by the British, under the terms of Mr. Jay's treaty. Wayne at once transferred his headquarters to Detroit, where a county was named for him, including the northwestern part of Ohio, the northeast of Indiana, and the whole of Michigan.

The occupation of the Territory by the Americans gave additional impulse to emigration, and a better feeling of security to emigrants, who followed closely upon the path of the army. Nathaniel Massie, who has already been noticed as the founder of Manchester, laid out the town of Chillicothe, on the Scioto, in 1796. Before the close of the year, it contained several stores, shops, a tavern, and was well populated. With the increase of settlement and the security guaranteed by the treaty of Greenville, the arts of civilized life began to appear, and their influence upon pioneers, especially those born on the frontier, began to manifest itself. Better dwellings, schools, churches, dress and manners prevailed. Life began to assume a reality, and lost much of that recklessness engendered by the habits of a frontier life.

Cleveland, Cincinnati, the Miami, the Muskingum and the Scioto Valleys were filling with people. Cincinnati had more than one hundred log cabins, twelve or fifteen frame houses and a population of more than six hundred persons. In 1796, the first house of worship for the Presbyterians in that city was built.

Before the close of the same year, Manchester contained over thirty families; emigrants from Virginia were going up all the valleys from the Ohio; and Ebenezer Zane had opened a bridle-path from the Ohio River, at Wheeling, across the country, by Chillicothe, to Limestone, Ky. The next year, the United States mail, for the first time, traversed this route to the West. Zane was given a section of land for his path. The population of the Territory, estimated at from five to eight thousand, was chiefly distributed in lower valleys, bordering on the Ohio River. The French still occupied the Illinois country, and were the principal inhabitants about Detroit.

South of the Ohio River, Kentucky was progressing favorably, while the "Southwestern Territory," ceded to the United States by North Carolina in 1790, had so rapidly populated that, in 1793, a Territorial form of government was allowed. The ordinance of 1787, save the clause prohibiting slavery, was adopted, and the Territory named Tennessee. On June 6, 1796, the Territory contained more than seventy-five thousand inhabitants, and was admitted into the Union as a State. Four years after, the census showed a population of 105,602 souls, including 13,584 slaves and persons of color. The same year Tennessee became a State, Samuel Jackson and Jonathan Sharpless erected the Redstone Paper Mill, four miles east of Brownsville, it being the first manufactory of the kind west of the Alleghanies.

In the month of December, 1796, Gen. Wayne, who had done so much for the development of the West, while on his way from Detroit to Philadelphia, was attacked with sickness and died in a cabin near Erie, in the north part of Pennsylvania. He was nearly fifty-one years old, and was one of the bravest officers in the Revolutionary war, and one of America's truest patriots. In 1809, his remains were removed from Erie, by his son, Col. Isaac Wayne, to the Radnor churchyard, near the place of his birth, and an elegant monument erected on his tomb by the Pennsylvania Cincinnati Society.

After the death of Wayne, Gen. Wilkinson was appointed to the command of the Western army. While he was in command, Carondelet, the Spanish governor of West Florida and Louisiana, made one more effort to separate the Union, and set up either an independent government in the West, or, what was more in accord with his wishes, effect a union with the Spanish nation. In June, 1797, he sent Power again into the Northwest and into Kentucky to sound the existing feeling. Now, however, they were not easily won over. The home government was a certainty, the breaches had been healed, and Power was compelled to abandon the mission, not, however, until he had received a severe reprimand from many who saw through his plan, and openly exposed it. His mission closed the efforts of the Spanish authorities to attempt the dismemberment of the Union, and showed them the coming downfall of their power in America. They were obliged to surrender the posts claimed by the United States under the treaty of 1795, and not many years after, sold their American possessions to the United States, rather than see a rival European power attain control over them.

On the 7th of April, 1798, Congress passed an act, appointing Winthrop Sargent, Secretary of the Northwest Territory, Governor of the Territory of the Mississippi, formed the same day. In 1801, the boundary between America and the Spanish possessions was definitely fixed. The Spanish retired from the disputed territory, and henceforward their attempts to dissolve the American Union ceased. The seat of the Mississippi Territory was fixed at Loftus Heights, six miles north of the thirty-first degree of latitude.

The appointment of Sargent to the charge of the Southwest Territory, led to the choice of William Henry Harrison, who had been aid-de-camp to Gen. Wayne in 1794, and whose character stood very high among the people of the West, to the Secretaryship of the Northwest, which place he held until appointed to represent that Territory in Congress.

CHAPTER IX.

FIRST TERRITORIAL REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS—DIVISION OF THE TERRITORY—FORMATION OF STATES—MARIETTA SETTLEMENT—OTHER SETTLEMENTS—SETTLEMENTS IN THE WESTERN RESERVE—SETTLEMENT OF THE CENTRAL VALLEYS—FURTHER SETTLEMENTS IN THE RESERVE AND ELSEWHERE.

THE ordinance of 1787 provided that as soon as there were 5,000 persons in the Territory, it was entitled to a representative assembly. On October 29, 1798, Governor St. Clair gave notice by proclamation, that the required population existed, and directed that an election be held on the third Monday in December, to choose representatives. These representatives were required, when assembled, to nominate ten persons, whose names were sent to the President of the United States, who selected five, and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed them for the legislative council. In this mode the Northwest passed into the second grade of a Territorial government.

The representatives, elected under the proclamation of St. Clair, met in Cincinnati, January 22, 1799, and under the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, nominated ten persons, whose names were sent to the President. On the 2d of March, he selected from the list of candidates, the names of Jacob Burnet, James Findlay, Henry Vanderburgh, Robert Oliver and David Vance. The next day the Senate confirmed their nomination, and the first legislative council of the Northwest Territory was a reality.

The Territorial Legislature met again at Cincinnati, September 16, but, for want of a quorum, was not organized until the 24th of that month. The House of Representatives consisted of nineteen members, of whom seven were from Hamilton County, four from Ross—erected by St. Clair in 1798; three from Wayne—erected in 1796; two from Adams—erected in 1797; one from Jefferson—erected in 1797; one from Washington—erected in 1788; and one from Knox—Indiana Territory. None seem to have been present from St. Clair County (Illinois Territory).

After the organization of the Legislature, Governor St. Clair addressed the two houses in the Representatives' Chamber, recommending such measures as, in his judgment, were suited to the condition of the country and would advance the safety and prosperity of the people.

The Legislature continued in session till the 19th of December, when, having finished their business, they were prorogued by the Governor, by their own request, till the first Monday in November, 1800. This being the first session, there was, of necessity, a great deal of business to do. The transition from a colonial to a semi-independent form of government, called for a general revision as well as a considerable enlargement of the statute-book. Some of the adopted laws were repealed, many others altered and amended, and a long list of new ones added to the code. New offices were to be created and filled, the duties attached to them prescribed, and a plan of ways and means devised to meet the increased expenditures, occasioned by the change which had now occurred.

As Mr. Burnet was the principal lawyer in the Council, much of the revision, and putting the laws into proper legal form, devolved upon him. He seems to have been well fitted for the place, and to have performed the laborious task in an excellent manner.

The whole number of acts passed and approved by the Governor, was thirty-seven. The most important related to the militia, the administration of justice, and to taxation. During the session, a bill authorizing a lottery was passed by the council, but rejected by the Legislature, thus interdicting this demoralizing feature of the disposal of lands or for other purposes. The example has always been followed by subsequent legislatures, thus honorably characterizing the Assembly of Ohio, in this respect, an example Kentucky and several other States might well emulate.

Before the Assembly adjourned, they issued a congratulatory address to the people, enjoining them to "Inculcate the principles of humanity, benevolence, honesty and punctuality in dealing, sincerity and charity, and all the social affections." At the same time, they issued an address to the President, expressing entire confidence in the wisdom and purity of his government, and their warm attachment to the American Constitution.

The vote on this address proved, however, that the differences of opinion agitating the Eastern States had penetrated the West. Eleven Representatives voted for it, and five against it.

One of the important duties that devolved on this Legislature, was the election of a delegate to Congress. As soon as the Governor's proclamation made its appearance, the election of a person to fill that position excited general attention. Before the meeting of the Legislature public opinion had settled down on William Henry Harrison, and Arthur St. Clair, Jr., who eventually were the only candidates. On the 3d of October, the two houses met and proceeded to a choice. Eleven votes were cast for Harrison, and ten for St. Clair. The Legislature prescribed the form of a certificate of the election, which was given to Harrison, who at once resigned his office as Secretary of the Territory, proceeded to Philadelphia, and took his seat, Congress being then in session.

"Though he represented the Territory but one year," says Judge Burnett, in his notes, "he obtained some important advantages for his constituents. He introduced a resolution to sub-divide the surveys of the public lands, and to offer them for sale in smaller tracts; he succeeded in getting that measure through both houses, in opposition to the interest of speculators, who were, and who wished to be, the retailers of the land to the poorer classes of the community. His proposition became a law, and was hailed as the most beneficent act that Congress had ever done for the Territory. It put in the power of every industrious man, however poor, to become a freeholder, and to lay a foundation for the future support and comfort of his family. At the same session, he obtained a liberal extension of time for the pre-emptioners in the northern part of the Miami purchase, which enabled them to secure their farms, and eventually to become independent, and even wealthy."

The first session, as has been noticed, closed December 19. Gov. St. Clair took occasion to enumerate in his speech at the close of the session, eleven acts, to which he saw fit to apply his veto. These he had not, however, returned to the Assembly, and thereby saved a long struggle between the executive and legislative branches of the Territory. Of the eleven acts enumerated, six related to the formation of new counties. These were mainly disapproved by St. Clair, as he always sturdily maintained that the power to erect new counties was vested alone in the Executive. This free exercise of the veto power, especially in relation to new counties, and his controversy with the Legislature, tended only to strengthen the popular discontent regarding the Governor, who was never fully able to regain the standing he held before his inglorious defeat in his campaign against the Indians.

While this was being agitated, another question came into prominence. Ultimately, it settled the powers of the two branches of the government, and caused the removal of St. Clair, then very distasteful to the people. The opening of the present century brought it fully before the people, who began to agitate it in all their assemblies.

The great extent of the Territory made the operations of government extremely uncertain, and the power of the courts practically worthless. Its division was, therefore, deemed best, and a committee was appointed by Congress to inquire into the matter. This committee, the 3d of March, 1800, reported upon the subject that, "In the three western counties, there has been but one court having cognizance of crimes in five years. The immunity which offenders experience, attracts, as to an asylum, the most vile and abandoned criminals, and, at the same time, deters useful and virtuous citizens from making settlements in such society. The extreme necessity of judiciary attention and assistance is experienced in civil as well as criminal cases. The supplying to vacant places such necessary officers as may be wanted, such as clerks, recorders and others of like kind, is, from the impossibility of correct notice and information, utterly neglected. This Territory is exposed as a frontier to foreign nations, whose agents can find sufficient interest in exciting or fomenting insurrection and discontent, as thereby they can more easily divert a valuable trade in furs from the United States, and also have a part thereof on which they border, which feels so little the cherishing hand of their proper government, or so little dreads its energy, as to render their attachment perfectly uncertain and ambiguous.

"The committee would further suggest, that the law of the 3d of March, 1791, granting land to certain persons in the western part of said Territory, and directing the laying-out of the same, remains unexecuted; that great discontent, in consequence of such neglect, is excited in those who are interested in the provisions of said laws, which require the immediate attention of this Legislature. To minister a remedy to these evils, it occurs to this committee, that it is expedient that a division of said Territory into two distinct and separate governments should be made; and that such division be made by a line beginning at the mouth of the great Miami River, running directly north until it intersects the boundary between the United States and Canada."*

The recommendations of the committee were favorably received by Congress, and, the 7th of May, an act was passed dividing the Territory. The main provisions of the act are as follows:

"That, from and after the 4th of July next, all that part of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, which lies to the westward of a line beginning at the Ohio, opposite to the mouth of the Kentucky River, and running thence to Fort Recovery, and thence north until it intersects the territorial line between the United States and Canada, shall, for the purpose of temporary government, constitute a separate Territory, and be called the Indiana Territory.

"There shall be established within the said Territory a government, in all respects similar to that provided by the ordinance of Congress passed July 13, 1797."†

The act further provided for representatives, and for the establishment of an assembly, on the same plan as that in force in the Northwest, stipulating that until the number of inhabitants reached five thousand, the whole number of representatives to the General Assembly should not be less than seven, nor more than nine; apportioned by the Governor among the several counties in the new Territory.

The act further provided that "nothing in the act should be so construed, so as in any manner to affect the government now in force in the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, further than to prohibit the exercise thereof within the Indiana Territory, from and after the aforesaid 4th of July next.

"Whenever that part of the territory of the United States, which lies to the eastward of a line beginning at the mouth of the Great Miami River, and running thence due north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada, shall be erected into an independent State, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; thenceforth said line shall become and remain permanently, the boundary line between such State and the Indiana Territory."

It was further enacted, "that, until it shall be otherwise enacted by the legislatures of the said territories, respectively, Chillicothe, on the Scioto River, shall be the seat of government of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River; and that St. Vincent's, on the Wabash River, shall be the seat of government for the Indiana Territory."*

St. Clair was continued as Governor of the old Territory, and William Henry Harrison appointed Governor of the new.

Connecticut, in ceding her territory in the West to the General Government, reserved a portion, known as the Connecticut Reserve. When she afterward disposed of her claim in the manner narrated, the citizens found themselves without any government on which to lean for support. At that time, settlements had begun in thirty-five of the townships into which the Reserve had been divided; one thousand persons had established homes there; mills had been built, and over seven hundred miles of roads opened. In 1800, the settlers petitioned for acceptance into the Union, as a part of the Northwest; and, the mother State releasing her judiciary claims, Congress accepted the trust, and granted the request. In December, of that year, the population had so increased that the county of Trumbull was erected, including the Reserve. Soon after, a large number of settlers came from Pennsylvania, from which State they had been driven by the dispute concerning land titles in its western part. Unwilling to cultivate land to which they could only get a doubtful deed, they abandoned it, and came where the titles were sure.

Congress having made Chillicothe the capital of the Northwest Territory, as it now existed, on the 3d of November the General Assembly met at that place. Gov. St. Clair had been made to feel the odium cast upon his previous acts, and, at the opening of this session, expressed, in strong terms, his disapprobation of the censure cast upon him. He had endeavored to do his duty in all cases, he said, and yet held the confidence of the President and Congress. He still held the office, notwithstanding the strong dislike against him.

At the second session of the Assembly, at Chillicothe, held in the autumn of 1801, so much outspoken enmity was expressed, and so much abuse heaped upon the Governor and the Assembly, that a law was passed, removing the capital to Cincinnati.

again. It was not destined, however, that the Territorial Assembly should meet again anywhere. The unpopularity of the Governor caused many to long for a State government, where they could choose their own rulers. The unpopularity of St. Clair arose partly from the feeling connected with his defeat; in part from his being connected with the Federal party, fast falling into disrepute; and, in part, from his assuming powers which most thought he had no right to exercise, especially the power of subdividing the counties of the Territory.

The opposition, though powerful out of the Assembly, was in the minority there. During the month of December, 1801, it was forced to protest against a measure brought forward in the Council, for changing the ordinance of 1787 in such a manner as to make the Scioto, and a line drawn from the intersection of that river and the Indian boundary to the western extremity of the Reserve, the limits of the most eastern State, to be formed from the Territory. Had this change been made, the formation of a State government beyond the Ohio would have been long delayed. Against it, Representatives Worthington, Langham, Darlington, Massie, Dunlavy and Morrow, recorded their protest. Not content with this, they sent Thomas Worthington, who obtained a leave of absence, to the seat of government, on behalf of the objectors, there to protest, before Congress, against the proposed boundary. While Worthington was on his way, Massie presented, the 4th of January, 1802, a resolution for choosing a committee to address Congress in respect to the proposed State government. This, the next day, the House refused to do, by a vote of twelve to five. An attempt was next made to procure a census of the Territory, and an act for that purpose passed the House, but the Council postponed the consideration of it until the next session, which would commence at Cincinnati, the fourth Monday of November.

Meanwhile, Worthington pursued the ends of his mission, using his influence to effect that organization, "which, terminating the influence of tyranny," was to "meliorate the circumstances of thousands, by freeing them from the domination of a despotic chief." His efforts were successful, and, the 4th of March, a report was made to the House in favor of authorizing a State convention. This report was based on the assumption that there were now over sixty thousand inhabitants in the proposed boundaries, estimating that emigration had increased the census of 1800, which gave the Territory forty-five thousand inhabitants, to that number. The convention was to ascertain whether it were expedient to form such a government, and to prepare a constitution if such organization were deemed best. In the formation of the State, a change in the boundaries was proposed, by which all the territory north of a line drawn due east from the head of Lake Michigan to Lake Erie was to be excluded from the new government about to be called into existence.

The committee appointed by Congress to report upon the feasibility of forming the State, suggested that Congress reserve out of every township sections numbered 8, 11, 26 and 29, for their own use, and that Section 16 be reserved for the maintenance of schools. The committee also suggested, that, "religion, education and morality being necessary to the good government and happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged."

Various other recommendations were given by the committee, in accordance with which, Congress, April 30, passed the resolution authorizing the calling of a convention. As this accorded with the feelings of the majority of the inhabitants of the Northwest, no opposition was experienced; even the Legislature giving way to this embryo government, and failing to assemble according to adjournment.

The convention met the 1st of November. Its members were generally Jeffersonian in their national politics, and had been opposed to the change of boundaries proposed the year before. Before proceeding to business, Gov. St. Clair proposed to address them in his official character. This proposition was resisted by several of the members; but, after a motion, it was agreed to allow him to speak to them as a citizen. St. Clair did so, advising the postponement of a State government until the people of the original eastern division were plainly entitled to demand it, and were not subject to be bound by conditions. This advice, given as it was, caused Jefferson instantly to remove St. Clair, at which time his office ceased.* "When the vote was taken," says Judge Burnet, "upon doing what

* After this, St. Clair returned to his old home in the Ligonier Valley, Pennsylvania, where he lived with his children in almost abject poverty. He had lost money in his public life, as he gave close attention to public affairs, to the detriment of his own business. He presented a claim to Congress, afterward, for supplies furnished to the army, but the claim was outlawed. After trying in vain to get the claim allowed, he returned to his home. Pennsylvania, learning of his distress, granted him an annuity of $350, afterward raised to $600. He lived to enjoy this but a short time, his death occurring August 31, 1818. He was eighty-four years of age.

he advised them not to do, but one of thirty-three (Ephraim Cutler, of Washington County) voted with the Governor."

On one point only were the proposed boundaries of the new State altered.

"To every person who has attended to this subject, and who has consulted the maps of the Western country extant at the time the ordinance of 1787 was passed, Lake Michigan was believed to be, and was represented by all the maps of that day as being, very far north of the position which it has since been ascertained to occupy. I have seen the map in the Department of State which was before the committee of Congress who framed and reported the ordinance for the government of the Territory. On that map, the southern boundary of Michigan was represented as being above the forty-second degree of north latitude. And there was a pencil line, said to have been made by the committee, passing through the southern bend of the lake to the Canada line, which struck the strait not far below the town of Detroit. The line was manifestly intended by the committee and by Congress to be the northern boundary of our State; and, on the principles by which courts of chancery construe contracts, accompanied by plats, it would seem that the map, and the line referred to, should be conclusive evidence of our boundary, without reference to the real position of the lakes.

"When the convention sat, in 1802, the understanding was, that the old maps were nearly correct, and that the line, as defined in the ordinance, would terminate at some point on the strait above the Maumee Bay. While the convention was in session, a man who had hunted many years on Lake Michigan, and was well acquainted with its position, happened to be in Chillicothe, and, in conversation with one of the members, told him that the lake extended much farther south than was generally supposed, and that a map of the country which he had seen, placed its southern bend many miles north of its true position. This information excited some uneasiness, and induced the convention to modify the clause describing the north boundary of the new State, so as to guard against its being depressed below the most northern cape of the Maumee Bay."*

their agreement was ratified and signed, as was also the constitution of the State of Ohio—so named from its river, called by the Shawanees Ohio, meaning beautiful—forming its southern boundary. Of this nothing need be said, save that it bore the marks of true democratic feeling—of full faith in the people. By them, however, it was never voted for. It stood firm until 1852, when it was superseded by the present one, made necessary by the advance of time.

The General Assembly was required to meet at Chillicothe, the first Tuesday of March, 1803. This change left the territory northwest of the Ohio River, not included in the new State, in the Territories of Indiana and Michigan. Subsequently, in 1816, Indiana was made a State, and confined to her present limits. Illinois was made a Territory then, including Wisconsin. In 1818, it became a State, and Wisconsin a Territory attached to Michigan. This latter was made a State in 1837, and Wisconsin a separate Territory, which, in 1847, was made a State. Minnesota was made a Territory the same year, and a State in 1857, and the five contemplated States of the territory were complete.

Preceding pages have shown how the territory north of the Ohio River was peopled by the French and English, and how it came under the rule of the American people. The war of the Revolution closed in 1783, and left all America in the hands of a new nation. That nation brought a change. Before the war, various attempts had been made by residents in New England to people the country west of the Alleghanies. Land companies were formed, principal among which were the Ohio Company, and the company of which John Cleves Symmes was the agent and chief owner. Large tracts of land on the Scioto and on the Ohio were entered. The Ohio Company were the first to make a settlement. It was organized in the autumn of 1787, November 27. They made arrangements for a party of forty-seven men to set out for the West under the supervision of Gen. Rufus Putnam, Superintendent of the Company. Early in the winter they advanced to the Youghiogeny River, and there built a strong boat, which they named "Mayflower." It was built by Capt. Jonathan Devol, the first ship-builder in the West, and, when completed, was placed under his command. The boat was launched April 2, 1788, and the band of pioneers, like the Pilgrim Fathers, began their voyage. The 7th of the month, they arrived at the mouth of the Muskingum, their destination, opposite Fort Harmar,* erected in the autumn of 1785, by a detachment of United States troops, under command of Maj. John Doughty, and, at the date of the Mayflower's arrival in possession of a company of soldiers. Under the protection of these troops, the little band of men began their labor of laying out a town, and commenced to erect houses for their own and subsequent emigrants' occupation. The names of these pioneers of Ohio, as far as can now be learned, are as follows:

Gen. Putnam, Return Jonathan Meigs, Winthrop Sargeant (Secretary of the Territory), Judges Parsons and Varnum, Capt. Dana, Capt. Jonathan Devol, Joseph Barker, Col. Battelle, Maj. Tyler, Dr. True, Capt. Wm. Gray, Capt. Lunt, the Bridges, Ebenezer and Thomas Cory, Andrew McClure, Wm. Mason, Thomas Lord, Wm. Gridley, Gilbert Devol, Moody Russels, Deavens, Oakes, Wright, Clough, Green, Shipman, Dorance, the Masons, and others, whose names are now beyond recall.

On the 19th of July, the first boat of families arrived, after a nine-weeks journey on the way. They had traveled in their wagons as far as Wheeling, where they built large flat-boats, into which they loaded their effects, including their cattle, and thence passed down the Ohio to their destination. The families were those of Gen. Tupper, Col. Ichabod Nye, Col. Cushing, Maj. Coburn, and Maj. Goodale. In these titles the reader will observe the preponderance of military distinction. Many of the founders of the colony had served with much valor in the war for freedom, and were well prepared for a life in the wilderness.

They began at once the construction of houses from the forests about the confluence of the rivers, guarding their stock by day and penning it by night. Wolves, bears and Indians were all about them, and, here in the remote wilderness, they were obliged to always be on their guard. From the ground where they obtained the timber to erect their houses, they soon produced a few vegetables, and when the families arrived in August, they were able to set before them food raised for the first time by the hand of American citizens in the Ohio Valley. One of those who came in August, was Mr. Thomas Guthrie, a settler in one of the western counties of Pennsylvania, who brought a bushel of wheat, which he sowed on a plat of ground cleared by himself, and from which that fall he procured a small crop of wheat, the first grown in the State of Ohio.

The Marietta settlement was the only one made that summer in the Territory. From their arrival until October, when Governor St. Clair came, they were busily employed making houses, and preparing for the winter. The little colony, of which Washington wrote so favorably, met on the 2d day of July, to name their newborn city and its public squares. Until now it had been known as "The Muskingum" simply, but on that day the name Marietta was formally given to it, in honor of Marie Antoinette. The 4th of July, an ovation was held, and an oration delivered by James M. Varnum, who, with S. H. Parsons and John Armstrong, had been appointed Judges of the Territory. Thus, in the heart of the wilderness, miles away from any kindred post, in the forests of the Great West, was the Tree of Liberty watered and given a hearty growth.

On the morning of the 9th of July, Governor St. Clair arrived, and the colony began to assume form. The ordinance of 1787 had provided for a form of government under the Governor and the three Judges, and this form was at once put into force. The 25th, the first law relating to the militia was published, and the next day the Governor's proclamation appeared, creating all the country that had been ceded by the Indians, east of the Scioto River, into the county of Washington, and the civil machinery was in motion. From that time forward, this, the pioneer settlement in Ohio, went on prosperously. The 2d of September, the first court in the Territory was held, but as it related to the Territory, a narrative of its proceedings will be found in the history of that part of the country, and need not be repeated here.

The 15th of July, Gov. St. Clair had published the ordinance of 1787, and the commissions of himself and the three Judges. He also assembled the people of the settlement, and explained to them the ordinance in a speech of considerable length. Three days after, he sent a notice to the Judges, calling their attention to the subject of organizing the militia. Instead of attending to this important matter, and thus providing for their safety should trouble with the Indians arise, the

*The outlines of Fort Harmar formed a regular pentagon, embracing within the area about three-fourths of an acre. Its walls were formed of large horizontal timbers, and the bastions of large upright timbers about fourteen feet in height, fastened to each other by strips of timber, tree-nailed into each picket. In the rear of the fort Maj. Doughty laid out five gardens. It continued to be occupied by United States troops until September 1790, when they were ordered to Cincinnati. A company, under Capt. Haskell, continued to make the fort their headquarters during the Indian war, occasionally assisting the colonists at Marietta, Belpre and Waterford against the Indians. When not needed by the troops, the fort was used by the people of Marietta.

Judges did not even reply to the Governor's letter, but sent him what they called a "project" of a law for dividing real estate. The bill was so loosely drawn that St. Clair immediately rejected it, and set about organizing the militia himself. He divided the militia into two classes, "Senior" and "Junior," and organized them by appointing their officers.

In the Senior Class, Nathan Cushing was appointed Captain; George Ingersol, Lieutenant, and James Backus, Ensign.

In the Junior Class, Nathan Goodale and Charles Knowls were made Captains; Watson Casey and Samuel Stebbins, Lieutenants, and Joseph Lincoln and Arnold Colt, Ensigns.

The Governor next erected the Courts of Probate and Quarter Sessions, and proceeded to appoint civil officers. Rufus Putnam, Benjamin Tupper and Winthrop Sargeant were made Justices of the Peace. The 30th of August, the day the Court of Quarter Sessions was appointed, Archibald Cary, Isaac Pierce and Thomas Lord were also appointed Justices, and given power to hold this court. They were, in fact, Judges of a Court of Common Pleas. Return Jonathan Meigs was appointed Clerk of this Court of Quarter Sessions. Ebenezer Sproat was appointed Sheriff of Washington County, and also Colonel of the militia; William Callis, Clerk of the Supreme Court; Rufus Putnam, Judge of the Probate Court, and R. J. Meigs, Jr., Clerk. Following these appointments, setting the machinery of government in motion, St. Clair ordered that the 25th of December be kept as a day of thanksgiving by the infant colony for its safe and propitious beginning.

During the fall and winter, the settlement was daily increased by emigrants, so much so, that the greatest difficulty was experienced in finding them lodging. During the coldest part of the winter, when ice covered the river, and prevented navigation, a delay in arrivals was experienced, only to be broken as soon as the river opened to the beams of a spring sun. While locked in the winter's embrace, the colonists amused themselves in various ways, dancing being one of the most prominent. At Christmas, a grand ball was held, at which there were fifteen ladies, "whose grace," says a narrator, "equaled any in the East." Though isolated in the wilderness, they knew a brilliant prospect lay before them, and lived on in a joyous hope for the future.

Soon after their arrival, the settlers began the erection of a stockade fort (Campus Martius), which occupied their time until the winter of 1791. During the interval, fortunately, no hostilities from the Indians were experienced, though they were abundant, and were frequent visitors to the settlement.

From a communication in the American Pioneer, by Dr. S. P. Hildreth, the following description of Campus Martius is derived. As it will apply, in a measure, to many early structures for defense in the West, it is given entire:

"The fort was made in the form of a regular parallelogram, the sides of each being 180 feet. At each corner was erected a strong block-house, surmounted by a tower, and a sentry box. These houses were twenty feet square below and twenty-four feet square above, and projected six feet beyond the walls of the fort. The intermediate walls were made up with dwelling-houses, made of wood, whose ends were whip-sawed into timbers four inches thick, and of the requisite width and length. These were laid up similar to the structure of log houses, with the ends nicely dove-tailed together. The whole were two stories high, and covered with shingle roofs. Convenient chimneys were erected of bricks, for cooking, and warming the rooms. A number of the dwellings were built and owned by individuals who had families. In the west and south fronts were strong gateways; and over the one in the center of the front looking to the Muskingum River, was a belfry. The chamber beneath was occupied by Winthrop Sargeant, as an office, he being Secretary to the Governor, and performing the duties of the office during St. Clair's absence. This room projected over the gateway, like a block-house, and was intended for the protection of the gate beneath, in time of an assault. At the outer corner of each block-house was erected a bastion, standing on four stout timbers. The floor of the bastion was a little above the lower story of the block-house. They were square, and built up to the height of a man's head, so that, when he looked over, he stepped on a narrow platform or "banquet" running around the sides of the bulwark. Port-holes were made, for musketry as well as for artillery, a single piece of which was mounted in the southwest and northeast bastions. In these, the sentries were regularly posted every night, as more convenient than the towers; a door leading into them from the upper story of the block-houses. The lower room of the southwest block-house was occupied as a guard-house.

"Running from corner to corner of the block-houses was a row of palisades, sloping outward, and resting on stout rails. Twenty feet in advance of these, was a row of very strong and large pickets, set upright in the earth. Gateways through these, admitted the inmates of the garrison. A few feet beyond the row of outer palisades was placed a row of abattis, made from the tops and branches of trees, sharpened and pointing outward, so that it would have been very difficult for an enemy to have penetrated within their outworks. The dwelling-houses occupied a space from fifteen to thirty feet each, and were sufficient for the accommodation of forty or fifty families, and did actually contain from two hundred to three hundred persons during the Indian war.

"Before the Indians commenced hostilities, the block-houses were occupied as follows: The southwest one, by the family of Gov. St. Clair; the northeast one as an office for the Directors of the Company. The area within the walls was one hundred and forty-four feet square, and afforded a fine parade ground. In the center, was a well eighty feet in depth, for the supply of water to the inhabitants, in case of a siege. A large sun-dial stood for many years in the square, placed on a handsome post, and gave note of the march of time.

"After the war commenced, a regular military corps was organized, and a guard constantly kept night and day. The whole establishment formed a very strong work, and reflected great credit on the head that planned it. It was in a manner impregnable to the attacks of Indians, and none but a regular army with cannon could have reduced it. The Indians possessed no such an armament.

"The garrison stood on the verge of that beautiful plain overlooking the Muskingum, on which are seated those celebrated remains of antiquity, erected probably for a similar purpose—the defense of the inhabitants. The ground descends into shallow ravines on the north and south sides; on the west is an abrupt descent to the river bottoms or alluvium, and the east passed out to a level plain. On this, the ground was cleared of trees beyond the reach of rifle shots, so as to afford no shelter to a hidden foe. Extensive fields of corn were grown in the midst of the standing girdled trees beyond, in after years. The front wall of palisades was about one hundred and fifty yards from the Muskingum River. The appearance of the fort from without was imposing, at a little distance resembling the military castles of the feudal ages. Between the outer palisades and the river were laid out neat gardens for the use of Gov. St. Clair and his Secretary, with the officers of the Company.

"Opposite the fort, on the shore of the river, was built a substantial timber wharf, at which was moored a fine cedar barge for twelve rowers, built by Capt. Jonathan Devol, for Gen. Putnam; a number of pirogues, and the light canoes of the country; and last, not least, the Mayflower, or 'Adventure Galley,' in which the first detachments of colonists were transported from the shores of the 'Yohiogany' to the banks of the Muskingum. In these, especially the canoes, during the war, most of the communications were carried on between the settlements of the Company and the more remote towns above on the Ohio River. Traveling by land was very hazardous to any but the rangers or spies. There were no roads, nor bridges across the creeks, and, for many years after the war had ceased, the traveling was nearly all done by canoes on the river."

Thus the first settlement of Ohio provided for its safety and comfort, and provided also for that of emigrants who came to share the toils of the wilderness.

The next spring, the influx of emigration was so great that other settlements were determined, and hence arose the colonies of Belpre, Waterford and Duck Creek, where they began to clear land, sow and plant crops, and build houses and stockades. At Belpre (French for "beautiful meadow"), were built three stockades, the upper, lower and middle, the last of which was called "Farmers' Castle," and stood on the banks of the Ohio, nearly opposite an island, afterward famous in Western history as Blennerhasset's Island, the scene of Burr's conspiracy. Among the persons settling at the upper stockade, were Capts. Dana and Stone, Col. Bent, William Browning, Judge Foster, John Rowse, Israel Stone and a Mr. Keppel. At the Farmers' Castle, were Cols. Cushing and Fisher, Maj. Haskell, Aaron Waldo Putnam, Mr. Sparhawk, and, it is believed, George and Israel Putnam, Jr. At the lower, were Maj. Goodale, Col. Rice, Esquire Pierce, Judge Israel Loring, Deacon Miles, Maj. Bradford and Mr. Goodenow. In the summer of 1789, Col. Ichabod Nye and some others, built a block-house at Newberry, below Belpre. Col. Nye sold his lot there to Aaron W. Clough, who, with Stephen Guthrie, Joseph Leavins, Joel Oakes, Eleazer Curtis, Mr. Denham J. Littleton and Mr. Brown, was located at that place.

"Every exertion possible," says Dr. Hildreth, who has preserved the above names and incidents,

"for men in these circumstances, was made to secure food for future difficulties. Col. Oliver, Maj. Hatfield White and John Dodge, of the Waterford settlement, began mills on Wolf Creek, about three miles from the fort, and got them running; and these, the first mills in Ohio, were never destroyed during the subsequent Indian war, though the proprietors removed their families to the fort at Marietta. Col. E. Sproat and Enoch Shepherd began mills on Duck Creek, three miles from Marietta, from the completion of which they were driven by the Indian war. Thomas Stanley began mills farther up, near the Duck Creek settlement. These were likewise unfinished. The Ohio Company built a large horse mill near Campus Martius, and soon after a floating mill."

The autumn before the settlements at Belpre, Duck Creek and Waterford, were made, a colony was planted near the mouth of the Little Miami River, on a tract of ten thousand acres, purchased from Symmes by Maj. Benjamin Stites. In the preceding pages may be found a history of Symmes' purchase. This colony may be counted the second settlement in the State. Soon after the colony at Marietta was founded, steps were taken to occupy separate portions of Judge Symmes' purchase, between the Miami Rivers. Three parties were formed for this purpose, but, owing to various delays, chiefly in getting the present colony steadfast and safe from future encroachments by the savages, they did not get started till late in the fall. The first of these parties, consisting of fifteen or twenty men, led by Maj. Stites, landed at the mouth of the Little Miami in November, 1788, and, constructing a log fort, began to lay out a village, called by them Columbia. It soon grew into prominence, and, before winter had thoroughly set in, they were well prepared for a frontier life. In the party were Cols. Spencer and Brown, Majs. Gano and Kibbey, Judges Goforth and Foster, Rev. John Smith, Francis Dunlavy, Capt. Flinn, Jacob White, John Riley, and Mr. Hubbell.

All these were men of energy and enterprise, and, with their comrades, were more numerous than either of the other parties, who commenced their settlements below them on the Ohio. This village was also, at first, more flourishing; and, for two or three years, contained more inhabitants than any other in the Miami purchase.

The second Miami party was formed at Limestone, under Matthias Denham and Robert Patterson, and consisted of twelve or fifteen persons. They landed on the north bank of the Ohio, opposite the mouth of the Licking River, the 24th of December, 1788. They intended to establish a station and lay out a town on a plan prepared at Limestone. Some statements affirm that the town was to be called "Los-anti-ville," by a romantic school-teacher named Filson. However, be this as it may, Mr. Filson was, unfortunately for himself, not long after, slain by the Indians, and, with him probably, the name disappeared. He was to have one-third interest in the proposed city, which, when his death occurred, was transferred to Israel Ludlow, and a new plan of a city adopted. Israel Ludlow surveyed the proposed town, whose lots were principally donated to settlers upon certain conditions as to settlement and improvement, and the embryo city named Cincinnati. Gov. St. Clair very likely had something to do with the naming of the village, and, by some, it is asserted that he changed the name from Losantiville to Cincinnati, when he created the county of Hamilton the ensuing winter. The original purchase of the city's site was made by Mr. Denham. It included about eight hundred acres, for which he paid 5 shillings per acre in Continental certificates, then worth, in specie, about 5 shillings per pound, gross weight. Evidently, the original site was a good investment, could Mr. Denham have lived long enough to see its present condition.

The third party of settlers for the Miami purchase, were under the care of Judge Symmes, himself. They left Limestone, January 29, 1789, and were much delayed on their downward journey by the ice in the river. They reached the "Bend," as it was then known, early in February. The Judge had intended to found a city here, which, in time, would be the rival of the Atlantic cities. As each of the three settlements aspired to the same position, no little rivalry soon manifested itself. The Judge named his proposed city North Bend, from the fact that it was the most northern bend in the Ohio below the mouth of the Great Kanawha. These three settlements antedated, a few months, those made near Marietta, already described. They arose so soon after, partly from the extreme desire of Judge Symmes to settle his purchase, and induce emigration here instead of on the Ohio Company's purchase. The Judge labored earnestly for this purpose and to further secure him in his title to the land he had acquired, all of which he had so far been unable to retain, owing to his inability to meet his payments.

All these emigrants came down the river in the flat-boats of the day, rude affairs, sometimes called

"Arks," and then the only safe mode of travel in the West.

Judge Symmes found he must provide for the safety of the settlers on his purchase, and, after earnestly soliciting Gen. Harmar, commander of the Western posts, succeeded in obtaining a detachment of forty-eight men, under Capt. Kearsey, to protect the improvements just commencing on the Miami. This detachment reached Limestone in December, 1788. Part was at once sent forward to guard Maj. Stites and his pioneers. Judge Symmes and his party started in January, and, about February 2, reached Columbia, where the Captain expected to find a fort erected for his use and shelter. The flood on the river, however, defeated his purpose, and, as he was unprepared to erect another, he determined to go on down to the garrison at the falls at Louisville. Judge Symmes was strenuously opposed to his conduct, as it left the colonies unguarded, but, all to no purpose; the Captain and his command, went to Louisville early in March, and left the Judge and his settlement to protect themselves. Judge Symmes immediately sent a strong letter to Maj. Willis, commanding at the Falls, complaining of the conduct of Capt. Kearsey, representing the exposed situation of the Miami settlements, stating the indications of hostility manifested by the Indians, and requesting a guard to be sent to the Bend. This request was at once granted, and Ensign Luce, with seventeen or eighteen soldiers, sent. They were at the settlement but a short time, when they were attacked by Indians, and one of their number killed, and four or five wounded. They repulsed the savages and saved the settlers.

The site of Symmes City, for such he designed it should ultimately be called, was above the reach of water, and sufficiently level to admit of a convenient settlement. The city laid out by Symmes was truly magnificent on paper, and promised in the future to fulfill his most ardent hopes. The plat included the village, and extended across the peninsula between the Ohio and Miami Rivers. Each settler on this plat was promised a lot if he would improve it, and in conformity to the stipulation, Judge Symmes soon found a large number of persons applying for residence. As the number of these adventurers increased, in consequence of this provision and the protection of the military, the Judge was induced to lay out another village six or seven miles up the river, which he called South Bend, where he disposed of some donation lots, but the project failing, the village site was deserted, and converted into a farm.

During all the time these various events were transpiring, but little trouble was experienced with the Indians. They were not yet disposed to evince hostile feelings. This would have been their time, but, not realizing the true intent of the whites until it was too late to conquer them, they allowed them to become prepared to withstand a warfare, and in the end were obliged to suffer their hunting-grounds to be taken from them, and made the homes of a race destined to entirely supercede them in the New World.

By the means sketched in the foregoing pages, were the three settlements on the Miami made. By the time those adjacent to Marietta were well established, these were firmly fixed, each one striving to become the rival city all felt sure was to arise. For a time it was a matter of doubt which of the rivals, Columbia, North Bend or Cincinnati, would eventually become the chief seat of business.

In the beginning, Columbia, the eldest of the three, took the lead, both in number of its inhabitants and the convenience and appearance of its dwellings. For a time it was a flourishing place, and many believed it would become the great business town of the Miami country. That apparent fact, however, lasted but a short time. The garrison was moved to Cincinnati, Fort Washington built there, and in spite of all that Maj. Stites, or Judge Symmes could do, that place became the metropolis. Fort Washington, the most extensive garrison in the West, was built by Maj. Doughty, in the summer of 1789, and from that time the growth and future greatness of Cincinnati were assured.

The first house in the city was built on Front street, east of and near Main street. It was simply a strong log cabin, and was erected of the forest trees cleared away from the ground on which it stood. The lower part of the town was covered with sycamore and maple trees, and the upper with beech and oak. Through this dense forest the streets were laid out, and their corners marked on the trees.

The settlements on the Miami had become sufficiently numerous to warrant a separate county, and, in January, 1790, Gov. St. Clair and his Secretary arrived in Cincinnati, and organized the county of Hamilton, so named in honor of the illustrious statesman by that name. It included all the country north of the Ohio, between the Miamis, as far as a line running "due east from the Standing Stone forks" of Big Miami to its intersection with the Little Miami. The erection of the new county, and the appointment of Cincinnati to be the seat of justice, gave the town a fresh impulse, and aided greatly in its growth.

Through the summer, but little interruption in the growth of the settlements occurred. The Indians had permitted the erection of defensive works in their midst, and could not now destroy them. They were also engaged in traffic with the whites, and, though they evinced signs of discontent at their settlement and occupation of the country, yet did not openly attack them. The truth was, they saw plainly the whites were always prepared, and no opportunity was given them to plunder and destroy. The Indian would not attack unless success was almost sure. An opportunity, unfortunately, came, and with it the horrors of an Indian war.

In the autumn of 1790, a company of thirty-six men went from Marietta to a place on the Muskingum known as the Big Bottom. Here they built a block-house, on the east bank of the river, four miles above the mouth of Meigs Creek. They were chiefly young, single men, but little acquainted with Indian warfare or military rules. The savages had given signs that an attack on the settlement was meditated, and several of the knowing ones at the strongholds strenuously opposed any new settlements that fall, advising their postponement until the next spring, when the question of peace or war would probably be settled. Even Gen. Putnam and the Directors of the Ohio Company advised the postponement of the settlement until the next spring.

The young men were impatient and restless, and declared themselves able to protect their fort against any number of assailants. They might have easily done so, had they taken the necessary precautions; but, after they had erected a rude block-house of unchinked logs, they began to pass the time in various pursuits; setting no guard, and taking no precautionary measures, they left themselves an easy prey to any hostile savages that might choose to come and attack them.

About twenty rods from the block-house, and a little back from the bank of the river, two men, Francis and Isaac Choate, members of the company, had erected a cabin, and commenced clearing lots. Thomas Shaw, a hired laborer, and James Patten, another of the associates, lived with them. About the same distance below the block-house was an old "Tomahawk Improvement" and a small cabin, which two men, Asa and Eleazar Bullard, had fitted up and occupied. The Indian war-path, from Sandusky to the mouth of the Muskingum, passed along the opposite shore of the river.

"The Indians, who, during the summer," says Dr. Hildreth, "had been hunting and loitering about the Wolf Creek and Plainfield settlements, holding frequent and friendly intercourse with the settlers, selling them venison and bear's meat in exchange for green corn and vegetables, had withdrawn and gone up the river, early in the autumn, to their towns, preparatory to going into winter quarters. They very seldom entered on any warlike expeditions during the cold weather. But they had watched the gradual encroachment of the whites and planned an expedition against them. They saw them in fancied security in their cabins, and thought their capture an easy task. It is said they were not aware of the Big Bottom settlement until they came in sight of it, on the opposite shore of the river, in the afternoon. From a high hill opposite the garrison, they had a view of all that part of the bottom, and could see how the men were occupied and what was doing about the block-house. It was not protected with palisades or pickets, and none of the men were aware or prepared for an attack. Having laid their plans, about twilight they crossed the river above the garrison, on the ice, and divided their men into two parties—the larger one to attack the block-house, the smaller one to capture the cabins. As the Indians cautiously approached the cabin they found the inmates at supper. Part entered, addressed the whites in a friendly manner, but soon manifesting their designs, made them all prisoners, tying them with leather thongs they found in the cabin."

At the block-house the attack was far different. A stout Mohawk suddenly burst open the door, the first intimation the inmates had of the presence of the foe, and while he held it open his comrades shot down those that were within. Rushing in, the deadly tomahawk completed the onslaught. In the assault, one of the savages was struck by the wife of Isaac Woods, with an ax, but only slightly injured. The heroic woman was immediately slain. All the men but two were slain before they had time to secure their arms, thereby paying for their failure to properly secure themselves, with their lives. The two excepted were John Stacy and his brother Philip, a lad sixteen years of age. John escaped to the roof, where he was shot by the Indians, while begging for his life. The firing at the block-house alarmed the Bullards in their cabin, and hastily barring the door, and securing their arms and ammunition, they fled to the woods, and escaped. After the slaughter was over, the Indians began to collect the plunder, and in doing so discovered the lad Philip Stacy. They were about to dispatch him, but his entreaties softened the heart of one of the chiefs, who took him as a captive with the intention of adopting him into his family. The savages then piled the dead bodies on the floor, covered them with other portions of it not needed for that purpose, and set fire to the whole. The building, being made of green logs, did not burn, the flames consuming only the floors and roof, leaving the walls standing.

There were twelve persons killed in this attack, all of whom were in the prime of life, and valuable aid to the settlements. They were well provided with arms, and had they taken the necessary precautions, always pressed upon them when visited by the older ones from Marietta, they need not have suffered so terrible a fate.

The Indians, exultant over their horrible victory, went on to Wolf's mills, but here they found the people prepared, and, after reconnoitering the place, made their retreat, at early dawn, to the great relief of the inhabitants. Their number was never definitely known.

The news reached Marietta and its adjacent settlements soon after the massacre occurred, and struck terror and dismay into the hearts of all. Many had brothers and sons in the ill-fated party, and mourned their loss. Neither did they know what place would fall next. The Indian hostilities had begun, and they could only hope for peace when the savages were effectually conquered.

The next day, Capt. Rogers led a party of men over to the Big Bottom. It was, indeed, a melancholy sight to the poor borderers, as they knew not now how soon the same fate might befall themselves. The fire had so disfigured their comrades that but two, Ezra Putnam and William Jones, were recognized. As the ground was frozen outside, a hole was dug in the earth underneath the block-house floor, and the bodies consigned to one grave. No further attempt was made to settle here till after the peace of 1795.

The outbreak of Indian hostilities put a check on further settlements. Those that were established were put in a more active state of defense, and every preparation made that could be made for the impending crisis all felt sure must come. Either the Indians must go, or the whites must retreat. A few hardy and adventurous persons ventured out into the woods and made settlements, but even these were at the imminent risk of their lives, many of them perishing in the attempt.

The Indian war that followed is given fully in preceding pages. It may be briefly sketched by stating that the first campaign, under Gen. Harmar, ended in the defeat of his army at the Indian villages on the Miami of the lake, and the rapid retreat to Fort Washington. St. Clair was next commissioned to lead an army of nearly three thousand men, but these were furiously attacked at break of day, on the morning of November 4, 1791, and utterly defeated. Indian outrages sprung out anew after each defeat, and the borders were in a continual state of alarm. The most terrible sufferings were endured by prisoners in the hands of the savage foe, who thought to annihilate the whites.

The army was at once re-organized, Gen. Anthony Wayne put in command by Washington, and a vigorous campaign inaugurated. Though the savages had been given great aid by the British, in direct violation of the treaty of 1783, Gen. Wayne pursued them so vigorously that they could not withstand his army, and, the 20th of August, 1794, defeated them, and utterly annihilated their forces, breaking up their camps, and laying waste their country, in some places under the guns of the British forts. The victory showed them the hopelessness of contending against the whites, and led their chiefs to sue for peace. The British, as at former times, deserted them, and they were again alone, contending against an invincible foe. A grand council was held at Greenville the 3d day of August, 1795, where eleven of the most powerful chiefs made peace with Gen. Wayne on terms of his own dictation. The boundary established by the old treaty of Fort McIntosh was confirmed, and extended westward from Loramie's to Fort Recovery, and thence southwest to the mouth of the Kentucky River. He also purchased all the territory not before ceded, within certain limits, comprehending, in all, about four-fifths of the State of Ohio. The line was long known as "The Greenville Treaty line." Upon these, and a few other minor conditions, the United States received the Indians under their protection, gave them a large number of presents, and practically closed the war with the savages.

The only settlement of any consequence made during the Indian war, was that on the plat of Hamilton, laid out by Israel Ludlow in December, 1794. Soon after, Darius C. Orcutt, John Green, William McClennan, John Sutherland, John Torrence, Benjamin F. Randolph, Benjamin Davis, Isaac Wiles, Andrew Christy and William Hubert, located here. The town was laid out under the name of Fairfield, but was known only a short time by that name. Until 1801, all the lands on the west side of the Great Miami were owned by the General Government; hence, until after that date, no improvements were made there. A single log cabin stood there until the sale of lands in April, 1801, when a company purchased the site of Rossville, and, in March, 1804, laid out that town, and, before a year had passed, the town and country about it was well settled.

The close of the war, in 1795, insured peace, and, from that date, Hamilton and that part of the Miami Valley grew remarkably fast. In 1803, Butler County was formed, and Hamilton made the county seat.

On the site of Hamilton, St. Clair built Fort Hamilton in 1791. For some time it was under the command of Maj. Rudolph, a cruel, arbitrary man, who was displaced by Gen. Wayne, and who, it is said, perished ignobly on the high seas, at the hands of some Algerine pirates, a fitting end to a man who caused, more than once, the death of men under his control for minor offenses.

On the return of peace, no part of Ohio grew more rapidly than the Miami Valley, especially that part comprised in Butler County.

While the war with the Indians continued, but little extension of settlements was made in the State. It was too perilous, and the settlers preferred the security of the block-house or to engage with the army. Still, however, a few bold spirits ventured away from the settled parts of the Territory, and began life in the wilderness. In tracing the histories of these settlements, attention will be paid to the order in which they were made. They will be given somewhat in detail until the war of 1812, after which time they become too numerous to follow.

The settlements made in Washington—Marietta and adjacent colonies—and Hamilton Counties have already been given. The settlement at Gallia is also noted, hence, the narration can be resumed where it ends prior to the Indian war of 1795. Before this war occurred, there were three small settlements made, however, in addition to those in Washington and Hamilton Counties. They were in what are now Adams, Belmont and Morgan Counties. They were block-house settlements, and were in a continual state of defense. The first of these, Adams, was settled in the winter of 1790–91 by Gen. Nathaniel Massie, near where Manchester now is. Gen. Massie determined to settle here in the Virginia Military Tract—in the winter of 1790, and sent notice throughout Kentucky and other Western settlements that he would give to each of the first twenty-five families who would settle in the town he proposed laying out, one in-lot, one out-lot and one hundred acres of land. Such liberal terms were soon accepted, and in a short time thirty families were ready to go with him. After various consultations with his friends, the bottom on the Ohio River, opposite the lower of the Three Islands, was selected as the most eligible spot. Here Massie fixed his station, and laid off into lots a town, now called Manchester. The little confederacy, with Massie at the helm, went to work with spirit. Cabins were raised, and by the middle of March, 1791, the whole town was inclosed with strong pickets, with block-houses at each angle for defense.

This was the first settlement in the bounds of the Virginia District, and the fourth one in the State. Although in the midst of a savage foe, now inflamed with war, and in the midst of a cruel conflict, the settlement at Manchester suffered less than any of its cotemporaries. This was, no doubt, due to the watchful care of its inhabitants, who were inured to the rigors of a frontier life, and who well knew the danger about them. "These were the Beasleys, Stouts, Washburns, Ledoms, Edgingtons, Denings, Ellisons, Utts, McKenzies, Wades, and others, who were fully equal to the Indians in all the savage arts and stratagems of border war."

As soon as they had completed preparations for defense, the whole population went to work and cleared the lowest of the Three Islands, and planted it in corn. The soil of the island was very rich, and produced abundantly. The woods supplied an abundance of game, while the river furnished a variety of excellent fish. The inhabitants thus found their simple wants fully supplied. Their nearest neighbors in the new Territory were at Columbia, and at the French settlement at Gallipolis; but with these, owing to the state of the country and the Indian war, they could hold little, if any, intercourse.

The station being established, Massie continued to make locations and surveys. Great precautions were necessary to avoid the Indians, and even the closest vigilance did not always avail, as the ever-watchful foe was always ready to spring upon the settlement, could an unguarded moment be observed. During one of the spring months, Gen. Massie, Israel Donalson, William Lytle and James Little, while out on a survey, were surprised, and Mr. Donalson captured, the others escaping at great peril. Mr. Donalson escaped during the march to the Indian town, and made his way to the town of Cincinnati, after suffering great hardships, and almost perishing from hunger. In the spring of 1793, the settlers at Manchester commenced clearing the out-lots of the town. While doing so, an incident occurred, which shows the danger to which they were daily exposed. It is thus related in Howe's Collections:

"Mr. Andrew Ellison, one of the settlers, cleared an out-lot immediately adjoining the fort. He had completed the cutting of the timber, rolled the logs together, and set them on fire. The next morning, before daybreak, Mr. Ellison opened one of the gates of the fort, and went out to throw his logs together. By the time he had finished the job, a number of the heaps blazed up brightly, and, as he was passing from one to the other, he observed, by the light of the fires, three men walking briskly toward him. This did not alarm him in the least, although, he said, they were dark-skinned fellows; yet he concluded they were the Wades, whose complexions were very dark, going early to hunt. He continued to right his log-heaps, until one of the fellows seized him by the arms, calling out, in broken English, 'How do? how do?' He instantly looked in their faces, and, to his surprise and horror, found himself in the clutches of three Indians. To resist was useless.

"The Indians quickly moved off with him in the direction of Paint Creek. When breakfast was ready, Mrs. Ellison sent one of her children to ask its father home; but he could not be found at the log-heaps. His absence created no immediate alarm, as it was thought he might have started to hunt, after completing his work. Dinner-time arrived, and, Ellison not returning, the family became uneasy, and began to suspect some accident had happened to him. His gun-rack was examined, and there hung his rifles and his pouch. Gen. Massie raised a party, made a circuit around the place, finding, after some search, the trails of four men, one of whom had on shoes; and the fact that Mr. Ellison was a prisoner now became apparent. As it was almost night at the time the trail was discovered, the party returned to the station. Early the next morning, preparations were made by Gen. Massie and his friends to continue the search. In doing this, they found great difficulty, as it was so early in the spring that the vegetation was not grown sufficiently to show plainly the trail made by the savages, who took the precaution to keep on high and dry ground, where their feet would make little or no impression. The party were, however, as unerring as a pack of hounds, and followed the trail to Paint Creek, when they found the Indians gained so fast on them that pursuit was useless.

"The Indians took their prisoner to Upper Sandusky, where he was compelled to run the gantlet. As he was a large, and not very active, man, he received a severe flogging. He was then taken to Lower Sandusky, and again compelled to run the gantlet. He was then taken to Detroit, where he was ransomed by a British officer for $100. The officer proved a good friend to him. He sent him to Montreal, whence he returned home before the close of the summer, much to the joy of his family and friends, whose feelings can only be imagined."

"Another incident occurred about this time," says the same volume, "which so aptly illustrates the danger of frontier life, that it well deserves a place in the history of the settlements in Ohio. John and Asahel Edgington, with a comrade, started out on a hunting expedition toward Brush Creek. They camped out six miles in a northeast direction from where West Union now stands, and near the site of Treber's tavern, on the road from Chillicothe to Maysville. They had good success in hunting, killing a number of deer and bears. Of the deer killed, they saved the skins and hams alone. They fleeced the bears; that is, they cut off all the meat which adhered to the hide, without skinning, and left the bones as a skeleton. They hung up the proceeds of their hunt, on a scaffold out of the reach of wolves and other wild animals, and returned to Manchester for pack-horses. No one returned to the camp with the Edgingtons. As it was late in December, few apprehended danger, as the winter season was usually a time of repose from Indian incursions. When the Edgingtons arrived at their camp, they alighted from their horses and were preparing to start a fire, when a platoon of Indians fired upon them at a distance of not more than twenty paces. They had evidently found the results of the white men's labor, and expected they would return for it, and prepared to waylay them. Asahel Edgington fell dead. John was more fortunate. The sharp crack of the rifles, and the horrible yells of the savages as they leaped from their place of ambush, frightened the horses, who took the track for home at full speed. John was very active on foot, and now an opportunity offered which required his utmost speed. The moment the Indians leaped from their hiding-place, they threw down their guns and took after him, yelling with all their power. Edgington did not run a booty race. For about a mile, the savages stepped in his tracks almost before the bending grass could rise. The uplifted tomahawk was frequently so near his head that he thought he felt its edge. He exerted himself to his utmost, while the Indians strove with all their might to catch him. Finally, he began to gain on his pursuers, and, after a long race, distanced them and made his escape, safely reaching home. This, truly, was a most fearful and well-contested race. The big Shawanee chief, Capt. John, who headed the Indians on this occasion, after peace was made, in narrating the particulars, said, "The white man who ran away was a smart fellow. The white man run; and I run. He run and run; at last, the white man run clear off from me."

The settlement, despite its dangers, prospered, and after the close of the war continued to grow rapidly. In two years after peace was declared, Adams County was erected by proclamation of Gov. St. Clair, the next year court was held, and in 1804, West Union was made the county seat.

During the war, a settlement was commenced near the present town of Bridgeport, in Belmont County, by Capt. Joseph Belmont, a noted Delaware Revolutionary officer, who, because his State could furnish only one company, could rise no higher than Captain of that company, and hence always maintained that grade. He settled on a beautiful knoll near the present county seat, but ere long suffered from a night attack by the Indians, who, though unable to drive him and his companions from the cabin or conquer them, wounded some of them badly, one or two mortally, and caused the Captain to leave the frontier and return to Newark, Del. The attack was made in the spring of 1791, and a short time after, the Captain, having provided for the safety of his family, accepted a commission in St. Clair's army, and lost his life at the defeat of the General in November. Shortly after the Captain settled, a fort, called Dillie's Fort, was built on the Ohio, opposite the mouth of Grave Creek. About two hundred and fifty yards below this fort, an old man, named Tato, was shot down at his cabin door by the Indians, just as he was in the act of entering the house. His body was pulled in by his daughter-in-law and grandson, who made an heroic defense. They were overpowered, the woman slain, and the boy badly wounded. He, however, managed to secrete himself and afterward escaped to the fort. The Indians, twelve or thirteen in number, went off unmolested, though the men in the fort saw the whole transaction and could have punished them. Why they did not was never known.

On Captina Creek in this same county, occurred, in May, 1794, the "battle of Captina," a famous local skirmish between some Virginians from Fort Baker, and a party of Indians. Though the Indians largely outnumbered the whites, they were severely punished, and compelled to abandon the contest, losing several of their bravest warriors.

These were the only settlements made until 1795, the close of the war. Even these, as it will be observed from the foregoing pages, were temporary in all cases save one, and were maintained at a great risk, and the loss of many valuable lives. They were made in the beginning of the war, and such were their experiences that further attempts were abandoned until the treaty of Greenville was made, or until the prospects for peace and safety were assured.

No sooner, however, had the prospect of quiet been established, than a revival of emigration began. Before the war it had been large, now it was largely increased.

Wayne's treaty of peace with the Indians was made at Greenville, in what is now Darke County, the 3d of August, 1795. The number of Indians present was estimated at 1,300, divided among the principal nations as follows: 180 Wyandots, 381 Delawares, 143 Shawanees, 45 Ottawas, 46 Chipewas, 240 Pottawatomies, 73 Miamis and Eel River, 12 Weas and Piankeshaws, and 10 Kickapoos and Kaskaskias. The principal chiefs were Tarhe, Buckongahelas, Black Hoof, Blue Jacket and Little Turtle. Most of them had been tampered with by the British agents and traders, but all had been so thoroughly chastised by Wayne, and found that the British only used them as tools, that they were quite anxious to make peace with the "Thirteen Fires." By the treaty, former ones were established, the boundary lines confirmed and enlarged, an exchange and delivery of prisoners effected, and permanent peace assured.

In the latter part of September, after the treaty of Greenville, Mr. Bedell, from New Jersey, selected a site for a home in what is now Warren County, at a place since known as "Bedell's Station," about a mile south of Union Village. Here he erected a block-house, as a defense against the Indians, among whom were many renegades as among the whites, who would not respect the terms of the treaty. Whether Mr. Bedell was alone that fall, or whether he was joined by others, is not now accurately known. However that may be, he was not long left to himself; for, ere a year had elapsed, quite a number of settlements were made in this part of the Territory. Soon after his settlement was made, Gen. David Sutton, Capt. Nathan Kelley and others began pioneer life at Deerfield, in the same locality, and, before three years had gone by, a large number of New Jersey people were established in their homes; and, in 1803, the county was formed from Hamilton. Among the early settlers at Deerfield, was Capt. Robert Benham, who, with a companion, in 1779, sustained themselves many days when the Captain had lost the use of his legs, and his companion his arms, from musket-balls fired by the hands of the Indians. They were with a large party commanded by Maj. Rodgers, and were furiously attacked by an immense number of savages, and all but a few slain. The event happened during the war of the Revolution, before any attempt was made to settle the Northwest Territory. The party were going down the Ohio, probably to the falls, and were attacked when near the site of Cincinnati. As mentioned, these two men sustained each other many days, the one having perfect legs doing the necessary walking, carrying his comrade to water, driving up game for him to shoot, and any other duties necessary; while the one who had the use of his arms could dress his companion's and his own wounds, kill and cook the game, and perform his share. They were rescued, finally, by a flat-boat, whose occupants, for awhile, passed them, fearing a decoy, but, becoming convinced that such was not the case, took them on down to Louisville, where they were nursed into perfect health.

A settlement was made near the present town of Lebanon, the county seat of Warren County, in the spring of 1796, by Henry Taylor, who built a mill one mile west of the town site, on Turtle Creek. Soon after, he was joined by Ichabod Corwin, John Osbourn, Jacob Vorhees, Samuel Shaw, Daniel Bonte and a Mr. Manning. When Lebanon was laid out, in 1803, the two-story log house built in 1797 by Ichabod Corwin was the only building on the plat. It was occupied by Ephraim Hathaway as a tavern. He had a black horse painted on an immense board for a sign, and continued in business here till 1810. The same year the town was laid out, a store was opened by John Huston, and, from that date, the growth of the county was very prosperous. Three years after, the Western Star was established by Judge John McLain, and the current news of the day given in weekly editions. It was one of the first newspapers established in the Territory, outside of Cincinnati.

As has been mentioned, the opening of navigation in the spring of 1796 brought a great flood of emigration to the Territory. The little settlement made by Mr. Bedell, in the autumn of 1795, was about the only one made that fall; others made preparations, and many selected sites, but did not settle till the following spring. That spring, colonies were planted in what are now Montgomery, Ross, Madison, Mahoning, Trumbull, Ashtabula and Cuyahoga Counties, while preparations were in turn made to occupy additional territory that will hereafter be noticed.

The settlement made in Montgomery County was begun early in the spring of 1796. As early as 1788, the land on which Dayton now stands was selected by some gentlemen, who designed laying out a town to be named Venice. They agreed with Judge Symmes, whose contract covered the place, for the purchase of the lands. The Indian war which broke out at this time prevented an extension of settlements from the immediate neighborhood of the parent colonies, and the project was abandoned by the purchasers. Soon after the treaty of 1795, a new company, composed of Gens. Jonathan Dayton, Arthur St. Clair, James Wilkinson, and Col. Israel Ludlow, purchased the land between the Miamis, around the mouth of Mad River, of Judge Symmes, and, the 4th of November, laid out the town. Arrangements were made for its settlement the ensuing spring, and donations of lots, with other privileges, were offered to actual settlers. Forty-six persons entered into engagements to remove from Cincinnati to Dayton, but during the winter most of them scattered in different directions, and only nineteen fulfilled their contracts. The first families who made a permanent residence here, arrived on the first day of April, 1796, and at once set about establishing homes. Judge Symmes, however, becoming unable soon after to pay for his purchase, the land reverted to the United States, and the settlers in and about Dayton found themselves without titles to their lands. Congress, however, came to the aid of all such persons, wherever they had purchased land of Symmes, and passed a pre-emption law, under which they could enter their lands at the regular government price. Some of the settlers entered their lands, and obtained titles directly from the United States; others made arrangements with Daniel C. Cooper to receive their deeds from him, and he entered the residue of the town lands. He had been the surveyor and agent of the first company of proprietors, and they assigned to him certain of their rights of pre-emption, by which he became the titular owner of the land.

When the State government was organized in 1803, Dayton was made the seat of justice for Montgomery County, erected the same year. At that time, owing to the title question, only five families resided in the place, the other settlers having gone to farms in the vicinity, or to other parts of the country. The increase of the town was gradual until the war of 1812, when its growth was more rapid until 1820, when it was again checked by the general depression of business. It revived in 1827, at the commencement of the Miami Canal, and since then its growth has always been prosperous. It is now one of the best cities in Ohio. The first canal boats from Cincinnati arrived at Dayton January 25, 1829, and the first one from Lake Erie the 24th of June, 1845. In 1825, a weekly line of stages was established between Columbus and Cincinnati, via Dayton. One day was occupied in coming from Cincinnati to Dayton.

On the 18th of September, 1808, the Dayton Repertory was established by William McClure and George Smith. It was printed on a foolscap sheet. Soon after, it was enlarged and changed from a weekly to a daily, and, ere long, found a number of competitors in the field.

In the lower part of Miamisburg, in this county, are the remains of ancient works, scattered about over the bottom. About a mile and a quarter southeast of the village, on an elevation more than one hundred feet above the level of the Miami, is the largest mound in the Northern States, excepting the mammoth mound at Grave Creek, on the Ohio, below Wheeling, which it nearly equals in dimensions. It is about eight hundred feet around the base, and rises to a height of nearly seventy feet. When first known it was covered with forest trees, whose size evidenced great age. The Indians could give no account of the mound. Excavations revealed bones and charred earth, but what was its use, will always remain a conjecture.

One of the most important early settlements was made cotemporary with that of Dayton, in what is now Ross County. The same spring, 1796, quite a colony came to the banks of the Scioto River, and, near the mouth of Paint Creek, began to plant a crop of corn on the bottom. The site had been selected as early as 1792, by Col. Nathaniel Massie* and others, who were so delighted with the country, and gave such glowing descriptions of it on their return—which accounts soon circulated through Kentucky—that portions of the Presbyterian congregations of Caneridge and Concord, in Bourbon County, under Rev. Robert W. Finley, determined to emigrate thither in a body. They were, in a measure, induced to take this step by their dislike to slavery, and a desire for freedom from its baleful influences and the uncertainty that existed regarding the validity of the land titles in that State. The Rev. Finley, as a preliminary step, liberated his slaves, and addressed to Col. Massie a letter of inquiry, in December, 1794, regarding the land on the Scioto, of which he and his people had heard such glowing accounts.

"The letter induced Col. Massie to visit Mr. Finley in the ensuing March. A large concourse of people, who wished to engage in the enterprise, assembled on the occasion, and fixed on a day to meet at the Three Islands, in Manchester, and proceed on an exploring expedition. Mr. Finley also wrote to his friends in Western Pennsylvania

* Nathaniel Massie was born in Goochland County, Va., December 28, 1763. In 1780, he engaged, for a short time, in the Revolutionary war. In 1783, he left for Kentucky, where he acted as a surveyor. He was afterward made a Government surveyor, and labored much in that capacity for early Ohio proprietors, being paid in lands, the amounts graded by the danger attached to the survey. In 1791, he established the settlement at Manchester, and a year or two after, continued his surveys up the Scioto. Here he was continually in great danger from the Indians, but knew well how to guard against them, and thus preserved himself. In 1796, he established the Chillicothe settlement, and made his home in the Scioto Valley, being now an extensive land owner by reason of his long surveying service. In 1807, he and Return J. Meigs were competitors for the office of Governor of Ohio. Meigs was elected, but Massie contested his eligibility to the office, on the grounds of his absence from the State and insufficiency of time as a resident, as required by the Constitution. Meigs was declared ineligible by the General Assembly, and Massie declared Governor. He, however, resigned the office at once, not desiring it. He was often Representative afterward. He died November 13, 1813.

"About sixty men met, according to appointment, who were divided into three companies, under Massie, Finley and Falenash. They proceeded on their route, without interruption, until they struck the falls of Paint Creek. Proceeding a short distance down that stream, they suddenly found themselves in the vicinity of some Indians who had encamped at a place, since called Reeve's Crossing, near the present town of Bainbridge. The Indians were of those who had refused to attend Wayne's treaty, and it was determined to give them battle, it being too late to retreat with safety. The Indians, on being attacked, soon fled with the loss of two killed and several wounded. One of the whites only, Joshua Robinson, was mortally wounded, and, during the action, a Mr. Armstrong, a prisoner among the savages, escaped to his own people. The whites gathered all their plunder and retreated as far as Scioto Brush Creek, where they were, according to expectation, attacked early the next morning. Again the Indians were defeated. Only one man among the whites, Allen Gilfillan, was wounded. The party of whites continued their retreat, the next day reached Manchester, and separated for their homes.

"After Wayne's treaty, Col. Massie and several of the old explorers again met at the house of Rev. Finley, formed a company, and agreed to make a settlement in the ensuing spring (1796), and raise a crop of corn at the mouth of Paint Creek. According to agreement, they met at Manchester about the first of April, to the number of forty and upward, from Mason and Bourbon Counties. Among them were Joseph McCoy, Benjamin and William Rodgers, David Shelby, James Harrod, Henry, Bazil and Reuben Abrams, William Jamison, James Crawford, Samuel, Anthony and Robert Smith, Thomas Dick, William and James Kerr, George and James Kilgroe, John Brown, Samuel and Robert Templeton, Ferguson Moore, William Nicholson and James B. Finley, later a prominent local Methodist minister. On starting, they divided into two companies, one of which struck across the country, while the other came on in pirogues. The first arrived earliest on the spot of their intended settlement, and had commenced erecting log huts above the mouth of Paint Creek, at the 'Prairie Station,' before the others had come on by water. About three hundred acres of the prairie were cultivated in corn that season.

"In August, of this year—1796—Chillicothe* was laid out by Col. Massie in a dense forest. He gave a lot to each of the first settlers, and, by the beginning of winter, about twenty cabins were erected. Not long after, a ferry was established across the Scioto, at the north end of Walnut street. The opening of Zane's trace produced a great change in travel westward, it having previously been along the Ohio in keel-boats or canoes, or by land, over the Cumberland Mountains, through Crab Orchard, in Kentucky.

"The emigrants brought corn-meal in their pirogues, and after that was gone, their principal meal, until the next summer, was that pounded in hominy mortars, which meal, when made into bread, and anointed with bear's-oil, was quite palatable.

"When the settlers first came, whisky was $4.50 per gallon; but, in the spring of 1797, when the keel-boats began to run, the Monongahela whisky-makers, having found a good market for their fire-water, rushed it in, in such quantities, that the cabins were crowded with it, and it soon fell to 50 cents. Men, women and children, with some exceptions, drank it freely, and many who had been respectable and temperate became inebriates. Many of Wayne's soldiers and camp-women settled in the town, so that, for a time, it became a town of drunkards and a sink of corruption. There was, however, a little leaven, which, in a few months, began to develop itself.

"In the spring of 1797, one Brannon stole a great coat, handkerchief and shirt. He and his wife absconded, were pursued, caught and brought back. Samuel Smith was appointed Judge, a jury impaneled, one attorney appointed by the Judge to manage the prosecution, and another the defense; witnesses were examined, the case argued, and the evidence summed up by the Judge. The jury, having retired a few moments, returned with a verdict of guilty, and that the culprit be sentenced according to the discretion of the Judge. The Judge soon announced that the criminal should have ten lashes on his naked back, or that he should sit on a bare pack-saddle on his pony, and that his wife, who was supposed to have had some agency in the theft, should lead the pony to every house in the village, and proclaim, 'This is

*Chillicothe appears to have been a favorite name among the Indians, as many localities were known by that name. Col. John Johnston says: "Chillicothe is the name of one of the principal tribes of the Shawanees. They would say, Chil-ic-thee along, i.e., Chillicothe town. The Wyandots would say, for Chillicothe town, Tutu-ra-ra, Do-ta, or town at the leaning of the bank."

Brannon, who stole the great coat, handkerchief and shirt; and that James B. Finley, afterward Chaplain in the State Penitentiary, should see the sentence faithfully carried out. Brannon chose the latter sentence, and the ceremony was faithfully performed by his wife in the presence of every cabin, under Mr. Finley's care, after which the couple made off. This was rather rude, but effective jurisprudence.

"Dr. Edward Tiffin and Mr. Thomas Worthington, of Berkley County, Va., were brothers-in-law, and being moved by abolition principles, liberated their slaves, intending to remove into the Territory. For this purpose, Mr. Worthington visited Chillicothe in the autumn of 1797, and purchased several in and out lots of the town. On one of the former, he erected a two-story frame house, the first of the kind in the village. On his return, having purchased a part of a farm, on which his family long afterward resided, and another at the north fork of Paint Creek, he contracted with Mr. Joseph Yates, a millwright, and Mr. George Haines, a blacksmith, to come out with him the following winter or spring, and erect for him a grist and saw mill on his north-fork tract. The summer, fall and following winter of that year were marked by a rush of emigration, which spread over the high bank prairie, Pea-pea, Westfall and a few miles up Paint and Deer Creeks.

"Nearly all the first settlers were either regular members, or had been raised in the Presbyterian Church. Toward the fall of 1797, the leaven of piety retained by a portion of the first settlers began to diffuse itself through the mass, and a large log meeting-house was erected near the old graveyard, and Rev. William Speer, from Pennsylvania, took charge. The sleepers at first served as seats for hearers, and a split-log table was used as a pulpit. Mr. Speer was a gentlemanly, moral man, tall and cadaverous in person, and wore the cocked hat of the Revolutionary era.

"Thomas Jones arrived in February, 1798, bringing with him the first load of bar-iron in the Scioto Valley, and about the same time Maj. Elias Langham, an officer of the Revolution, arrived. Dr. Tiffin, and his brother, Joseph, arrived the same month from Virginia and opened a store not far from the log meeting-house. A store had been opened previously by John McDougal. The 17th of April, the families of Col. Worthington and Dr. Tiffin arrived, at which time the first marriage in the Scioto Valley was celebrated. The parties were George Kilgore and Elizabeth Cochran. The ponies of the attendants were hitched to the trees along the streets, which were not then cleared out, nearly the whole town being a wilderness. Joseph Yates, George Haines, and two or three others, arrived with the families of Tiffin and Worthington. On their arrival there were but four shingled roofs in town, on one of which the shingles were fastened with pegs. Col. Worthington's house was the only one having glass windows. The sash of the hotel windows was filled with greased paper.

"Col. Worthington was appointed by Gen. Rufus Putnam, Surveyor General of the Northwest Territory, surveyor of a large district of Congress lands, on the east side of the Scioto, and Maj. Langham and a Mr. Matthews, were appointed to survey the residue of the lands which afterward composed the Chillicothe land district.

"The same season, settlements were made about the Walnut Plains by Samuel McCulloh and others; Springer, Osbourn, Dyer, and Thomas and Elijah Chenowith, on Darly Creek; Lamberts and others on Sippo; on Foster's Bottom, the Fosters. Samuel Davis and others, while the following families settled in and about Chillicothe: John Crouse, William Keys, William Lamb, John Carlisle, John McLanberg, William Chandless, the Stoctons, Greggs, Bates and some others.

"Dr. Tiffin and his wife were the first Methodists in the Scioto Valley. He was a local preacher. In the fall, Worthington's grist and saw mills on the north fork of Paint Creek were finished, the first mills worthy the name in the valley.

"Chillicothe was the point from which the settlements diverged. In May, 1799, a post office was established here, and Joseph Tiffin made Postmaster. Mr. Tiffin and Thomas Gregg opened taverns; the first, under the sign of Gen. Anthony Wayne, was at the corner of Water and Walnut streets; and the last, under the sign of the 'Green Tree,' was on the corner of Paint and Water streets. In 1801, Nathaniel Willis moved in and established the Scioto Gazette, probably, the second paper in the Territory."^{*}

In 1800, the seat of government of the Northwest Territory was removed, by law of Congress, from Cincinnati to Chillicothe. The sessions of the Territorial Assembly for that and the next year were held in a small two-story, hewed-log house, erected in 1798, by Basil Abrams. A wing was added to the main part, of two stories in height. In the lower room of this wing, Col. Thomas Gibson, Auditor of the Territory, kept his office, and in the upper room a small family lived. In the upper room of the main building a billiard table was kept. It was also made a resort of gamblers and disreputable characters. The lower room was used by the Legislature, and as a court room, a church or a school. In the war of 1812, the building was a rendezvous and barracks for soldiers, and, in 1846, was pulled down.

The old State House was commenced in 1800, and finished the next year for the accommodation of the Legislature and the courts. It is said to be the first public stone edifice erected in the Territory. Maj. William Rutledge, a Revolutionary soldier, did the mason work, and William Guthrie, the carpenter. In 1801, the Territorial Legislature held their first session in it. In it was also held the Constitutional Convention of Ohio, which began its sessions the first Monday in November, 1802. In March, 1803, the first State Legislature met in the house, and continued their sessions here until 1810. The sessions of 1810-11, and 1811-12, were held in Zanesville, and from there removed back to Chillicothe and held in the old State House till 1816, when Columbus became the permanent capital of the State.

Making Chillicothe the State capital did much to enhance its growth. It was incorporated in 1802, and a town council elected. In 1807, the town had fourteen stores, six hotels, two newspapers, two churches—both brick buildings—and over two hundred dwellings. The removal of the capital to Columbus checked its growth a little, still, being in an excellent country, rapidly filling with settlers, the town has always remained a prominent trading center.

During the war of 1812, Chillicothe was made a rendezvous for United States soldiers, and a prison established, in which many British prisoners were confined. At one time, a conspiracy for escape was discovered just in time to prevent it. The plan was for the prisoners to disarm the guard, proceed to jail, release the officers, burn the town, and escape to Canada. The plot was fortunately disclosed by two senior British officers, upon which, as a measure of security, the officers and chief conspirators were sent to the penitentiary at Frankfort, Kentucky.

Two or three miles northwest of Chillicothe, on a beautiful elevation, commanding an extensive view of the valley of the Scioto, Thomas Worthington,* one of the most prominent and influential men of his day, afterward Governor of the State, in 1806, erected a large stone mansion, the wonder of the valley in its time. It was the most elegant mansion in the West, crowds coming to see it when it was completed. Gov. Worthington named the place Adena, "Paradise"—a name not then considered hyperbolic. The large panes of glass, and the novelty of papered walls especially attracted attention. Its architect was the elder Latrobe, of Washington City, from which place most of the workmen came. The glass was made in Pittsburgh, and the fireplace fronts in Philadelphia, the latter costing seven dollars per hundred pounds for transportation. The mansion, built as it was, cost nearly double the expense of such structures now. Adena was the home of the Governor till his death, in 1827.

Near Adena, in a beautiful situation, is Fruit Hill, the seat of Gen. Duncan McArthur,† and later of ex-Gov. William Allen. Like Adena, Fruit Hill is one of the noted places in the Scioto Valley. Many of Ohio's best men dwelt in the valley; men who have been an honor and ornament to the State and nation.

Another settlement, begun soon after the treaty of peace in 1795, was that made on the Licking River, about four miles below the present city of Newark, in Licking County. In the fall of 1798, John Ratliff and Elias Hughes, while prospecting on this stream, found some old Indian cornfields, and determined to locate. They were from Western Virginia, and were true pioneers, living mainly by hunting, leaving the cultivation of their small cornfields to their wives, much after the style of

* Gov. Worthington was born in Jefferson County, Va., about the year 1769. He settled in Ohio in 1798. He was a firm believer in liberty and came to the Territory after liberating his slaves. He was one of the most efficient men of his day; was a member of the Constitutional Convention, and was sent on an important mission to Congress relative to the admission of Ohio to the Union. He was afterward a Senator to Congress, and then Governor. On the expiration of his gubernatorial term, he was appointed a member of the Board of Public Works, in which capacity he did much to advance the canals and railroads, and other public improvements. He remained in this office till his death.

† Gen. McArthur was born in Dutchess County, N. Y., in 1772. When eight years of age, his father removed to Western Pennsylvania. When eighteen years of age, he served in Harnar's campaign. In 1792, he was a very efficient soldier among the frontiersmen, and gained their approbation by his bravery. In 1793, he was connected with Gen. Masie, and afterward was engaged in land speculations and became very wealthy. He was made a member of the Legislature, in 1805; in 1806, a Colonel, and in 1808, a Major General of the militia. In this capacity he was in Hull's surrender at Detroit. On his return he was elected to Congress, and in 1813 commissioned Brigadier General. He was one of the most efficient officers in the war of 1812, and held many important posts. After the war, he was again sent to the Legislature; in 1822 to Congress, and in 1830 elected Governor of the State. By an unfortunate accident in 1836, he was maimed for life, and gradually declined till death came a few years after.

their dusky neighbors. They were both inveterate Indian-haters, and never allowed an opportunity to pass without carrying out their hatred. For this, they were apprehended after the treaty; but, though it was clearly proven they had murdered some inoffensive Indians, the state of feeling was such that they were allowed to go unpunished.

A short time after their settlement, others joined them, and, in a few years, quite a colony had gathered on the banks of the Licking. In 1802, Newark was laid out, and, in three or four years, there were twenty or thirty families, several stores and one or two hotels.

The settlement of Granville Township, in this county, is rather an important epoch in the history of this part of the State. From a sketch published by Rev. Jacob Little in 1848, in Howe's Collections, the subjoined statements are taken:

"In 1804, a company was formed at Granville, Mass., with the intention of making a settlement in Ohio. This, called the Scioto Company, was the third of that name which effected settlements in Ohio. The project met with great favor, and much enthusiasm was elicited, in illustration of which a song was composed and sung to the tune of 'Pleasant Ohio' by the young people in the house and at labor in the field. We annex two stanzas, which are more curious than poetical:

"When rambling o'er these mountains
And rocks where ivies grow Thick as the hairs upon your head,
'Mongst which you cannot go—
Great storms of snow, cold winds that blow,
We scarce can undergo—
Says I, my boys, we'll leave this place
For the pleasant Ohio.

"Our precious friends that stay behind,
We're sorry now to leave;
But if they'll stay and break their shins,
For them we'll never grieve.
Adieu, my friends!—Come on, my dears,
This journey we'll forego,
And settle Licking Creek,
In yonder Ohio."

"The Scioto Company consisted of one hundred and fourteen proprietors, who made a purchase of twenty-eight thousand acres. In the autumn of 1805, two hundred and thirty-four persons, mostly from East Granville, Mass., came on to the purchase. Although they had been forty-two days on the road, their first business, on their arrival, having organized a church before they left the East, was to hear a sermon. The first tree cut was that by which public worship was held, which stood just in front of the Presbyterian church.

On the first Sabbath, November 16, although only about a dozen trees had been felled, they held divine service, both forenoon and afternoon, on that spot. The novelty of worshipping in the woods, the forest extending hundreds of miles each way; the hardships of the journey, the winter setting in, the thoughts of home, with all the friends and privileges left behind, and the impression that such must be the accommodations of a new country, all rushed on their minds, and made this a day of varied interest. When they began to sing, the echo of their voices among the trees was so different from what it was in the beautiful meeting-house they had left, that they could no longer restrain their tears. They wept when they remembered Zion. The voices of part of the choir were, for a season, suppressed with emotion.

"An incident occurred, which many said Mrs. Sigourney should have put into verse. Deacon Theophilus Reese, a Welsh Baptist, had, two or three years before, built a cabin, a mile and a half north, and lived all this time without public worship. He had lost his cattle, and, hearing a lowing of the oxen belonging to the Company, set out toward them. As he ascended the hills overlooking the town plot, he heard the singing of the choir. The reverberation of the sound from hill-tops and trees, threw the good man into a serious dilemma. The music at first seemed to be behind, then in the tree-tops, or in the clouds. He stopped, till, by accurate listening, he caught the direction of the sound; went on and passing the brow of the hill, he saw the audience sitting on the level below. He went home and told his wife that 'the promise of God is a bond'; a Welsh proverb, signifying that we have security, equal to a bond, that religion will prevail everywhere. He said: 'These must be good people. I am not afraid to go among them.' Though he could not understand English, he constantly attended the reading meeting. Hearing the music on that occasion made such an impression on his mind that, when he became old and met the first settlers, he would always tell over this story. The first cabin built was that in which they worshiped succeeding Sabbaths, and, before the close of the winter, they had a schoolhouse and a school. That church, in forty years, received more than one thousand persons into its membership.

"Elder Jones, in 1806, preached the first sermon in the log church. The Welsh Baptist Church was organized in the cabin of David Thomas, September 4, 1808. April 21, 1827, the Granville members were organized into the Granville Church, and the corner-stone of their house of worship laid September 21, 1829. In the fall of 1810, the first Methodist sermon was preached here, and, soon after, a class organized. In 1824, a church was built. An Episcopal church was organized in May, 1827, and a church consecrated in 1838. In 1849, there were in this township 405 families, of whom 214 sustain family worship; 1431 persons over fourteen years of age, of whom over 800 belong to church. The town had 150 families, of whom 80 have family worship. In 1846, the township furnished 70 school teachers, of whom 62 prayed in school. In 1846, the township took 621 periodical papers, besides three small monthlies. The first temperance society west of the mountains was organized July 15, 1828, in this township; and, in 1831, the Congregational Church passed a by-law to accept no member who trafficked in or used ardent spirits."

It is said, not a settlement in the entire West could present so moral and upright a view as that of Granville Township; and nowhere could so perfect and orderly a set of people be found. Surely, the fact is argument enough in favor of the religion of Jesus.

The narrative of Mr. Little also states that, when Granville was first settled, it was supposed that Worthington would be the capital of Ohio, between which and Zanesville, Granville would make a great half-way town. At this time, wild animals, snakes and Indians abounded, and many are the marvelous stories preserved regarding the destruction of the animals and reptiles—the Indians being bound by their treaty to remain peaceful. Space forbids their repetition here. Suffice it to say that, as the whites increased, the Indians, animals and snakes disappeared, until now one is as much a curiosity as the other.

The remaining settlement in the southwestern parts of Ohio, made immediately after the treaty—fall of 1795 or year of 1796—was in what is now Madison County, about a mile north of where the village of Amity now stands, on the banks of the Big Darby. This stream received its name from the Indians, from a Wyandot chief, named Darby, who for a long time resided upon it, near the Union County line. In the fall of 1795, Benjamin Springer came from Kentucky and selected some land on the banks of the Big Darby, cleared the ground, built a cabin, and returned for his family. The next spring, he brought them out, and began his life here. The same summer he was joined by William Lapin, Joshua and James Ewing and one or two others.

When Springer came, he found a white man named Jonathan Alder, who for fifteen years had been a captive among the Indians, and who could not speak a word of English, living with an Indian woman on the banks of Big Darby. He had been exchanged at Wayne's treaty, and, neglecting to profit by the treaty, was still living in the Indian style. When the whites became numerous about him his desire to find his relatives, and adopt the ways of the whites, led him to discard his squaw—giving her an unusual allowance—learn the English language, engage in agricultural pursuits, and become again civilized. Fortunately, he could remember enough of the names of some of his parents' neighbors, so that the identity of his relatives and friends was easily established, and Alder became a most useful citizen. He was very influential with the Indians, and induced many of them to remain neutral during the war of 1812. It is stated that in 1800, Mr. Ewing brought four sheep into the community. They were strange animals to the Indians. One day when an Indian hunter and his dog were passing, the latter caught a sheep, and was shot by Mr. Ewing. The Indian would have shot Ewing in retaliation, had not Alder, who was fortunately present, with much difficulty prevailed upon him to refrain.

While the southern and southwestern parts of the State were filling with settlers, assured of safety by Wayne's victories, the northern and eastern parts became likewise the theater of activities. Ever since the French had explored the southern shores of the lake, and English traders had carried goods thither, it was expected one day to be a valuable part of the West. It will be remembered that Connecticut had ceded a large tract of land to the General Government, and as soon as the cession was confirmed, and land titles became assured, settlers flocked thither. Even before that time, hardy adventurers had explored some of the country, and pronounced it a "goodly land," ready for the hand of enterprise.

The first settlement in the Western Reserve, and, indeed, in the northern part of the State, was made at the mouth of Conneaut* Creek, in Ash-tabula County, on the 4th of July, 1796. That day, the first surveying party landed at the mouth of this creek, and, on its eastern bank, near the lake shore, in tin cups, pledged—as they drank the limpid waters of the lake—their country's welfare, with the ordnance accompaniment of two or three fowling-pieces, discharging the required national salute.

The whole party, on this occasion, numbered fifty-two persons, of whom two were females (Mrs. Stiles and Mrs. Gunn) and a child, and all deserve a lasting place in the history of the State.

The next day, they began the erection of a large log building on the sandy beach on the east side of the stream. When done, it was named "Stow Castle," after one of the party. It was the dwelling, storehouse and general habitation of all the pioneers. The party made this their headquarters part of the summer, and continued busily engaged in the survey of the Reserve. James Kingsbury, afterward Judge, arrived soon after the party began work, and, with his family, was the first to remain here during the winter following, the rest returning to the East, or going southward. Through the winter, Mr. Kingsbury's family suffered greatly for provisions, so much so, that, during the absence of the head of the family in New York for provisions, one child, born in his absence, died, and the mother, reduced by her sufferings and solitude, was only saved by the timely arrival of the husband and father with a sack of flour he had carried, many weary miles, on his back. He remained here but a short time, removing to Cleveland, which was laid out that same fall. In the spring of 1798, Alexander Harper, William McFarland and Ezra Gregory, with their families, started from Harpersfield, Delaware Co., N. Y., and arrived the last of June, at their new homes in the Far West. The whole population on the Reserve then amounted to less than one hundred and fifty persons. These were at Cleveland, Youngstown and at Mentor. During the summer, three families came to Burton, and Judge Hudson settled at Hudson. All these pioneers suffered severely for food, and from the fever induced by chills. It took several years to become acclimated. Sometimes the entire neighborhood would be down, and only one or two, who could wait on the rest "between chills," were able to do anything. Time and courage overcame, finally.

It was not until 1798, that a permanent settlement was made at the mouth of Conneaut Creek. Those who came there in 1796 went on with their surveys, part remaining in Cleveland, laid out that summer. Judge Kingsbury could not remain at Conneaut, and went nearer the settlements made about the Cuyahoga. In the spring of 1798, Thomas Montgomery and Aaron Wright settled here and remained. Up the stream they found some thirty Indian cabins, or huts, in a good state of preservation, which they occupied until they could erect their own. Soon after, they were joined by others, and, in a year or two, the settlement was permanent and prosperous.

The site of the present town of Austinburg in Ashtabula County was settled in the year 1799, by two families from Connecticut, who were induced to come thither, by Judge Austin. The Judge preceded them a short time, driving, in company with a hired man, some cattle about one hundred and fifty miles through the woods, following an old Indian trail, while the rest of the party came in a boat across the lake. When they arrived, there were a few families at Harpersburg; one or two families at Windsor, twenty miles southwest; also a few families at Elk Creek, forty miles northeast, and at Vernon, the same distance southeast. All these were in a destitute condition for provisions. In 1800, another family moved from Norfolk, Conn. In the spring of 1801, several families came from the same place. Part came by land, and part by water. During that season, wheat was carried to an old mill on Elk Creek, forty miles away, and in some instances, half was given for carrying it to mill and returning it in flour.

Wednesday, October 21, 1801, a church of sixteen members was constituted in Austinburg. This was the first church on the Reserve, and was founded by Rev. Joseph Badger, the first missionary there. It is a fact worthy of note, that in 1802, Mr. Badger moved his family from Buffalo to this town, in the first wagon that ever came from that place to the Reserve. In 1803, noted revivals occurred in this part of the West, attended by the peculiar bodily phenomenon known as the "shakes" or "jerks."

The surveying party which landed at the mouth of Conneaut Creek, July 4, 1796, soon completed their labors in this part of the Reserve, and extended them westward. By the first of September, they had explored the lake coast as far west as the outlet of the Cuyahoga* River, then considered

"The Indians called the river 'Cuyahoghan-uk,' 'Lake River.' It is, emphatically, a Lake river. It rises in lakes and empties into a lake."—Atwater's History of Ohio.

by all an important Western place, and one destined to be a great commercial mart. Time has verified the prophecies, as now the city of Cleveland covers the site.

As early as 1755, the mouth of the Cuyahoga River was laid down on the maps, and the French had a station here. It was also considered an important post during the war of the Revolution, and later, of 1812. The British, who, after the Revolution, refused to abandon the lake country west of the Cuyahoga, occupied its shores until 1790. Their traders had a house in Ohio City, north of the Detroit road, on the point of the hill near the river, when the surveyors arrived in 1796. Washington, Jefferson, and all statesmen of that day, regarded the outlet of the Cuyahoga as an important place, and hence the early attempt of the surveyors to reach and lay out a town here.

The corps of surveyors arrived early in September, 1796, and at once proceeded to lay out a town. It was named Cleveland, in honor of Gen. Moses Cleveland, the Land Company's agent, and for years a very prominent man in Connecticut, where he lived and died. By the 18th of October, the surveyors had completed the survey and left the place, leaving only Job V. Stiles and family, and Edward Paine, who were the only persons that passed the succeeding winter in this place. Their residence was a log cabin that stood on a spot of ground long afterward occupied by the Commercial Bank. Their nearest neighbors were at Conneaut, where Judge Kingsbury lived; at Fort McIntosh, on the south or east, at the mouth of Big Beaver, and at the mouth of the river Raisin, on the west.

The next season, the surveying party came again to Cleveland, which they made their headquarters. Early in the spring, Judge Kingsbury came over from Conneaut, bringing with him Elijah Gunn, who had a short time before joined him. Soon after, Maj. Lorenzo Carter and Ezekiel Hawley came with their families. These were about all who are known to have settled in this place that summer. The next year, 1798, Rodolphus Edwards and Nathaniel Doane and their families settled in Cleveland. Mr. Doane had been ninety-two days on his journey from Chatham, Conn. In the latter part of the summer and fall, nearly every person in the settlement was down with the bilious fever or with the ague. Mr. Doane's family consisted of nine persons, of whom Seth, a lad sixteen years of age, was the only one able to care for them. Such was the severity of the fever, that any one having only the ague was deemed quite fortunate. Much suffering for proper food and medicines followed. The only way the Doane family was supplied for two months or more, was through the exertions of this boy, who went daily, after having had one attack of the chills, to Judge Kingsbury's in Newburg—five miles away, where the Judgenow lived—got a peck of corn, mashed it in a hand-mill, waited until a second attack of the chills passed over, and then returned. At one time, for several days, he was too ill to make the trip, during which turnips comprised the chief article of diet. Fortunately, Maj. Carter, having only the ague, was enabled with his trusty rifle and dogs to procure an abundance of venison and other wild game. His family, being somewhat acclimated, suffered less than many others. Their situation can hardly now be realized. "Destitute of a physician, and with few medicines, necessity taught them to use such means as nature had placed within their reach. They substituted pills from the extract of the bitternut bark for calomel, and dogwood and cherry bark for quinine."

In November, four men, who had so far recovered as to have ague attacks no oftener than once in two or three days, started in the only boat for Walnut Creek, Penn., to obtain a winter's supply of flour. When below Euclid Creek, a storm drove them ashore, broke their boat, and compelled their return. During the winter and summer following, the settlers had no flour, except that ground in hand and coffee mills, which was, however, considered very good. Not all had even that. During the summer, the Connecticut Land Company opened the first road on the Reserve, which commenced about ten miles south of the lake shore, on the Pennsylvania State line, and extended to Cleveland. In January, 1799, Mr. Doane moved to Doane's Corners, leaving only Maj. Carter's family in Cleveland, all the rest leaving as soon as they were well enough. For fifteen months, the Major and his family were the only white persons left on the town site. During the spring, Wheeler W. Williams and Maj. Wyatt built the first grist-mill on the Reserve, on the site of Newburg. It was looked upon as a very valuable accession to the neighborhood. Prior to this, each family had its own hand-mill in one of the corners of the cabin. The old mill is thus described by a pioneer:

"The stones were of the common grindstone grit, about four inches thick, and twenty in diameter. The runner, or upper, was turned by hand, by a pole set in the top of it, near the outer edge. The upper end of the pole was inserted into a hole in a board fastened above to the joists, immediately over the hole in the verge of the runner. One person fed the corn into the eye—a hole in the center of the runner—while another turned. It was very hard work to grind, and the operators alternately exchanged places."

In 1800, several settlers came to the town and a more active life was the result. From this time, Cleveland began to progress. The 4th of July, 1801, the first ball in town was held at Major Carter's log cabin, on the hill-side. John and Benjamin Wood, and R. H. Blinn were managers; and Maj. Samuel Jones, musician and master of ceremonies. The company numbered about thirty, very evenly divided, for the times, between the sexes. "Notwithstanding the dancers had a rough puncheon floor, and no better beverage to enliven their spirits than sweetened whisky, yet it is doubtful if the anniversary of American independence was ever celebrated in Cleveland by a more joyful and harmonious company than those who danced the scamper-down, double-shuffle, western-swing and half-moon, that day, in Maj. Carter's cabin." The growth of the town, from this period on, remained prosperous. The usual visits of the Indians were made, ending in their drunken carousals and fights. Deer and other wild animals furnished abundant meat. The settlement was constantly augmented by new arrivals, so that, by 1814, Cleveland was incorporated as a town, and, in 1836, as a city. Its harbor is one of the best on the lakes, and hence the merchandise of the lakes has always been attracted thither. Like Cincinnati and Chillicothe, it became the nucleus of settlements in this part of the State, and now is the largest city in Northern Ohio.

One of the earliest settlements made in the Western Reserve, and by some claimed as the first therein, was made on the site of Youngstown, Mahoning County, by a Mr. Young, afterward a Judge, in the summer of 1796. During this summer, before the settlements at Cuyahoga and Conneaut were made, Mr. Young and Mr. Wilcott, proprietors of a township of land in Northeastern Ohio, came to their possessions and began the survey of their land. Just when they came is not known. They were found here by Col. James Hillman, then a trader in the employ of Duncan & Wilson, of Pittsburgh, "who had been forwarding goods across the country by pack-saddle horses since 1786, to the mouth of the Cuyahoga, thence to be shipped on the schooner Mackinaw to Detroit. Col. Hillman generally had charge of all these caravans, consisting sometimes of ninety horses and ten men. They commonly crossed the Big Beaver four miles below the mouth of the Shenango, thence up the left bank of the Mahoning—called by the Indians "Mahoni" or "Mahonick," signifying the "lick" or "at the lick"—crossing it about three miles below the site of Youngstown, thence by way of the Salt Springs, over the sites of Milton and Ravenna, crossing the Cuyahoga at the mouth of Breakneck and again at the mouth of Tinker's Creek, thence down the river to its mouth, where they had a log hut in which to store their goods. This hut was there when the surveyors came, but at the time unoccupied. At the mouth of Tinker's Creek were a few log huts built by Moravian Missionaries. These were used only one year, as the Indians had gone to the Tuscarawas River. These and three or four cabins at the Salt Springs were the only buildings erected by the whites prior to 1796, in Northeastern Ohio. Those at the Salt Springs were built at an early day for the accommodation of whites who came from Western Pennsylvania to make salt. The tenants were dispossessed in 1785 by Gen. Harmar. A short time after, one or two white men were killed by the Indians here. In 1788, Col. Hillman settled at Beavertown, where Duncan & Wilson had a store for the purpose of trading with the Indians. He went back to Pittsburgh soon after, however, owing to the Indian war, and remained there till its close, continuing in his business whenever opportunity offered. In 1796, when returning from one of his trading expeditions alone in his canoe down the Mahoning River, he discovered a smoke on the bank near the present town of Youngstown, and on going to the spot found Mr. Young and Mr. Wolcott, as before mentioned. A part of Col. Hillman's cargo consisted of whisky, a gallon or so of which he still had. The price of "fire-water" then was $1 per quart in the currency of the country, a deerskin being legal tender for $1, and a doeskin for 50 cents. Mr. Young proposed purchasing a quart, and having a frolic on its contents during the evening, and insisted on paying Hillman his customary price. Hillman urged that inasmuch as they were strangers in the country, civility required him to furnish the means for the entertainment. Young, however, insisted, and taking the deerskin used for his bed—the only one he had—paid for his quart of whisky, and an evening's frolic was the result.

"Hillman remained a few days, when they accompanied him to Beaver Town to celebrate the 4th, and then all returned, and Hillman erected a cabin on the site of Youngstown. It is not certain that they remained here at this time, and hence the priority of actual settlement is generally conceded to Conneaut and Cleveland. The next year, in the fall, a Mr. Brown and one other person came to the banks of the Mahoning and made a permanent settlement. The same season Uriah Holmes and Titus Hayes came to the same locality, and before winter quite a settlement was to be seen here. It proceeded quite prosperously until the wanton murder of two Indians occurred, which, for a time, greatly excited the whites, lest the Indians should retaliate. Through the efforts of Col. Hillman, who had great influence with the natives, they agreed to let the murderers stand a trial. They were acquitted upon some technicality. The trial, however, pacified the Indians, and no trouble came from the unwarranted and unfortunate circumstance, and no check in the emigration or prosperity of the colony occurred."*

As soon as an effective settlement had been established at Youngstown, others were made in the surrounding country. One of these was begun by William Fenton in 1798, on the site of the present town of Warren, in Trumbull County. He remained here alone one year, when he was joined by Capt. Ephraim Quimby. By the last of September, the next year, the colony had increased to sixteen, and from that date on continued prosperously. Once or twice they stood in fear of the Indians, as the result of quarrels induced by whisky. Sagacious persons generally saved any serious outbreak and pacified the natives. Mr. Badger, the first missionary on the Reserve, came to the settlement here and on the Mahoning, as soon as each was made, and, by his earnest labors, succeeded in forming churches and schools at an early day. He was one of the most efficient men on the Reserve, and throughout his long and busy life, was well known and greatly respected. He died in 1846, aged eighty-nine years.

The settlements given are about all that were made before the close of 1797. In following the narrative of these settlements, attention is paid to the chronological order, as far as this can be done. Like those settlements already made, many which are given as occurring in the next year, 1798, were actually begun earlier, but were only temporary preparations, and were not considered as made until the next year.

Turning again to the southern portion of Ohio, the Scioto, Muskingum and Miami Valleys come prominently into notice. Throughout the entire Eastern States they were still attracting attention, and an increased emigration, busily occupying their verdant fields, was the result. All about Chillicothe was now well settled, and, up the banks of that stream, prospectors were selecting sites for their future homes.

In 1797, Robert Armstrong, George Skidmore, Lucas Sullivan, William Domigan, James Marshall, John Dill, Jacob Grubb, Jacob Overdier, Arthur O'Hara, John Brickell, Col. Culbertson, the Deardorfs, McElvains, Selles and others, came to what is now Franklin County, and, in August, Mr. Sullivan and some others laid out the town of Franklinton, on the west bank of the Scioto, opposite the site of Columbus. The country about this locality had long been the residence of the Wyandots, who had a large town on the city's site, and cultivated extensive fields of corn on the river bottoms. The locality had been visited by the whites as early as 1780, in some of their expeditions, and the fertility of the land noticed. As soon as peace was assured, the whites came and began a settlement, as has been noted. Soon after Franklinton was established, a Mr. Springer and his son-in-law, Osborn, settled on the Big Darby, and, in the summer of 1798, a scattering settlement was made on Alum Creek. About the same time settlers came to the mouth of the Gahannah, and along other water-courses. Franklinton was the point to which emigrants came, and from which they always made their permanent location. For several years there was no mill, nor any such commodity, nearer than Chillicothe. A hand-mill was constructed in Franklinton, which was commonly used, unless the settlers made a trip to Chillicothe in a canoe. Next, a horse-mill was tried; but not till 1805, when Col. Kilbourne built a mill at Worthington, settled in 1803, could any efficient grinding be done. In 1789, a small store was opened in Franklinton, by James Scott, but, for seven or eight years, Chillicothe was the nearest post office. Often, when the neighbors wanted mail, one of their number was furnished money to pay the postage on any letters that might be waiting, and sent for the mail. At first, as in all new localities, a great deal of sickness, fever and ague, prevailed.

* Recollections of Col. Hillman.—Howe's Annals.

As the people became acclimated, this, however, disappeared.

The township of Sharon in this county has a history similar to that of Granville Township in Licking County. It was settled by a "Scioto Company," formed in Granby, Conn., in the winter of 1801-02, consisting at first of eight associates. They drew up articles of association, among which was one limiting their number to forty, each of whom must be unanimously chosen by ballot, a single negative being sufficient to prevent an election. Col. James Kilbourne was sent out the succeeding spring to explore the country and select and purchase a township for settlement. He returned in the fall without making any purchase, through fear that the State Constitution, then about to be formed, would tolerate slavery, in which case the project would have been abandoned. While on this visit, Col. Kilbourne compiled from a variety of sources the first map made of Ohio. Although much of it was conjectured, and hence inaccurate, it was very valuable, being correct as far as the State was then known.

"As soon as information was received that the constitution of Ohio prohibited slavery, Col. Kilbourne purchased the township he had previously selected, within the United States military land district, and, in the spring of 1803, returned to Ohio, and began improvements. By the succeeding December, one hundred settlers, mainly from Hartford County, Conn., and Hampshire County, Mass., arrived at their new home. Obeying to the letter the agreement made in the East, the first cabin erected was used for a schoolhouse and a church of the Protestant Episcopal denomination; the first Sabbath after the arrival of the colony, divine service was held therein, and on the arrival of the eleventh family a school was opened. This early attention to education and religion has left its favorable impress upon the people until this day. The first 4th of July was uniquely and appropriately celebrated. Seventeen gigantic trees, emblematical of the seventeen States forming the Union, were cut, so that a few blows of the ax, at sunrise on the 4th, prostrated each successively with a tremendous crash, forming a national salute novel in the world's history."*

The growth of this part of Ohio continued without interruption until the establishment of the State capital at Columbus, in 1816. The town was laid out in 1812, but, as that date is considered remote in the early American settlements, its history will be left to succeeding pages, and there traced when the history of the State capital and State government is given.

The site of Zanesville, in Muskingum County, was early looked upon as an excellent place to form a settlement, and, had not hostilities opened in 1791, with the Indians, the place would have been one of the earliest settled in Ohio. As it was, the war so disarranged matters, that it was not till 1797 that a permanent settlement was effected.

The Muskingum country was principally occupied, in aboriginal times, by the Wyandots, Delawares, and a few Senecas and Shawanees. An Indian town once stood, years before the settlement of the country, in the vicinity of Duncan's Falls, in Muskingum County, from which circumstance the place is often called "Old Town." Near Dresden, was a large Shawanee town, called Wakatomaca. The graveyard was quite large, and, when the whites first settled here, remains of the town were abundant. It was in this vicinity that the venerable Maj. Cass, father of Lewis Cass, lived and died. He owned 4,000 acres, given him for his military services.

The first settlers on the site of Zanesville were William McCulloh and Henry Crooks. The locality was given to Ebenezer Zane, who had been allowed three sections of land on the Scioto, Muskingum and Hockhocking, wherever the road crossed these rivers, provided other prior claims did not interfere, for opening "Zane's trace." When he located the road across the Muskingum, he selected the place where Zanesville now stands, being attracted there by the excellent water privileges. He gave the section of land here to his brother Jonathan Zane, and J. McIntire, who leased the ferry, established on the road over the Muskingum, to William McCulloh and Henry Crooks, who became thereby the first settlers. The ferry was kept about where the old upper bridge was afterward placed. The ferry-boat was made by fastening two canoes together with a stick. Soon after a flat-boat was used. It was brought from Wheeling, by Mr. McIntire, in 1797, the year after the ferry was established. The road cut out through Ohio, ran from Wheeling, Va., to Maysville, Ky. Over this road the mail was carried, and, in 1798, the first mail ever carried wholly in Ohio was brought up from Marietta to McCulloh's cabin by Daniel Convers, where, by arrangement of the Postmaster General, it met a mail from Wheeling and one from Maysville.

*Howe's Collections.

McCulloh, who could hardly read, was authorized to assort the mails and send each package in its proper direction. For this service he received $30 per annum; but owing to his inability to read well, Mr. Convers generally performed the duty. At that time, the mails met here once a week. Four years after, the settlement had so increased that a regular post office was opened, and Thomas Dowden appointed Postmaster. He kept his office in a wooden building near the river bank.

Messrs. Zane and McIntire laid out a town in 1799, which they called Westbourn. When the post office was established, it was named Zanesville, and in a short time the village took the same name. A few families settled on the west side of the river, soon after McCulloh arrived, and as this locality grew well, not long after a store and tavern was opened here. Mr. McIntire built a double log cabin, which was used as a hotel, and in which Louis Philippe, King of France, was once entertained. Although the fare and accommodations were of the pioneer period, the honorable guest seems to have enjoyed his visit, if the statements of Lewis Cass in his "Camp and Court of Louis Philippe" may be believed.

In 1804, Muskingum County was formed by the Legislature, and, for a while, strenuous efforts made to secure the State capital by the citizens of Zanesville. They even erected buildings for the use of the Legislature and Governor, and during the session of 1810-11, the temporary seat of government was fixed here. When the permanent State capital was chosen in 1816, Zanesville was passed by, and gave up the hope. It is now one of the most enterprising towns in the Muskingum Valley.

During the summer of 1797, John Knoop, then living four miles above Cincinnati, made several expeditions up the Miami Valley and selected the land on which he afterward located. The next spring Mr. Knoop, his brother Benjamin, Henry Garard, Benjamin Hamlet and John Tildus established a station in what is now Miami County, near the present town of Staunton Village. That summer, Mrs. Knoop planted the first apple-tree in the Miami* country. They all lived together for greater safety for two years, during which time they were occupied clearing their farms and erecting dwellings. During the summer, the site of Piqua was settled, and three young men located at a place known as "Freeman's Prairie." Those who settled at Piqua were Samuel Hilliard, Job Garard, Shadrac Hudson, Jonah Rollins, Daniel Cox, Thomas Rich, and a Mr. Hunter. The last named came to the site of Piqua first in 1797, and selected his home. Until 1799, these named were the only ones in this locality; but that year emigration set in, and very shortly occupied almost all the bottom land in Miami County. With the increase of emigration, came the comforts of life, and mills, stores and other necessary aids to civilization, were ere long to be seen.

The site of Piqua is quite historic, being the theater of many important Indian occurrences, and the old home of the Shawanees, of which tribe Tecumseh was a chief. During the Indian war, a fort called Fort Piqua was built, near the residence of Col. John Johnston, so long the faithful Indian Agent. The fort was abandoned at the close of hostilities.

When the Miami Canal was opened through this part of the State, the country began rapidly to improve, and is now probably one of the best portions of Ohio.

About the same time the Miami was settled, a company of people from Pennsylvania and Virginia, who were principally of German and Irish descent, located in Lawrence County, near the iron region. As soon as that ore was made available, that part of the State rapidly filled with settlers, most of whom engaged in the mining and working of iron ore. Now it is very prosperous.

Another settlement was made the same season, 1797, on the Ohio side of the river, in Columbiana County. The settlement progressed slowly for a while, owing to a few difficulties with the Indians. The celebrated Adam Poe had been here as early as 1782, and several localities are made locally famous by his and his brother's adventures.

In this county, on Little Beaver Creek, near its mouth, the second paper-mill west of the Alleghanies was erected in 1805-6. It was the pioneer enterprise of the kind in Ohio, and was named the Ohio Paper-Mill. Its proprietors were John Bever and John Coulter.

One of the most noted localities in the State is comprised in Greene County. The Shawnee town, "Old Chillicothe," was on the Little Miami, in this county, about three miles north of the site of Xenia. This old Indian town was, in the annals of the West, a noted place, and is frequently noticed. It is first mentioned in 1773, by Capt. Thomas Bullitt, of Virginia, who boldly advanced alone into the town and obtained the consent of the Indians to go on to Kentucky and make his settlement at the falls of the Ohio. His audacious bravery gained his request. Daniel Boone was taken prisoner early in 1778, with twenty-seven others, and kept for a time at Old Chillicothe. Through the influence of the British Governor, Hamilton, who had taken a great fancy to Boone, he and ten others were sent to Detroit. The Indians, however, had an equal fancy for the brave frontiersman, and took him back to Chillicothe, and adopted him into their tribe. About the 1st of June he escaped from them, and made his way back to Kentucky, in time to prevent a universal massacre of the whites. In July, 1779, the town was destroyed by Col. John Bowman and one hundred and sixty Kentuckians, and the Indians dispersed.

*The word Miami in the Indian tongue signified mother. The Miami were the original owners of the valley by that name, and affirmed they were created there.

The Americans made a permanent settlement in this county in 1797 or 1798. This latter year, a mill was erected in the confines of the county, which implies the settlement was made a short time previously. A short distance east of the mill two block-houses were erected, and it was intended, should it become necessary, to surround them and the mill with pickets. The mill was used by the settlers at "Dutch Station," in Miami County, fully thirty miles distant. The richness of the country in this part of the State attracted a great number of settlers, so that by 1803 the county was established, and Xenia laid out, and designated as the county seat. Its first court house, a primitive log structure, was long preserved as a curiosity. It would indeed be a curiosity now.

Zane's trace, passing from Wheeling to Maysville, crossed the Hockhocking* River, in Fairfield County, where Lancaster is now built. Mr. Zane located one of his three sections on this river, covering the site of Lancaster. Following this trace in 1797, many individuals noted the desirableness of the locality, some of whom determined to return and settle. "The site of the city had in former times been the home of the Wyandots, who had a town here, that, in 1790, contained over 500 wigwams and more than 1,000 souls. Their town was called Tarhee, or, in English, the Crane-town, and derived its name from the principal chief of that tribe. Another portion of the tribe then lived at Toby-town, nine miles west of Tarhe-town (now Royaltown), and was governed by an inferior chief called Toby. The chief's wigwam in Tarhe stood on the bank of the prairie, near a beautiful and abundant spring of water, whose outlet was the river. The wigwams of the Indians were built of the bark of trees, set on poles, in the form of a sugar-camp, with one square open, fronting a fire, and about the height of a man. The Wyandot tribe that day numbered about 500 warriors. By the treaty of Greenville, they ceded all their territory, and the majority, under their chief, removed to Upper Sandusky. The remainder lingered awhile, loath to leave the home of their ancestors, but as game became scarce, they, too, left for better hunting-grounds."*

In April, 1798, Capt. Joseph Hunter, a bold, enterprising man, settled on Zane's trace, on the bank of the prairie, west of the crossings, at a place since known as "Hunter's settlement." For a time, he had no neighbors nearer than the settlers on the Muskingum and Scioto Rivers. He lived to see the country he had found a wilderness, full of the homes of industry. His wife was the first white woman that settled in the valley, and shared with him all the privations of a pioneer life.

Mr. Hunter had not been long in the valley till he was joined by Nathaniel Wilson, John and Allen Green, John and Joseph McMullen, Robert Cooper, Isaac Shaefer, and a few others, who erected cabins and planted corn. The next year, the tide of emigration came in with great force. In the spring, two settlements were made in Greenfield Township, each settlement containing twenty or more families. One was called the Forks of the Hockhocking, the other, Yankeetown. Settlements were also made along the river below Hunter's, on Rush Creek, Raccoon and Indian Creeks, Pleasant Run, Felter's Run, at Tobeytown, Muddy Prairie, and on Clear Creek. In the fall, —1799—Joseph Loveland and Hezekiah Smith built a log grist-mill at the Upper Falls of the Hockhocking, afterward known as Rock Mill. This was the first mill on this river. In the latter part of the year, a mail route was established over the trace. The mail was carried through on horseback, and, in the settlements in this locality, was left at the cabin of Samuel Coates, who lived on the prairie at the crossings of the river.

* The word Hock-hock-ing in the Delaware language signifies a bottle: the Shawanees have it Wen-tha-bagh-gua sepe, ie; bottle river. John White in the American Pioneer says: "About seven miles north-west of Lancaster, there is a fall in the Hockhocking of about twenty feet. Above the fall for a short distance, the creek is very narrow and straight forming a neck, while at the falls it suddenly widens on each side and swells into the appearance of the body of a bottle. The whole, when seen from above, appears exactly in the shape of a bottle, and from this fact the Indians called the river Hock-hock-ing."—Howe's Collections.

* Lecture of George Sanderson.—Howe's Collections.

In the fall of the next year, Ebenezer Zane laid out Lancaster, which, until 1805, was known as New Lancaster. The lots sold very rapidly, at $50 each, and, in less than one year, quite a village appeared. December 9, the Governor and Judges of the Northwest Territory organized Fairfield County, and made Lancaster the county seat. The year following, the Rev. John Wright, a minister of the Presbyterian Church, came, and from that time on schools and churches were established and thereafter regularly maintained at this place.

Not far from Lancaster are immense mural escarpments of sandstone formation. They were noted among the aborigines, and were, probably, used by them as places of outlook and defense.

The same summer Fairfield County was settled, the towns of Bethel and Williamsburg, in Clermont County, were settled and laid out, and in 1800, the county was erected.

A settlement was also made immediately south of Fairfield County, in Hocking County, by Christian Westenhaver, a German, from near Hagerstown, Md. He came in the spring of 1798, and was soon joined by several families, who formed quite a settlement. The territory included in the county remained a part of Ross, Athens and Fairfield, until 1818, when Hocking County was erected, and Logan, which had been laid out in 1816, was made the county seat.

The country comprised in the county is rather broken, especially along the Hockhocking River. This broken country was a favorite resort of the Wyandot Indians, who could easily hide in the numerous grottoes and ravines made by the river and its affluents as the water cut its way through the sandstone rocks.

In 1798, soon after Zane's trace was cut through the country, a Mr. Graham located on the site of Cambridge, in Guernsey County. His was then the only dwelling between Wheeling and Zanesville, on the trace. He remained here alone about two years, when he was succeeded by George Beymer, from Somerset, Penn. Both these persons kept a tavern and ferry over Will's Creek. In April, 1803, Mr. Beymer was succeeded by John Beatty, who came from Loudon, Va. His family consisted of eleven persons. The Indians hunted in this vicinity, and were frequent visitors at the tavern. In June, 1806, Cambridge was laid out, and on the day the lots were offered for sale, several families from the British Isle of Guernsey, near the coast of France, stopped here on their way to the West. They were satisfied with the location and purchased many of the lots, and some land in the vicinity. They were soon followed by other families from the same place, all of whom settling in this locality gave the name to the county when it was erected in 1810.

A settlement was made in the central part of the State, on Darby Creek, in Union County, in the summer of 1798, by James and Joshua Ewing. The next year, they were joined by Samuel and David Mitchell, Samuel Mitchell, Jr., Samuel Kirkpatrick and Samuel McCullough, and, in 1800, by George and Samuel Reed, Robert Snodgrass and Paul Hodgson.

"James Ewing's farm was the site of an ancient and noted Mingo town, which was deserted at the time the Mingo towns, in what is now Logan County, were destroyed by Gen. Logan, of Kentucky, in 1786. When Mr. Ewing took possession of his farm, the cabins were still standing, and, among others, the remains of a blacksmith's shop, with coal, cinders, iron-dross, etc. Jonathan Alder, formerly a prisoner among the Indians, says the shop was carried on by a renegade white man, named Butler, who lived among the Mingoes. Extensive fields had formerly been cultivated in the vicinity of the town."*

Soon after the settlement was established, Col. James Curry located here. He was quite an influential man, and, in 1820, succeeded in getting the county formed from portions of Delaware, Franklin, Madison and Logan, and a part of the old Indian Territory. Marysville was made the county seat.

During the year 1789, a fort, called Fort Steuben, was built on the site of Steubenville, but was dismantled at the conclusion of hostilities in 1795. Three years after, Bezaleel Wells and Hon. James Ross, for whom Ross County was named, located the town of Steubenville about the old fort, and, by liberal offers of lots, soon attracted quite a number of settlers. In 1805, the town was incorporated, and then had a population of several hundred persons. Jefferson County was created by Gov. St. Clair, July 29, 1797, the year before Steubenville was laid out. It then included the large scope of country west of Pennsylvania; east and north of a line from the mouth of the Cuyahoga; southwardly to the Muskingum, and east to the Ohio; including, in its territories, the cities of Cleveland, Canton, Steubenville and Warren. Only a short time, however, was it allowed to retain this size, as the increase in emigration rendered it necessary to erect new counties, which was rapidly done, especially on the adoption of the State government.

The county is rich in early history, prior to its settlement by the Americans. It was the home of the celebrated Mingo chief, Logan, who resided awhile at an old Mingo town, a few miles below the site of Steubenville, the place where the troops under Col. Williamson rendezvoused on their infamous raid against the Moravian Indians; and also where Col. Crawford and his men met, when starting on their unfortunate expedition.

In the Reserve, settlements were often made remote from populous localities, in accordance with the wish of a proprietor, who might own a tract of country twenty or thirty miles in the interior. In the present county of Geauga, three families located at Burton in 1798. They lived at a considerable distance from any other settlement for some time, and were greatly inconvenienced for the want of mills or shops. As time progressed, however, these were brought nearer, or built in their midst, and, ere long, almost all parts of the Reserve could show some settlement, even if isolated.

The next year, 1799, settlements were made at Ravenna, Deerfield and Palmyra, in Portage County. Hon. Benjamin Tappan came to the site of Ravenna in June, at which time he found one white man, a Mr. Honey, living there. At this date, a solitary log cabin occupied the sites of Buffalo and Cleveland. On his journey from New England, Mr. Tappan fell in with David Hudson, the founder of the Hudson settlement in Summit County. After many days of travel, they landed at a prairie in Summit County. Mr. Tappan left his goods in a cabin, built for the purpose, under the care of a hired man, and went on his way, cutting a road to the site of Ravenna, where his land lay. On his return for a second load of goods, they found the cabin deserted, and evidences of its plunder by the Indians. Not long after, it was learned that the man left in charge had gone to Mr. Hudson's settlement, he having set out immediately on his arrival, for his own land. Mr. Tappan gathered the remainder of his goods, and started back for Ravenna. On his way one of his oxen died, and he found himself in a vast forest, away from any habitation, and with one dollar in money. He did not falter a moment, but sent his hired man, a faithful fellow, to Erie, Penn., a distance of one hundred miles through the wilderness, with the compass for his guide, requesting from Capt. Lyman, the commander at the fort there, a loan of money. At the same time, he followed the township lines to Youngstown, where he became acquainted with Col. James Hillman, who did not hesitate to sell him an ox on credit, at a fair price. He returned to his load in a few days, found his ox all right, hitched the two together and went on. He was soon joined by his hired man, with the money, and together they spent the winter in a log cabin. He gave his man one hundred acres of land as a reward, and paid Col. Hillman for the ox. In a year or two he had a prosperous settlement, and when the county was erected in 1807, Ravenna was made the seat of justice.

About the same time Mr. Tappan began his settlement, others were commenced in other localities in this county. Early in May, 1799, Lewis Day and his son Horatio, of Granby, Conn., and Moses Tibbals and Green Frost, of Granville, Mass., left their homes in a one-horse wagon, and, the 29th of May, arrived in what is now Deerfield Township. There was the first wagon that had ever penetrated farther westward in this region than Canfield. The country west of that place had been an unbroken wilderness until within a few days. Capt. Caleb Atwater, of Wallingford, Conn., had hired some men to open a road to Township No. 1, in the Seventh Range, of which he was the owner. This road passed through Deerfield, and was completed to that place when the party arrived at the point of their destination. These emigrants selected sites, and commenced clearing the land. In July, Lewis Ely arrived from Granville, and wintered here, while those who came first, and had made their improvements, returned East. The 4th of March, 1800, Alva Day (son of Lewis Day), John Campbell and Joel Thrall arrived. In April, George and Robert Taylor and James Laughlin, from Pennsylvania, with their families, came. Mr. Laughlin built a grist-mill, which was of great convenience to the settlers. July 29, Lewis Day returned with his family and his brother-in-law, Maj. Rogers, who, the next year, also brought his family.

"Much suffering was experienced at first on account of the scarcity of provisions. They were chiefly supplied from the settlements east of the Ohio River, the nearest of which was Georgetown, forty miles away. The provisions were brought on pack-horses through the wilderness. August 22, Mrs. Alva Day gave birth to a child—a female—the first child born in the township.

November 7, the first wedding took place. John Campbell and Sarah Ely were joined in wedlock by Calvin Austin, Esq., of Warren. He was accompanied from Warren, a distance of twenty-seven miles, by Mr. Pease, then a lawyer, afterward a well-known Judge. They came on foot, there being no road; and, as they threaded their way through the woods, young Pease taught the Justice the marriage ceremony by oft repetition.

"In 1802, Franklin Township was organized, embracing all of Portage and parts of Trumbull and Summit Counties. About this time the settlement received accessions from all parts of the East. In February, 1801, Rev. Badger came and began his labors, and two years later Dr. Shadrac Bostwick organized a Methodist Episcopal church.* The remaining settlement in this county, Palmyra, was begun about the same time as the others, by David Daniels, from Salisbury, Conn. The next year he brought out his family. Soon after he was joined by E. N. and W. Bacon, E. Cutler, A. Thurber, A. Preston, N. Bois, J. T. Baldwin, T. and C. Gilbert, D. A. and S. Waller, N. Smith, Joseph Fisher, J. Tuttle and others.

"When this region was first settled, there was an Indian trail commencing at Fort McIntosh (Beaver, Penn.), and extending westward to Sandusky and Detroit. The trail followed the highest ground. Along the trail, parties of Indians were frequently seen passing, for several years after the whites came. It seemed to be the great aboriginal thoroughfare from Sandusky to the Ohio River. There were several large piles of stones on the trail in this locality, under which human skeletons have been discovered. These are supposed to be the remains of Indians slain in war, or murdered by their enemies, as tradition says it is an Indian custom for each one to cast a stone on the grave of an enemy, whenever he passes by. These stones appear to have been picked up along the trail, and cast upon the heaps at different times.

"At the point where this trail crosses Silver Creek, Fredrick Daniels and others, in 1814, discovered, painted on several trees, various devices, evidently the work of Indians. The bark was carefully shaved off two-thirds of the way around, and figures cut upon the wood. On one of these was delineated seven Indians, equipped in a particular manner, one of whom was without a head. This was supposed to have been made by a party on their return westward, to give intelligence to their friends behind, of the loss of one of their party at this place; and, on making search, a human skeleton was discovered near by."*

The celebrated Indian hunter, Brady, made his remarkable leap across the Cuyahoga, in this county. The county also contains Brady's Pond, a large sheet of water, in which he once made his escape from the Indians, from which circumstance it received its name.

The locality comprised in Clark County was settled the same summer as those in Summit County. John Humphries came to this part of the State with Gen. Simon Kenton, in 1799. With them came six families from Kentucky, who settled north of the site of Springfield. A fort was erected on Mad River, for security against the Indians. Fourteen cabins were soon built near it, all being surrounded by a strong picket fence. David Lowery, one of the pioneers here, built the first flat-boat, to operate on the Great Miami, and, in 1800, made the first trip on that river, coming down from Dayton. He took his boat and cargo on down to New Orleans, where he disposed of his load of "five hundred venison hams and bacon."

Springfield was laid out in March, 1801. Griffith Foos, who came that spring, built a tavern, which he completed and opened in June, remaining in this place till 1814. He often stated that when emigrating West, his party were four days and a half getting from Franklinton, on the Scioto, to Springfield, a distance of forty-two miles. When crossing the Big Darby, they were obliged to carry all their goods over on horseback, and then drag their wagons across with ropes, while some of the party swam by the side of the wagon, to prevent its upsetting. The site of the town was of such practical beauty and utility, that it soon attracted a large number of settlers, and, in a few years, Springfield was incorporated. In 1811, a church was built by the residents for the use of all denominations.

Clark County is made famous in aboriginal history, as the birthplace and childhood home of the noted Indian, Tecumseh.† He was born in

*Howe's Collections.

†Tecumseh, or Tecumsh, was a son of Puckeshinwa, a member of the Kiscopoke tribe, and Methoatske, of the Turtle tribe of the Shawanee nation. They removed from Florida to Ohio soon after their marriage. The father, Puckeshinwa, rose to the rank of a chief, and fell at the battle of Point Pleasant, in 1774. After his death, the mother, Methoatske, returned to the south, where she died at an advanced age. Tecumseh was born about the year 1768. He early showed a passion for war, and, when only 27 years of age, was made a chief. The next year he removed to Deer Creek, in the vicinity of Urbana, and from there to the site of Piqua, on the Great Miami. In 1798 he accepted the invitation of the Delawares in the vicinity of White River, Indiana, and from that time made the old Indian town of Piqua, the ancient Piqua of the Shawanees, on the north side of Mad River, about five miles west of Springfield. The town was destroyed by the Kentucky Rangers under Gen. George Rogers Clarke in 1780, at the same time he destroyed "Old Chillicothe." Immense fields of standing corn about both towns were cut down, compelling the Indians to resort to the hunt with more than ordinary vigor, to sustain themselves and their wives and children. This search insured safety for some time on the borders. The site of Cadiz, in Harrison County, was settled in April, 1799, by Alexander Henderson and his family, from Washington County, Penn. When they arrived, they found neighbors in the persons of Daniel Peterson and his family, who lived near the forks of Short Creek, and who had preceded them but a very short time. The next year, emigrants began to cross the Ohio in great numbers, and in five or six years large settlements could be seen in this part of the State. The county was erected in 1814, and Cadiz, laid out in 1803, made the county seat.

While the settlers were locating in and about Cadiz, a few families came to what is now Monroe County, and settled near the present town of Beallsville. Shortly after, a few persons settled on the Clear Fork of the Little Muskingum, and a few others on the east fork of Duck Creek. The next season all these settlements received additions and a few other localities were also occupied. Before long the town of Beallsville was laid out, and in time became quite populous. The county was not erected until 1813, and in 1815 Woodsfield was laid out and made the seat of justice.

The opening of the season of 1800—the dawn of a new century—saw a vast emigration westward. Old settlements in Ohio received immense increase of emigrants, while, branching out in all directions like the radii of a circle, other settlements were constantly formed until, in a few years, all parts of the State knew the presence of the white man.

Towns sprang into existence here and there; mills and factories were erected; post offices and post-routes were established, and the comforts and conveniences of life began to appear.

With this came the desire, so potent to the mind of all American citizens, to rule themselves through representatives chosen by their own votes. Hitherto, they had been ruled by a Governor and Judges appointed by the President, who, in turn, appointed county and judicial officers. The arbitrary rulings of the Governor, St. Clair, had arrayed the mass of the people against him, and made the desire for the second grade of government stronger, and finally led to its creation.

CHAPTER X.

FORMATION OF THE STATE GOVERNMENT—OHIO A STATE—THE STATE CAPITALS—LEGISLATION—THE "SWEEPING RESOLUTIONS"—TERRITORIAL AND STATE GOVERNORS.

SETTLEMENTS increased so rapidly in that part of the Northwest Territory included in Ohio, during the decade from 1788 to 1798, despite the Indian war, that the demand for an election of a Territorial Assembly could not be ignored by Gov. St. Clair, who, having ascertained that 5,000 free males resided within the limits of the Territory, issued his proclamation October 29, 1798, directing the electors to elect representatives to a General Assembly. He ordered the election his home with them. He was most active in the war of 1812 against the Americans, and from the time he began his work to unite the tribes, his history is so closely identified therewith that the reader is referred to the history of that war in succeeding pages.

It may not be amiss to say that all stories regarding the manner of his death are considered erroneous. He was undoubtedly killed in the outset of the battle of the Thames in Canada in 1814, and his body secretly buried by the Indians.

to be held on the third Monday in December, and directed the representatives to meet in Cincinnati January 22, 1799.

On the day designated, the representatives* assembled at Cincinnati, nominated ten persons, whose names were sent to the President, who selected five to constitute the Legislative Council, or Upper House. These five were Jacob Burnet, James Findley, Henry Vanderburgh, Robert Oliver and David Vance. On the 3d of March, the Senate confirmed their nomination, and the Territorial Government of Ohio*—or, more properly, the Northwest—was complete. As this comprised the essential business of this body, it was prorogued by the Governor, and the Assembly directed to meet at the same place September 16, 1799, and proceed to the enactment of laws for the Territory.

*Those elected were: from Washington County, Return Jonathan Meigs and Paul Fearing; from Hamilton County, William Goforth, William McMillan, John Smith, John Ludlow, Robert Benham, Aaron Caldwell and Isaac Martin; from St. Clair County (Illinois), Shadrach Bond; from Knox County (Indiana), John Small; from Randolph County (Illinois), John Edgar; from Wayne County, Solomon Sibley, Jacob Visgar and Charles F. Chabert de Joncaire; from Adams County, Joseph Darlington and Nathaniel Massie; from Jefferson County, James Pritchard; from Ross County, Thomas Worthington, Elias Langham, Samuel Findley and Edward Tiffin. The five gentlemen, except Vanderburgh, chosen as the Upper House were all from counties afterward included in Ohio.

That day, the Territorial Legislature met again at Cincinnati, but, for want of a quorum, did not organize until the 24th. The House consisted of nineteen members, seven of whom were from Hamilton County, four from Ross, three from Wayne, two from Adams, one from Jefferson, one from Washington and one from Knox. Assembling both branches of the Legislature, Gov. St. Clair addressed them, recommending such measures to their consideration as, in his judgment, were suited to the condition of the country. The Council then organized, electing Henry Vanderburgh, President; William C. Schenck, Secretary; George Howard, Doorkeeper, and Abraham Carey, Sergeant-at-arms.

The House also organized, electing Edward Tiffin, Speaker; John Reilly, Clerk; Joshua Rowland, Doorkeeper, and Abraham Carey, Sergeant-at-arms.

This was the first legislature elected in the old Northwestern Territory. During its first session, it passed thirty bills, of which the Governor vetoed eleven. They also elected William Henry Harrison, then Secretary of the Territory, delegate to Congress. The Legislature continued in session till December 19, having much to do in forming new laws, when they were prorogued by the Governor, until the first Monday in November, 1800. The second session was held in Chillicothe, which had been designated as the seat of government by Congress, until a permanent capital should be selected.

May 7, 1800, Congress passed an act establishing Indiana Territory, including all the country west of the Great Miami River to the Mississippi, and appointed William Henry Harrison its Governor. At the autumn session of the Legislature of the eastern, or old part of the Territory, William McMillan was elected to the vacancy caused by this act. By the organization of this Territory, the counties of Knox, St. Clair and Randolph, were taken out of the jurisdiction of the old Territory, and with them the representatives, Henry Vanderburgh, Shadrach Bond, John Small and John Edgar.

Before the time for the next Assembly came, a new election had occurred, and a few changes were the result. Robert Oliver, of Marietta, was chosen Speaker in the place of Henry Vanderburgh. There was considerable business at this session; several new counties were to be erected; the country was rapidly filling with people, and where the scruples of the Governor could be overcome, some organization was made. He was very tenacious of his power, and arbitrary in his rulings, affirming that he, alone, had the power to create new counties. This dogmatic exercise of his veto power, his rights as ruler, and his defeat by the Indians, all tended against him, resulting in his displacement by the President. This was done, however, just at the time the Territory came from the second grade of government, and the State was created.

The third session of the Territorial Legislature continued from November 24, 1801, to January 23, 1802, when it adjourned to meet in Cincinnati, the fourth Monday in November, but owing to reasons made obvious by subsequent events, was never held, and the third session marks the decline of the Territorial government.

April 30, 1802, Congress passed an act "to enable the people of the eastern division of the territory northwest of the Ohio River, to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such States into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes." In pursuance of this act, an election had been held in this part of the Territory, and members of a constitutional convention chosen, who were to meet at Chillicothe, November 1, to perform the duty assigned them.

The people throughout the country contemplated in the new State were anxious for the adoption of a State government. The arbitrary acts of the Territorial Governor had heightened this feeling; the census of the Territory gave it the lawful number of inhabitants, and nothing stood in its way.

The convention met the day designated and proceeded at once to its duties. When the time arrived for the opening of the Fourth Territorial

* Ohio never existed as a Territory proper. It was known, both before and after the division of the Northwest Territory, as the "Territory northwest of the Ohio River." Still, as the country comprised in its limits was the principal theater of action, the short resume given here is made necessary in the logical course of events. Ohio, as Ohio, never existed until the creation of the State in March, 1803.

Legislature, the convention was in session and had evidently about completed its labors. The members of the Legislature (eight of whom were members of the convention) seeing that a speedy termination of the Territorial government was inevitable, wisely concluded it was inexpedient and unnecessary to hold the proposed session.

The convention concluded its labors the 29th of November. The Constitution adopted at that time, though rather crude in some of its details, was an excellent organic instrument, and remained almost entire until 1851, when the present one was adopted. Either is too long for insertion here, but either will well pay a perusal. The one adopted by the convention in 1802 was never submitted to the people, owing to the circumstances of the times; but it was submitted to Congress February 19, 1803, and by that body accepted, and an act passed admitting Ohio to the Union.

The Territorial government ended March 3, 1803, by the organization, that day, of the State government, which organization defined the present limits of the State.

"We, the people of the Eastern Division of the Territory of the United States. Northwest of the River Ohio, having the right of admission into the General Government as a member of the Union, consistent with the Constitution of the United States, the Ordinance of Congress of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, and of the law of Congress, entitled 'An act to enable the people of the Eastern Division of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio, to form a Constitution and a State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes,' in order to establish justice, promote the welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish the following Constitution or form of government; and do mutually agree with each other to form ourselves into a free and independent State, by the name of the State of Ohio."*—Preamble, Constitution of 1802.

When the convention forming the Constitution, completed its labors and presented the results to Congress, and that body passed the act forming the State, the territory included therein was divided into nine counties, whose names and dates of erection were as follows:

Washington, July 27, 1788; Hamilton, January 2, 1790; (owing to the Indian war no other counties were erected till peace was restored); Adams, July 10, 1797; Jefferson, July 29, 1797; Ross, August 20, 1798; Clermont, Fairfield and Trumbull, December 9, 1800; Belmont, September 7, 1801. These counties were the thickest-settled part of the State, yet many other localities needed organization and were clamoring for it, but owing to St. Clair's views, he refused to grant their requests. One of the first acts on the assembling of the State Legislature, March 1, 1803, was the creation of seven new counties, viz., Gallia, Scioto, Geauga, Butler, Warren, Greene and Montgomery.

Section Sixth of the "Schedule" of the Constitution required an election for the various officers and Representatives necessary under the new government, to be held the second Tuesday of January, 1803, these officers to take their seats and assume their duties March 3. The Second Article provided for the regular elections, to be held on the second Tuesday of October, in each year. The Governor elected at first was to hold his office until the first regular election could be held, and thereafter to continue in office two years.

The January elections placed Edward Tiffin in the Governor's office, sent Jeremiah Morrow to Congress, and chose an Assembly, who met on the day designated, at Chillicothe. Michael Baldwin was chosen Speaker of the House, and Nathaniel Massie, of the Senate. The Assembly appointed William Creighton, Jr., Secretary of State; Col. Thomas Gibson, Auditor; William McFarland, Treasurer; Return J. Meigs, Jr., Samuel Huntington and William Sprigg, Judges of the Supreme Court; Francis Dunlevy, Wyllys Silliman and Calvin Pease, President Judges of the First, Second and Third Districts, and Thomas Worthington and John Smith, United States Senators. Charles Willing Byrd was made the United States District Judge.

The act of Congress forming the State, contained certain requisitions regarding public schools, the "salt springs," public lands, taxation of Government lands, Symmes' purchase, etc., which the constitutional convention agreed to with a few minor considerations. These Congress accepted, and passed the act in accordance thereto. The First General Assembly found abundance of work to do regarding these various items, and, at once, set themselves to the task. Laws were passed regarding all these; new counties created; officers appointed for the same, until they could be elected, and courts and machinery of government put in motion. President Judges and lawyers traveled their circuits holding courts, often in the open air or in a log shanty; a constable doing duty as guard over a jury, probably seated on a log under a tree, or in the bushes. The President Judge instructed the officers of new counties in their duties, and though the whole keeping of matters accorded with the times, an honest feeling generally prevailed, inducing each one to perform his part as effectually as his knowledge permitted.

* The name of the State is derived from the river forming its southern boundary. Its origin is somewhat obscure, but is commonly ascribed to the Indians. On this point, Col. Johnston says: "The Shawanese called the Ohio River 'Kis-ke-pi-ta, Sepe, i. e., 'Eagle River.'' The Wyandots were in the country generations before the Shawanese, and, consequently, their name of the river is the primitive one and should stand in preference to all others. Ohio may be called an improvement on the expression, 'O-he-zuh,' and was, no doubt, adopted by the early French voyagers in their boat-songs, and is substantially the same word as used by the Wyandots: the meaning applied by the French, fair and beautiful 'la belle river,' being the same precisely as that meant by the Indians—'great, grand and fair to look upon.'"—Hove's Collections.

Webster's Dictionary gives the word as of Indian origin, and its meaning to be, "Beautiful."

The State continually filled with people. New towns arose all over the country. Excepting the occasional sicknesses caused by the new climate and fresh soil, the general health of the people improved as time went on. They were fully in accord with the President, Jefferson, and carefully nurtured those principles of personal liberty engrafted in the fundamental law of 1787, and later, in the Constitution of the State.

Little if any change occurred in the natural course of events, following the change of government until Burr's expedition and plan of secession in 1805 and 1806 appeared. What his plans were, have never been definitely ascertained. His action related more to the General Government, yet Ohio was called upon to aid in putting down his insurrection—for such it was thought to be—and defeated his purposes, whatever they were. His plans ended only in ignominious defeat; the breaking-up of one of the finest homes in the Western country, and the expulsion of himself and all those who were actively engaged in his scheme, whatever its imports were.

Again, for a period of four or five years, no exciting events occurred. Settlements continued; mills and factories increased; towns and cities grew; counties were created; trade enlarged, and naught save the common course of events transpired to mark the course of time. Other States were made from the old Northwest Territory, all parts of which were rapidly being occupied by settlers. The danger from Indian hostilities was little, and the adventurous whites were rapidly occupying their country. One thing, however, was yet a continual source of annoyance to the Americans, viz., the British interference with the Indians. Their traders did not scruple, nor fail on every opportunity, to aid these sons of the forest with arms and ammunition as occasion offered, endeavoring to stir them up against the Americans, until events here and on the high seas culminated in a declaration of hostilities, and the war of 1812 was the result. The deluded red men found then, as they found in 1795, that they were made tools by a stronger power, and dropped when the time came that they were no longer needed.

Before the opening of hostilities occurred, however, a series of acts passed the General Assembly, causing considerable excitement. These were the famous "Sweeping Resolutions," passed in 1810. For a few years prior to their passage, considerable discontent prevailed among many of the legislators regarding the rulings of the courts, and by many of these embryo law-makers, the legislative power was considered omnipotent. They could change existing laws and contracts did they desire to, thought many of them, even if such acts conflicted with the State and National Constitutions. The "Sweeping Resolutions" were brought about mainly by the action of the judges in declaring that justices of the peace could, in the collection of debts, hold jurisdiction in amounts not exceeding fifty dollars without the aid of a jury. The Constitution of the United States gave the jury control in all such cases where the amount did not exceed twenty dollars. There was a direct contradiction against the organic law of the land—to which every other law and act is subversive, and when the judges declared the legislative act unconstitutional and hence null and void, the Legislature became suddenly inflamed at their independence, and proceeded at once to punish the administrators of justice. The legislature was one of the worst that ever controlled the State, and was composed of many men who were not only ignorant of common law, the necessities of a State, and the dignity and true import of their office, but were demagogues in every respect. Having the power to impeach officers, that body at once did so, having enough to carry a two-thirds majority, and removed several judges. Further maturing their plans, the "Sweepers," as they were known, construed the law appointing certain judges and civil officers for seven years, to mean seven years from the organization of the State, whether they had been officers that length of time or not. All officers, whether of new or old counties, were construed as included in the act, and, utterly ignoring the Constitution, an act was passed in January, 1810, removing every civil officer in the State.

February 10, they proceeded to fill all these vacant offices, from State officers down to the lowest county office, either by appointment or by ordering an election in the manner prescribed by law.

The Constitution provided that the office of judges should continue for seven years, evidently seven years from the time they were elected, and not from the date of the admission of the State, which latter construction this headlong Legislature had construed as the meaning. Many of the counties had been organized but a year or two, others three or four years; hence an indescribable confusion arose as soon as the new set of officers were appointed or elected. The new order of things could not be made to work, and finally, so utterly impossible did the injustice of the proceedings become, that it was dropped. The decisions of the courts were upheld, and the invidious doctrine of supremacy in State legislation received such a check that it is not likely ever to be repeated.

Another act of the Assembly, during this period, shows its construction. Congress had granted a township of land for the use of a university, and located the township in Symmes' purchase. This Assembly located the university on land outside of this purchase, ignoring the act of Congress, as they had done before, showing not only ignorance of the true scope of law, but a lack of respect unbecoming such bodies.

The seat of government was also moved from Chillicothe to Zanesville, which vainly hoped to be made the permanent State capital, but the next session it was again taken to Chillicothe, and commissioners appointed to locate a permanent capital site.

These commissioners were James Findley, Joseph Darlington, Wylls Silliman, Reason Beall, and William McFarland. It is stated that they reported at first in favor of Dublin, a small town on the Scioto about fourteen miles above Columbus. At the session of 1812-13, the Assembly accepted the proposals of Col. James Johnston, Alexander McLaughlin, John Kerr, and Lyne Starling, who owned the site of Columbus. The Assembly also decreed that the temporary seat of government should remain at Chillicothe until the buildings necessary for the State officers should be erected, when it would be taken there, forever to remain. This was done in 1816, in December of that year the first meeting of the Assembly being held there.

The site selected for the capital was on the east bank of the Scioto, about a mile below its junction with the Olentangy. Wide streets were laid out, and preparations for a city made. The expectations of the founders have been, in this respect, realized. The town was laid out in the spring of 1812, under the direction of Moses Wright. A short time after, the contract for making it the capital was signed. June 18, the same day war was declared against Great Britain, the sale of lots took place. Among the early settlers were George McCormick, George B. Harvey, John Shields, Michael Patton, Alexander Patton, William Altman, John Collett, William McElvain, Daniel Kooser, Peter Putnam, Jacob Hare, Christian Heyl, Jarvis, George and Benjamin Pike, William Long, and Dr. John M. Edminson. In 1814, a house of worship was built, a school opened, a newspaper—The Western Intelligencer and Columbus Gazette, now the Ohio State Journal—was started, and the old State House erected. In 1816, the "Borough of Columbus" was incorporated, and a mail route once a week between Chillicothe and Columbus started. In 1819, the old United States Court House was erected, and the seat of justice removed from Franklinton to Columbus. Until 1826, times were exceedingly "slow" in the new capital, and but little growth experienced. The improvement period revived the capital, and enlivened its trade and growth so that in 1834, a city charter was granted. The city is now about third in size in the State, and contains many of the most prominent public institutions. The present capitol building, one of the best in the West, is patterned somewhat after the national Capitol at Washington City.

From the close of the agitation of the "Sweeping Resolutions," until the opening of the war of 1812, but a short time elapsed. In fact, scarcely had one subsided, ere the other was upon the country. Though the war was national, its theater of operations was partly in Ohio, that State taking an active part in its operations. Indeed, its liberty depended on the war.

(a) Arthur St. Clair, of Pennsylvania, was Governor of the Northwest Territory, of which Ohio was a part, from July 13, 1788, when the first civil government was established in the Territory, until about the close of the year 1802, when he was removed by the President.
*Secretary of the Territory, and was acting Governor of the Territory after the removal of Gov. St. Clair.

(b) Resigned March 3, 1807, to accept the office of U. S. Senator.
(c) Return Jonathan Meigs was elected Governor on the second Tuesday of October, 1807, over Nathaniel Massie, who contested the election of Meigs, on the ground that "he had not been a resident of this State for four years next preceding the election, as required by the Constitution," and the General Assembly, in joint convention, declared that he was not eligible. The office was not given to Massie, nor does it appear, from the records that he claimed it, but Thomas Kirker, acting Governor, continued to discharge the duties of the office until December 12, 1808, when Samuel Huntington was inaugurated, he having been elected on the second Tuesday of October in that year.

(d) Resigned March 25, 1814, to accept the office of Postmaster-General of the United States.

(e) Resigned January 4, 1822, to accept the office of United States Senator.

(f) Resigned April 13, 1844, to accept the office of Minister to Mexico.

(g) The result of the election in 1848 was not finally determined in joint convention of the two houses of the General Assembly until January 19, 1849, and the inauguration did not take place until the 22d of that month.

(h) Resigned July 15, 1853 to accept the office of Consul to Valparaiso.

(j) Elected in October, 1853, for the regular term, to commence on the second Monday of January, 1854.

(k) Died August 29, 1865.

CHAPTER XI.

THE WAR OF 1812—GROWTH OF THE STATE—CANAL, RAILROADS AND OTHER IMPROVEMENTS —DEVELOPMENT OF STATE RESOURCES.

IN June, 1812, war was declared against Great Britain. Before this, an act was passed by Congress, authorizing the increase of the regular army to thirty-five thousand troops, and a large force of volunteers, to serve twelve months. Under this act, Return J. Meigs, then Governor of Ohio, in April and May, 1812, raised three regiments of troops to serve twelve months. They rendezvoused at Dayton, elected their officers, and prepared for the campaign. These regiments were numbered First, Second and Third. Duncan McArthur was Colonel of the First; James Findlay, of the Second, and Lewis Cass, of the Third. Early in June these troops marched to Urbana, where they were joined by Boyd's Fourth Regiment of regular troops, under command of Col. Miller, who had been in the battle of Tippecanoe. Near the middle of June, this little army of about twenty-five hundred men, under command of Gov. William Hull, of Michigan, who had been authorized by Congress to raise the troops, started on its northern march. By the end of June, the army had reached the Maumee, after a very severe march, erecting, on the way, Forts McArthur, Necessity and Findlay. By some carelessness on the part of the American Government, no official word had been sent to the frontiers regarding the war, while the British had taken an early precaution to prepare for the crisis. Gov. Hull was very careful in military etiquette, and refused to march, or do any offensive acts, unless commanded by his superior officers at Washington. While at the Maumee, by a careless move, all his personal effects, including all his plans, number and strength of his army, etc., fell into the hands of the enemy. His campaign ended only in ignominious defeat, and well-nigh paralyzed future efforts. All Michigan fell into the hands of the British. The commander, though a good man, lacked bravery and promptness. Had Gen. Harrison been in command no such results would have been the case, and the war would have probably ended at the outset.

Before Hull had surrendered, Charles Scott, Governor of Kentucky, invited Gen. Harrison,

Governor of Indiana Territory, to visit Frankfort, to consult on the subject of defending the Northwest. Gov. Harrison had visited Gov. Scott, and in August, 1812, accepted the appointment of Major General in the Kentucky militia, and, by hasty traveling, on the receipt of the news of the surrender of Detroit, reached Cincinnati on the morning of the 27th of that month. On the 30th he left Cincinnati, and the next day overtook the army he was to command, on its way to Dayton. After leaving Dayton, he was overtaken by an express, informing him of his appointment by the Government as Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the Indiana and Illinois Territories. The army reached Piqua, September 3. From this place Harrison sent a body of troops to aid in the defense of Fort Wayne, threatened by the enemy. On the 6th he ordered all the troops forward, and while on the march, on September 17, he was informed of his appointment as commander of the entire Northwestern troops. He found the army poorly clothed for a winter campaign, now approaching, and at once issued a stirring address to the people, asking for food and comfortable clothing. The address was not in vain. After his appointment, Gen. Harrison pushed on to Auglaize, where, leaving the army under command of Gen. Winchester, he returned to the interior of the State, and establishing his headquarters at Franklinton, began active measures for the campaign.

Early in March, 1812, Col. John Miller raised, under orders, a regiment of infantry in Ohio, and in July assembled his enlisted men at Chillicothe, where, placing them—only one hundred and forty in number—under command of Captain Angus Lewis, he sent them on to the frontier. They erected a block-house at Piqua and then went on to Defiance, to the main body of the army.

In July, 1812, Gen. Edward W. Tupper, of Gallia County, raised one thousand men for six months' duty. Under orders from Gen. Winchester, they marched through Chillicothe and Urbana, on to the Maumee, where, near the lower end of the rapids, they made an ineffectual attempt to drive off the enemy. Failing in this, the enemy attacked Tupper and his troops, who, though worn down with the march and not a little disorganized through the jealousies of the officers, withstood the attack, and repulsed the British and their red allies, who returned to Detroit, and the Americans to Fort McArthur.

In the fall of 1812, Gen. Harrison ordered a detachment of six hundred men, mostly mounted, to destroy the Indian towns on the Missisquoi River, one of the head-waters of the Wabash. The winter set in early and with unusual severity. At the same time this expedition was carried on, Bonaparte was retreating from Moscow. The expedition accomplished its design, though the troops suffered greatly from the cold, no less than two hundred men being more or less frost bitten.

Gen. Harrison determined at once to retake Michigan and establish a line of defense along the southern shores of the lakes. Winchester was sent to occupy Forts Wayne and Defiance; Perkins' brigade to Lower Sandusky, to fortify an old stockade, and some Pennsylvania troops and artillery sent there at the same time. As soon as Gen. Harrison heard the results of the Missisquoi expedition, he went to Chillicothe to consult with Gov. Meigs about further movements, and the best methods to keep the way between the Upper Miami and the Maumee continually open. He also sent Gen. Winchester word to move forward to the rapids of the Maumee and prepare for winter quarters. This Winchester did by the middle of January, 1813, establishing himself on the northern bank of the river, just above Wayne's old battle-ground. He was well fixed here, and was enabled to give his troops good bread, made from corn gathered in Indian corn-fields in this vicinity.

While here, the inhabitants of Frenchtown, on the Raisin River, about twenty miles from Detroit, sent Winchester word claiming protection from the threatened British and Indian invasion, avowing themselves in sympathy with the Americans. A council of war decided in favor of their request, and Col. Lewis, with 550 men, sent to their relief. Soon after, Col. Allen was sent with more troops, and the enemy easily driven away from about Frenchtown. Word was sent to Gen. Winchester, who determined to march with all the men he could spare to aid in holding the post gained. He left, the 19th of January, with 250 men, and arrived on the evening of the 20th. Failing to take the necessary precaution, from some unexplained reason, the enemy came up in the night, established his batteries, and, the next day, surprised and defeated the American Army with a terrible loss. Gen. Winchester was made a prisoner, and, finally, those who were intrenched in the town surrendered, under promise of Proctor, the British commander, of protection from the Indians. This promise was grossly violated the next day. The savages were allowed to enter the town and enact a massacre as cruel and bloody as any in the annals of the war, to the everlasting ignominy of the British General and his troops.

Those of the American Army that escaped, arrived at the rapids on the evening of the 22d of January, and soon the sorrowful news spread throughout the army and nation. Gen. Harrison set about retrieving the disaster at once. Delay could do no good. A fort was built at the rapids, named Fort Meigs, and troops from the south and west hurriedly advanced to the scene of action. The investment and capture of Detroit was abandoned, that winter, owing to the defeat at Frenchtown, and expiration of the terms of service of many of the troops. Others took their places, all parts of Ohio and bordering States sending men.

The erection of Fort Meigs was an obstacle in the path of the British they determined to remove, and, on the 28th of February, 1813, a large band of British and Indians, under command of Proctor, Tecumseh, Walk-in-the-water, and other Indian chiefs, appeared in the Maumee in boats, and prepared for the attack. Without entering into details regarding the investment of the fort, it is only necessary to add, that after a prolonged siege, lasting to the early part of May, the British were obliged to abandon the fort, having been severely defeated, and sailed for the Canadian shores.

Next followed the attacks on Fort Stephenson, at Lower Sandusky, and other predatory excursions, by the British. All of these failed of their design; the defense of Maj. Croghan and his men constituting one of the most brilliant actions of the war. For the gallant defense of Fort Stephenson by Maj. Croghan, then a young man, the army merited the highest honors. The ladies of Chillicothe voted the heroic Major a fine sword, while the whole land rejoiced at the exploits of him and his band.

The decisive efforts of the army, the great numbers of men offered—many of whom Gen. Harrison was obliged to send home, much to their disgust—Perry's victory on Lake Erie, September 10, 1813—all presaged the triumph of the American arms, soon to ensue. As soon as the battle on the lake was over, the British at Malden burned their stores, and fled, while the Americans, under their gallant commander, followed them in Perry's vessel to the Canada shore, overtaking them on the River Thames, October 5. In the battle that ensued, Tecumseh was slain, and the British Army routed.

The war was now practically closed in the West. Ohio troops had done nobly in defending their northern frontier, and in regaining the Northwestern country. Gen. Harrison was soon after elected to Congress by the Cincinnati district, and Gen. Duncan McArthur was appointed a Brigadier General in the regular army, and assigned to the command in his place. Gen. McArthur made an expedition into Upper Canada in the spring of 1814, destroying considerable property, and driving the British farther into their own dominions. Peace was declared early in 1815, and that spring, the troops were mustered out of service at Chillisnothe, and peace with England reigned supreme.

The results of the war in Ohio were, for awhile, similar to the Indian war of 1795. It brought many people into the State, and opened new portions, before unknown. Many of the soldiers immediately invested their money in lands, and became citizens. The war drove many people from the Atlantic Coast west, and as a result much money, for awhile, circulated. Labor and provisions rose, which enabled both workmen and tradesmen to enter tracts of land, and aided emigration. At the conclusion of Wayne's war in 1795, probably not more than five thousand people dwelt in the limits of the State; at the close of the war of 1812, that number was largely increased, even with the odds of war against them. After the last war, the emigration was constant and gradual, building up the State in a manner that betokened a healthful life.

As soon as the effects of the war had worn off, a period of depression set in, as a result of too free speculation indulged in at its close. Gradually a stagnation of business ensued, and many who found themselves unable to meet contracts made in "flush" times, found no alternative but to fail. To relieve the pressure in all parts of the West, Congress, about 1815, reduced the price of public lands from $2 to $1.25 per acre. This measure worked no little hardship on those who owned large tracts of lands, for portions of which they had not fully paid, and as a consequence, these lands, as well as all others of this class, reverted to the Government. The general market was in New Orleans, whither goods were transported in flat-boats built especially for this purpose. This commerce, though small and poorly repaid, was the main avenue of trade, and did much for the slow prosperity prevalent. The few banks in the State found their bills at a discount abroad, and gradually becoming drained of their specie, either closed business or failed, the major part of them adopting the latter course.

The steamboat began to be an important factor in the river navigation of the West about this period. The first boat to descend the Ohio was the Orleans, built at Pittsburg in 1812, and in December of that year, while the fortunes of war hung over the land, she made her first trip from the Iron City to New Orleans, being just twelve days on the way. The second, built by Samuel Smith, was called the Comet, and made a trip as far south as Louisville, in the summer of 1813. The third, the Vesuvius, was built by Fulton, and went to New Orleans in 1814. The fourth, built by Daniel French at Brownsville, Penn., made two trips to Louisville in the summer of 1814. The next vessel, the Ætna, was built by Fulton & Company in 1815. So fast did the business increase, that, four years after, more than forty steamers floated on the Western waters. Improvements in machinery kept pace with the building, until, in 1838, a competent writer stated there were no less than four hundred steamers in the West. Since then, the erection of railways has greatly retarded ship-building, and it is altogether probable the number has increased but little.

The question of canals began to agitate the Western country during the decade succeeding the war. They had been and were being constructed in older countries, and presaged good and prosperous times. If only the waters of the lakes and the Ohio River could be united by a canal running through the midst of the State, thought the people, prosperous cities and towns would arise on its banks, and commerce flow through the land. One of the firmest friends of such improvements was De Witt Clinton, who had been the chief man in forwarding the "Clinton Canal," in New York. He was among the first to advocate the feasibility of a canal connecting Lake Erie and the Ohio River, and, by the success of the New York canals, did much to bring it about. Popular writers of the day all urged the scheme, so that when the Assembly met, early in December, 1821, the resolution, offered by Micajah T. Williams, of Cincinnati, for the appointment of a committee of five members to take into consideration so much of the Governor's message as related to canals, and see if some feasible plan could not be adopted whereby a beginning could be made, was quickly adopted.

The report of the committee, advising a survey and examination of routes, met with the approval of the Assembly, and commissioners were appointed who were to employ an engineer, examine the country and report on the practicability of a canal between the lakes and the river. The commissioners employed James Geddes, of Onondaga County, N. Y., as an engineer. He arrived in Columbus in June, 1822, and, before eight months, the corps of engineers, under his direction, had examined one route. During the next two summers, the examinations continued. A number of routes were examined and surveyed, and one, from Cleveland on the lake, to Portsmouth on the Ohio, was recommended. Another canal, from Cincinnati to Dayton, on the Miami, was determined on, and preparations to commence work made. A Board of Canal Fund Commissioners was created, money was borrowed, and the morning of July 4, 1825, the first shovelful of earth was dug near Newark, with imposing ceremonies, in the presence of De Witt Clinton, Governor of New York, and a mighty concourse of people assembled to witness the auspicious event.

Gov. Clinton was escorted all over the State to aid in developing the energy everywhere apparent. The events were important ones in the history of the State, and, though they led to the creation of a vast debt, yet, in the end, the canals were a benefit.

The main canal—the Ohio and Erie Canal—was not completed till 1832. The Maumee Canal, from Dayton to Cincinnati, was finished in 1834. They cost the State about $6,000,000. Each of the main canals had branches leading to important towns, where their construction could be made without too much expense. The Miami and Maumee Canal, from Cincinnati northward along the Miami River to Piqua, thence to the Maumee and on to the lake, was the largest canal made, and, for many years, was one of the most important in the State. It joined the Wabash Canal on the eastern boundary of Indiana, and thereby saved the construction of many miles by joining this great canal from Toledo to Evansville.

The largest artificial lake in the world, it is said, was built to supply water to the Miami Canal. It exists yet, though the canal is not much used. It is in the eastern part of Mercer County, and is about nine miles long by from two to four wide. It was formed by raising two walls of earth from ten to thirty feet high, called respectively the east and west embankments; the first of which is about two miles in length; the second, about four. These walls, with the elevation of the ground to the north and south, formed a huge basin, to retain the water. The reservoir was commenced in 1837, and finished in 1845, at an expense of several hundred thousand dollars. When first built, during the accumulation of water, much malarial disease prevailed in the surrounding country, owing to the stagnant condition of the water. The citizens, enraged at what they considered an innovation of their rights, met, and, during a dark night, tore out a portion of the lower wall, letting the water flow out. The damage cost thousands of dollars to repair. All who participated in the proceedings were liable to a severe imprisonment, but the state of feeling was such, in Mercer County, where the offense was committed, that no jury could be found that would try them, and the affair gradually died out.

The canals, so efficacious in their day, were, however, superseded by the railroads rapidly finding their way into the West. From England, where they were early used in the collieries, the transition to America was easy.

The first railroad in the United States was built in the summer of 1826, from the granite quarry belonging to the Bunker Hill Monument Association to the wharf landing, three miles distant. The road was a slight decline from the quarry to the wharf, hence the loaded cars were propelled by their own gravity. On their return, when empty, they were drawn up by a single horse. Other roads, or tramways, quickly followed this. They were built at the Pennsylvania coal mines, in South Carolina, at New Orleans, and at Baltimore. Steam motive power was used in 1831 or 1832, first in America on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and in Charlestown, on a railroad there.

To transfer these highways to the West was the question of but a few years' time. The prairies of Illinois and Indiana offered superior inducements to such enterprises, and, early in 1835, they began to be agitated there. In 1838, the first rail was laid in Illinois, at Meredosia, a little town on the Illinois River, on what is now the Wabash Railway. "The first railroad made in Ohio," writes Caleb Atwater, in his "History of Ohio," in 1838, "was finished in 1836 by the people of Toledo, a town some two years old then, situated near the mouth of Maumee River. The road extends westward into Michigan and is some thirty miles in length. There is a road about to be made from Cincinnati to Springfield. This road follows the Ohio River up to the Little Miami River, and there turns northwardly up its valley to Xenia, and, passing the Yellow Springs, reaches Springfield. Its length must be about ninety miles. The State will own one-half of the road, individuals and the city of Cincinnati the other half. This road will, no doubt, be extended to Lake Erie, at Sandusky City, within a few short years."

"There is a railroad," continues Mr. Atwater, "about to be made from Painesville to the Ohio River. There are many charters for other roads, which will never be made."

Mr. Atwater notes also, the various turnpikes as well as the famous National road from Baltimore westward, then completed only to the mountains. This latter did as much as any enterprise ever enacted in building up and populating the West. It gave a national thoroughfare, which, for many years, was the principal wagon-way from the Atlantic to the Mississippi Valley.

The railroad to which Mr. Atwater refers as about to be built from Cincinnati to Springfield, was what was known as the Mad River Railroad. It is commonly conceded to be the first one built in Ohio.* Its history shows that it was chartered March 11, 1836, that work began in 1837; that it was completed and opened for business from Cincinnati to Milford, in December, 1842; to Xenia, in August, 1845, and to Springfield, in August, 1846. It was laid with strap rails until about 1848, when the present form of rail was adopted.

One of the earliest roads in Ohio was what was known as the Sandusky, Mansfield & Newark Railroad. It was chartered at first as the Monroeville & Sandusky City Railroad, March 9, 1835. March 12, 1836, the Mansfield & New Haven road was chartered; the Columbus & Lake Erie, March 12, 1845, and the Huron & Oxford, February 27, 1846. At first it ran only from Sandusky to Monroeville, then from Mansfield to Huron. These two were connected and consolidated, and then extended to Newark, and finally, by connections, to Columbus.

It is unnecessary to follow closely the history of these improvements through the years succeeding their introduction. At first the State owned a share in nearly all railroads and canals, but finally finding itself in debt about $15,000,000 for such improvements, and learning by its own and neighbors' experiences, that such policy was detrimental to the best interests of the people, abandoned the plan, and allowed private parties entire control of all such works. After the close of the Mexican war, and the return to solid values in 1854 or thereabouts, the increase of railroads in all parts of Ohio, as well as all parts of the West, was simply marvelous. At this date there are more than ten thousand miles of railroads in Ohio, alongside of which stretch innumerable lines of telegraph, a system of swift messages invented by Prof. Morse, and adopted in the United States about 1851.

About the time railroad building began to assume a tangible shape, in 1840, occurred the celebrated political campaign known in history as the "Hard Cider Campaign." The gradual encroachments of the slave power in the West, its arrogant attitude in the Congress of the United States and in several State legislatures: its forcible seizure of slaves in the free States, and the enactment and attempted enforcement of the "fugitive slave" law all tended to awaken in the minds of the Northern people an antagonism, terminating only in the late war and the abolishment of that hideous system in the United States.

The "Whig Party" strenuously urged the abridgment or confinement of slavery in the Southern States, and in the contest the party took a most active part, and elected William Henry Harrison President of the United States. As he had been one of the foremost leaders in the war of 1812, a resident of Ohio, and one of its most popular citizens, a log cabin and a barrel of cider were adopted as his exponents of popular opinion, as expressive of the rule of the common people represented in the cabin and cider, in turn representing their primitive and simple habits of life. He lived but thirty days after his inauguration, dying on the 9th of April, 1841, when John Tyler, the Vice President, succeeded him as Chief Executive of the nation.

The building of railroads; the extension of commerce; the settlement of all parts of the State; its growth in commerce, education, religion and

* Hon. E. D. Mansfield states, in 1873, that the "first actual piece of railroad laid in Ohio, was made on the Cincinnati & Sandusky Railroad; but, about the same time we have the Little Miami Railroad, which was surveyed in 1836 and 1837. If this, the generally accepted opinion, is correct, then Mr. Atwater's statement as given, is wrong. His history is, however, generally conceded to be correct. Written in 1838, he surely ought to know whereof he was writing, as the railroads were then only in construction; but few, if any, in operation.

population, are the chief events from 1841 to the Mexican war. Hard times occurred about as often as they do now, preceded by "flush" times, when speculation ran rife, the people all infatuated with an insane idea that something could be had for nothing. The bubble burst as often as inflated, ruining many people, but seemingly teaching few lessons.

CHAPTER XII.

MEXICAN WAR—CONTINUED GROWTH OF THE STATE—WAR OF THE REBELLION—OHIO'S PART IN THE CONFLICT.

THE Mexican War grew out of the question of the annexation of Texas, then a province of Mexico, whose territory extended to the Indian Territory on the north, and on up to the Oregon Territory on the Pacific Coast. Texas had been settled largely by Americans, who saw the condition of affairs that would inevitably ensue did the country remain under Mexican rule. They first took steps to secede from Mexico, and then asked the aid of America to sustain them, and annex the country to itself.

The Whig party and many others opposed this, chiefly on the grounds of the extension of slave territory. But to no avail. The war came on, Mexico was conquered, the war lasting from April 20, 1846, to May 30, 1848. Fifty thousand volunteers were called for the war by the Congress, and $10,000,000 placed at the disposal of the President, James K. Polk, to sustain the army and prosecute the war.

The part that Ohio took in the war may be briefly summed up as follows: She had five volunteer regiments, five companies in the Fifteenth Infantry, and several independent companies, with her full proportion among the regulars. When war was declared, it was something of a crusade to many; full of romance to others; hence, many more were offered than could be received. It was a campaign of romance to some, yet one of reality, ending in death, to many.

When the first call for troops came, the First, Second and Third Regiments of infantry responded at once. Alexander Mitchell was made Colonel of the First; John B. Weller its Lieutenant Colonel; and Major L. Giddings, of Dayton, its Major, Thos. L. Hamer, one of the ablest lawyers in Ohio, started with the First as its Major, but, before the regiment left the State, he was made a Brigadier General of Volunteers, and, at the battle of Monterey, distinguished himself; and there contracted disease and laid down his life. The regiment's Colonel, who had been wounded at Monterey, came home, removed to Minnesota, and there died. Lieut. Col. Weller went to California after the close of the war. He was United States Senator from that State in the halls of Congress, and, at last, died at New Orleans.

The Second Regiment was commanded by Col. George W. Morgan, now of Mount Vernon; Lieut. Col. William Irwin, of Lancaster, and Maj. William Wall. After the war closed, Irwin settled in Texas, and remained there till he died. Wall lived out his days in Ohio. The regiment was never in active field service, but was a credit to the State.

The officers of the Third Regiment were, Col. Samuel R. Curtis; Lieut. Col. G. W. McCook and Maj. John Love. The first two are now dead; the Major lives in McConnellsville.

At the close of the first year of the war, these regiments (First, Second and Third) were mustered out of service, as their term of enlistment had expired.

When the second year of the war began, the call for more troops on the part of the Government induced the Second Ohio Infantry to re-organize, and again enter the service. William Irwin, of the former organization, was chosen Colonel; William Latham, of Columbus, Lieutenant Colonel, and William H. Link, of Circleville, Major. Nearly all of them are now dead.

The regular army was increased by eight Ohio companies of infantry, the Third Dragoons, and the Voltigeurs—light-armed soldiers. In the Fifteenth Regiment of the United States Army, there were five Ohio companies. The others were three from Michigan, and two from Wisconsin. Col. Morgan, of the old Second, was made Colonel of the Fifteenth, and John Howard, of Detroit, an old artillery officer in the regular army, Lieutenant Colonel. Samuel Wood, a captain in the Sixth

United States Infantry, was made Major; but was afterward succeeded by — Mill, of Vermont. The Fifteenth was in a number of skirmishes at first, and later in the battles of Contreras, Cherubusco and Chapultepec. At the battle of Cherubusco, the Colonel was severely wounded, and Maj. Mill, with several officers, and a large number of men, killed. For gallant service at Contreras, Col. Morgan, though only twenty-seven years old, was made a Brevet Brigadier General in the United States Army. Since the war he has delivered a number of addresses in Ohio, on the campaigns in Mexico.

The survivors of the war are now few. Though seventy-five thousand men from the United States went into that conflict, less than ten thousand now survive. They are now veterans, and as such delight to recount their reminiscences on the fields of Mexico. They are all in the decline of life, and ere a generation passes away, few, if any, will be left.

After the war, the continual growth of Ohio, the change in all its relations, necessitated a new organic law. The Constitution of 1852 was the result. It re-affirmed the political principles of the "ordinance of 1787" and the Constitution of 1802, and made a few changes necessitated by the advance made in the interim. It created the office of Lieutenant Governor, fixing the term of service at two years. This Constitution yet stands notwithstanding the prolonged attempt in 1873-74 to create a new one. It is now the organic law of Ohio.

From this time on to the opening of the late war, the prosperity of the State received no check. Towns and cities grew; railroads multiplied; commerce was extended; the vacant lands were rapidly filled by settlers, and everything tending to the advancement of the people was well prosecuted. Banks, after much tribulation, had become in a measure somewhat secure, their only and serious drawback being their isolation or the confinement of their circulation to their immediate localities. But signs of a mighty contest were apparent. A contest almost without a parallel in the annals of history; a contest between freedom and slavery; between wrong and right; a contest that could only end in defeat to the wrong. The Republican party came into existence at the close of President Pierce's term, in 1855. Its object then was, principally, the restriction of the slave power; ultimately its extinction. One of the chief exponents and supporters of this growing party in Ohio, was Salmon P.

Chase; one who never faltered nor lost faith; and who was at the helm of State; in the halls of Congress; chief of one the most important bureaus of the Government, and, finally, Chief Justice of the United States. When war came, after the election of Abraham Lincoln by the Republican party, Ohio was one of the first to answer to the call for troops. Mr. Chase, while Governor, had re-organized the militia on a sensible basis, and rescued it from the ignominy into which it had fallen. When Mr. Lincoln asked for seventy-five thousand men, Ohio's quota was thirteen regiments. The various chaotic regiments and militia troops in the State did not exceed 1,500 men. The call was issued April 15, 1861; by the 18th, two regiments were organized in Columbus, whither these companies had gathered; before sunrise of the 19th the first and second regiments were on their way to Washington City. The President had only asked for thirteen regiments; thirty were gathering; the Government, not yet fully comprehending the nature of the rebellion, refused the surplus troops, but Gov. Dennison was authorized to put ten additional regiments in the field, as a defensive measure, and was also authorized to act on the defensive as well as on the offensive. The immense extent of southern border made this necessary, as all the loyal people in West Virginia and Kentucky asked for help.

In the limits of this history, it is impossible to trace all the steps Ohio took in the war. One of her most talented sons, now at the head of one of the greatest newspapers of the world, says, regarding the action of the people and their Legislature:

"In one part of the nation there existed a gradual growth of sentiment against the Union, ending in open hostility against its integrity and its Constitutional law; on the other side stood a resolute, and determined people, though divided in minor matters, firmly united on the question of national supremacy. The people of Ohio stood squarely on this side. Before this her people had been divided up to the hour when—

"That fierce and sudden flash across the rugged blackness broke,
And, with a voice that shook the land, the guns of Summer spoke;
* * * * *

And whereso'er the summons came, there rose the angry din, As when, upon a rocky coast, a stormy tide sets in."

"All waverings then ceased among the people and in the Ohio Legislature. The Union must be preserved. The white heat of patriotism and fealty to the flag that had been victorious in three wars, and had never met but temporary defeat then melted all parties, and dissolved all hesitation, and, April 18, 1861, by a unanimous vote of ninety-nine Representatives in its favor, there was passed a bill appropriating $500,000 to carry into effect the requisition of the President, to protect the National Government, of which sum $450,000 were to purchase arms and equipments for the troops required by that requisition as the quota of Ohio, and $50,000 as an extraordinary contingent fund for the Governor. The commissioners of the State Sinking Fund were authorized, by the same bill, to borrow this money, on the 6 per cent bonds of the State, and to issue for the same certificates, freeing such bonds from taxation. Then followed other such legislation that declared the property of volunteers free from execution for debt during their term of service; that declared any resident of the State, who gave aid and comfort to the enemies of the Union, guilty of treason against the State, to be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for life; and, as it had become already evident that thousands of militia, beyond Ohio's quota of the President's call, would volunteer, the Legislature, adopting the sagacious suggestion of Gov. Dennison, resolved that all excess of volunteers should be retained and paid for service, under direction of the Governor. Thereupon a bill was passed, authorizing the acceptance of volunteers to form ten regiments, and providing $500,000 for their arms and equipments, and $1,500,000 more to be disbursed for troops in case of an invasion of the State. Then other legislation was enacted, looking to and providing against the shipment from or through the State of arms or munitions of war, to States either assuming to be neutral or in open rebellion; organizing the whole body of the State militia; providing suitable officers for duty on the staff of the Governor; requiring contracts for subsistence of volunteers to be let to the lowest bidder, and authorizing the appointment of additional general officers.

"Before the adjournment of that Legislature, the Speaker of the House had resigned to take command of one of the regiments then about to start for Washington City; two leading Senators had been appointed Brigadier Generals, and many, in fact nearly all, of the other members of both houses had, in one capacity or another, entered the military service. It was the first war legislature ever elected in Ohio, and, under sudden pressure, nobly met the first shock, and enacted the first measures of law for war. Laboring under difficulties inseparable from a condition so unexpected, and in the performance of duties so novel, it may be historically stated that for patriotism, zeal and ability, the Ohio Legislature of 1861 was the equal of any of its successors; while in that exuberance of patriotism which obliterated party lines and united all in a common effort to meet the threatened integrity of the United States as a nation, it surpassed them both.

"The war was fought, the slave power forever destroyed, and under additional amendments to her organic law, the United States wiped the stain of human slavery from her escutcheon, liberating over four million human beings, nineteen-twentieths of whom were native-born residents.

"When Lee surrendered at Appomattox Court House, Ohio had two hundred regiments of all arms in the National service. In the course of the war, she had furnished two hundred and thirty regiments, besides twenty-six independent batteries of artillery, five independent companies of cavalry, several companies of sharpshooters, large parts of five regiments credited to the West Virginia contingent, two regiments credited to the Kentucky contingent, two transferred to the United States colored troops, and a large proportion of the rank and file of the Fifty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Massachusetts Regiments, also colored men. Of these organizations, twenty-three were infantry regiments furnished on the first call of the President, an excess of nearly one-half over the State's quota; one hundred and ninety-one were infantry regiments, furnished on subsequent calls of the President—one hundred and seventeen for three years, twenty-seven for one year, two for six months, two for three months, and forty-two for one hundred days. Thirteen were cavalry, and three artillery for three years. Of these three-years troops, over twenty thousand re-enlisted, as veterans, at the end of their long term of service, to fight till the war would end."

As original members of these organizations, Ohio furnished to the National service the magnificent army of 310,654 actual soldiers, omitting from the above number all those who paid commutation money, veteran enlistments, and citizens who enlisted as soldiers or sailors in other States. The count is made from the reports of the Provost Marshal General to the War Department. Pennsylvania gave not quite 28,000 more, while Illinois fell 48,000 behind; Indiana, 116,000 less;

Kentucky, 235,000, and Massachusetts, 164,000. Thus Ohio more than maintained, in the National army, the rank among her sisters which her population supported. Ohio furnished more troops than the President ever required of her; and at the end of the war, with more than a thousand men in the camp of the State who were never mustered into the service, she still had a credit on the rolls of the War Department for 4,332 soldiers, beyond the aggregate of all quotas ever assigned to her; and, besides all these, 6,479 citizens had, in lieu of personal service, paid the commutation; while Indiana, Kentucky, Pennsylvania and New York were all from five to one hundred thousand behind their quotas. So ably, through all those years of trial and death, did she keep the promise of the memorable dispatch from her first war Governor: "If Kentucky refuses to fill her quota, Ohio will fill it for her."

"Of these troops 11,237 were killed or mortally wounded in action, and of these 6,563 were left dead on the field of battle. They fought on well-nigh every battle-field of the war. Within forty-eight hours after the first call was made for troops, two regiments were on the way to Washington. An Ohio brigade covered the retreat from the first battle of Bull Run. Ohio troops formed the bulk of army that saved to the Union the territory afterward erected into West Virginia; the bulk of the army that kept Kentucky from seceding; a large part of the army that captured Fort Donelson and Island No. 10; a great part of the army that from Stone River and Chickamauga, and Mission Ridge and Atlanta, swept to the sea and captured Fort McAllister, and north through the Carolinas to Virginia."

When Sherman started on his famous march to the sea, someone said to President Lincoln, "They will never get through; they will all be captured, and the Union will be lost." "It is impossible," replied the President; "it cannot be done. There is a mighty sight of fight in one hundred thousand Western men."

Ohio troops fought at Pea Ridge. They charged at Wagner. They helped redeem North Carolina. They were in the sieges of Vicksburg, Charleston, Mobile and Richmond. At Pittsburg Landing, at Antietam, Gettysburg and Corinth, in the Wilderness, at Five Forks, before Nashville and Appomattox Court House; "their bones, reposing on the fields they won and in the graves they fill, are a perpetual pledge that no flag shall ever wave over their graves but that flag they died to maintain."

Ohio's soil gave birth to, or furnished, a Grant, a Sherman, a Sheridan, a McPherson, a Rosecrans, a McClellan, a McDowell, a Mitchell, a Gilmore, a Hazen, a Sill, a Stanley, a Steadman, and others—all but one, children of the country, reared at West Point for such emergencies. Ohio's war record shows one General, one Lieutenant General, twenty Major Generals, twenty-seven Brevet Major Generals, and thirty Brigadier Generals, and one hundred and fifty Brevet Brigadier Generals. Her three war Governors were William Dennison, David Todd, and John Brough. She furnished, at the same time, one Secretary of War, Edwin M. Stanton, and one Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon P. Chase. Her Senators were Benjamin F. Wade and John Sherman. At least three out of five of Ohio's able-bodied men stood in the line of battle. On the head stone of one of these soldiers, who gave his life for the country, and who now lies in a National Cemetery, is inscribed these words:

"We charge the living to preserve that Constitution we have died to defend."

The close of the war and return of peace brought a period of fictitious values on the country, occasioned by the immense amount of currency afloat. Property rose to unheard-of values, and everything with it. Ere long, however, the decline came, and with it "hard times." The climax broke over the country in 1873, and for awhile it seemed as if the country was on the verge of ruin. People found again, as preceding generations had found, that real value was the only basis of true prosperity, and gradually began to work to the fact. The Government established the specie basis by gradual means, and on the 1st day of January, 1879, began to redeem its outstanding obligations in coin. The effect was felt everywhere. Business of all kinds sprang anew into life. A feeling of confidence grew as the times went on, and now, on the threshold of the year 1880, the State is entering on an era of steadfast prosperity; one which has a sure and certain foundation.

Nearly four years have elapsed since the great Centennial Exhibition was held in Philadelphia; an exhibition that brought from every State in the Union the best products of her soil, factories, and all industries. In that exhibit Ohio made an excellent display. Her stone, iron, coal, cereals, woods and everything pertaining to her welfare were all represented. Ohio, occupying the middle ground of the Union, was expected to show to foreign nations what the valleys of the Mississippi and Ohio could produce. The State nobly stood the test and ranked foremost among all others. Her centennial building was among the first completed and among the neatest and best on the grounds. During the summer, the Centennial Commission extended invitations to the Governors of the several States to appoint an orator and name a day for his delivery of an address on the history, progress and resources of his State. Gov. Hayes named the Hon. Edward D. Mansfield for this purpose, and August 9th, that gentleman delivered an address so valuable for the matter which it contains, that we here give a synopsis of it.

CHAPTER XIII.

OHIO IN THE CENTENNIAL—ADDRESS OF EDWARD D. MANSFIELD, LL. D., PHILADELPHIA, AUGUST 9, 1876.

ONE hundred years ago, the whole territory, from the Alleghany to the Rocky Mountains was a wilderness, inhabited only by wild beasts and Indians. The Jesuit and Moravian missionaries were the only white men who had penetrated the wilderness or beheld its mighty lakes and rivers. While the thirteen old colonies were declaring their independence, the thirteen new States, which now lie in the western interior, had no existence, and gave no sign of the future. The solitude of nature was unbroken by the steps of civilization. The wisest statesman had not contemplated the probability of the coming States, and the boldest patriot did not dream that this interior wilderness should soon contain a greater population than the thirteen old States, with all the added growth of one hundred years.

Ten years after that, the old States had ceded their Western lands to the General Government, and the Congress of the United States had passed the ordinance of 1785, for the survey of the public territory, and, in 1787, the celebrated ordinance which organized the Northwestern Territory, and dedicated it to freedom and intelligence.

Fifteen years after that, and more than a quarter of a century after the Declaration of Independence, the State of Ohio was admitted into the Union, being the seventeenth which accepted the Constitution of the United States. It has since grown up to be great, populous and prosperous under the influence of those ordinances. At her admittance, in 1803, the tide of emigration had begun to flow over the Alleghanies into the Valley of the Mississippi, and, although no steamboat, no railroad then existed, nor even a stage coach helped the immigrant, yet the wooden "ark" on the Ohio, and the heavy wagon, slowly winding over the mountains, bore these tens of thousands to the wilds of Kentucky and the plains of Ohio. In the spring of 1788—the first year of settlement—four thousand five hundred persons passed the mouth of the Muskingum in three months, and the tide continued to pour on for half a century in a widening stream, mingled with all the races of Europe and America, until now, in the hundredth year of America's independence, the five States of the Northwestern Territory, in the wilderness of 1776, contain ten millions of people, enjoying all the blessings which peace and prosperity, freedom and Christianity, can confer upon any people. Of these five States, born under the ordinance of 1787, Ohio is the first, oldest, and, in many things, the greatest. In some things it is the greatest State in the Union. Let us, then, attempt, in the briefest terms, to draw an outline portrait of this great and remarkable commonwealth.

Let us observe its physical aspects. Ohio is just one-sixth part of the Northwestern Territory—40,000 square miles. It lies between Lake Erie and the Ohio River, having 200 miles of navigable waters, on one side flowing into the Atlantic Ocean, and on the other into the Gulf of Mexico. Through the lakes, its vessels touch on 6,000 miles of interior coast, and, through the Mississippi, on 36,000 miles of river coast; so that a citizen of Ohio may pursue his navigation through 42,000 miles, all in his own country, and all within navigable reach of his own State. He who has circumnavigated the globe, has gone but little more than half the distance which the citizen of Ohio finds within his natural reach in this vast interior.

body of arable land, intersected with rivers and streams and running waters, while the beautiful Ohio flows tranquilly by its side. More than three times the surface of Belgium, and one-third of the whole of Italy, it has more natural resources in proportion than either, and is capable of ultimately supporting a larger population than any equal surface in Europe. Looking from this great arable surface, where upon the very hills the grass and the forest trees now grow exuberant and abundant, we find that underneath this surface, and easily accessible, lie 10,000 square miles of coal, and 4,000 square miles of iron—coal and iron enough to supply the basis of manufacture for a world! All this vast deposit of metal and fuel does not interrupt or take from that arable surface at all. There you may find in one place the same machine bringing up coal and salt water from below, while the wheat and the corn grow upon the surface above. The immense masses of coal, iron, salt and freestone deposited below have not in any way diminished the fertility and production of the soil.

It has been said by some writer that the character of a people is shaped or modified by the character of the country in which they live. If the people of Switzerland have acquired a certain air of liberty and independence from the rugged mountains around which they live; if the people of Southern Italy, or beautiful France, have acquired a tone of ease and politeness from their mild and genial clime, so the people of Ohio, placed amidst such a wealth of nature, in the temperate zone, should show the best fruits of peaceful industry and the best culture of Christian civilization. Have they done so? Have their own labor and arts and culture come up to the advantages of their natural situation? Let us examine this growth and their product.

The first settlement of Ohio was made by a colony from New England, at the mouth of the Muskingum. It was literally a remnant of the officers of the Revolution. Of this colony no praise of the historian can be as competent, or as strong, as the language of Washington. He says, in answer to inquiries addressed to him: "No colony in America was ever settled under such favorable auspices as that which has just commenced at the Muskingum. Information, prosperity and strength will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers personally, and there never were men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community;" and he adds that if he were a young man, he knows no country in which he would sooner settle than in this Western region." This colony, left alone for a time, made its own government and nailed its laws to a tree in the village, an early indication of that law-abiding and peaceful spirit which has since made Ohio a just and well-ordered community. The subsequent settlements on the Miami and Scioto were made by citizens of New Jersey and Virginia, and it is certainly remarkable that among all the early immigration, there were no ignorant people. In the language of Washington, they came with "information," qualified to promote the welfare of the community.

Soon after the settlement on the Muskingum and the Miami, the great wave of migration flowed on to the plains and valleys of Ohio and Kentucky. Kentucky had been settled earlier, but the main body of emigrants in subsequent years went into Ohio, influenced partly by the great ordinance of 1787, securing freedom and schools forever, and partly by the greater security of titles under the survey and guarantee of the United States Government. Soon the new State grew up, with a rapidity which, until then, was unknown in the history of civilization. On the Muskingum, where the buffalo had roamed; on the Scioto, where the Shawanees had built their towns; on the Miami, where the great chiefs of the Miamis had reigned; on the plains of Sandusky, yet red with the blood of the white man; on the Maumee, where Wayne, by the victory of the "Fallen Timbers," had broken the power of the Indian confederacy—the emigrants from the old States and from Europe came in to cultivate the fields, to build up towns, and to rear the institutions of Christian civilization, until the single State of Ohio is greater in numbers, wealth, and education, than was the whole American Union when the Declaration of Independence was made.

Let us now look at the statistics of this growth and magnitude, as they are exhibited in the census of the United States. Taking intervals of twenty years, Ohio had: In 1810, 230,760; in 1830, 937,903; in 1850, 1,980,329; in 1870, 2,665,260. Add to this the increase of population in the last six years, and Ohio now has, in round numbers, 3,000,000 of people—half a million more than the thirteen States in 1776; and her cities and towns have to-day six times the population of all the cities of America one hundred years ago. This State is now the third in numbers and wealth, and the first in some of those institutions which mark the progress of mankind. That a small part of the wilderness of 1776 should be more populous than the whole Union was then, and that it should have made a social and moral advance greater than that of any nation in the same time, must be regarded as one of the most startling and instructive facts which attend this year of commemoration. If such has been the social growth of Ohio, let us look at its physical development; this is best expressed by the aggregate productions of the labor and arts of a people applied to the earth. In the census statistics of the United States these are expressed in the aggregate results of agriculture, mining, manufactures, and commerce. Let us simplify these statistics, by comparing the aggregate and ratios as between several States, and between Ohio and some countries of Europe.

The aggregate amount of grain and potatoes—farinaceous food, produced in Ohio in 1870 was 134,938,413 bushels, and in 1874, there were 157,323,597 bushels, being the largest aggregate amount raised in any State but one, Illinois, and larger per square mile than Illinois or any other State in the country. The promises of nature were thus vindicated by the labor of man; and the industry of Ohio has fulfilled its whole duty to the sustenance of the country and the world. She has raised more grain than ten of the old States together, and more than half raised by Great Britain or by France. I have not the recent statistics of Europe, but McGregor, in his statistics of nations for 1832—a period of profound peace—gives the following ratios for the leading countries of Europe: Great Britain, area 120,324 miles; amount of grain, 262,500,000 bushels; rate per square mile, 2,190 to 1; Austria—area 258,603 miles; amount of grain, 366,800,000 bushels; rate per square mile, 1,422 to 1; France—area 215,858 miles; amount of grain, 233,847,300 bushels; rate per square mile, 1,080 to 1. The State of Ohio—area per square miles, 40,000; amount of grain, 150,000,000 bushels; rate per square mile, 3,750. Combining the great countries of Great Britain, Austria, and France, we find that they had 594,785 square miles and produced 863,147,300 bushels of grain, which was, at the time these statistics were taken, 1,450 bushels per square mile, and ten bushels to each one of the population. Ohio, on the other hand, had 3,750 bushels per square mile, and fifty bushels to each one of the population; that is, there was five times as much grain raised in Ohio, in proportion to the people, as in these great countries of Europe.

As letters make words, and words express ideas, so these dry figures of statistics express facts, and these facts make the whole history of civilization.

Let us now look at the statistics of domestic animals. These are always indicative of the state of society in regard to the physical comforts. The horse must furnish domestic conveyances; the cattle must furnish the products of the dairy, as well as meat, and the sheep must furnish wool.

Let us see how Ohio compares with other States and with Europe: In 1870, Ohio had 8,818,000 domestic animals; Illinois, 6,925,000; New York, 5,283,000; Pennsylvania, 4,493,000; and other States less. The proportion to population in these States was, in Ohio, to each person, 3.3; Illinois, 2.7; New York, 1.2; Pennsylvania, 1.2.

Let us now see the proportion of domestic animals in Europe. The results given by McGregor's statistics are: In Great Britain, to each person, 2.44; Russia, 2.00; France, 1.50; Prussia, 1.02; Austria, 1.00. It will be seen that the proportion in Great Britain is only two-thirds that of Ohio; in France, only one-half; and in Austria and Prussia only one-third. It may be said that, in the course of civilization, the number of animals diminishes as the density of population increases; and, therefore, this result might have been expected in the old countries of Europe. But this does not apply to Russia or Germany, still less to other States in this country. Russia in Europe has not more than half the density of population now in Ohio. Austria and Prussia have less than 150 to the square mile. The whole of the north of Europe has not so dense a population as the State of Ohio, still less have the States of Illinois and Missouri, west of Ohio. Then, therefore, Ohio showing a larger proportion of domestic animals than the north of Europe, or States west of her, with a population not so dense, we see at once there must be other causes to produce such a phenomenon.

Looking to some of the incidental results of this vast agricultural production, we see that the United States exports to Europe immense amounts of grain and provisions; and that there is manufactured in this country an immense amount of woollen goods. Then, taking these statistics of the raw material, we find that Ohio produces one-fifth of all the wool; one-seventh of all the cheese; one-eighth of all the corn, and one-tenth of all the wheat; and yet Ohio has but a fourteenth part of the population, and one-eightieth part of the surface of this country.

Let us take another—a commercial view of this matter. We have seen that Ohio raises five times as much grain per square mile as is raised per square mile in the empires of Great Britain, France and Austria, taken together. After making allowance for the differences of living, in the working classes of this country, at least two-thirds of the food and grain of Ohio are a surplus beyond the necessities of life, and, therefore, so much in the commercial balance of exports. This corresponds with the fact, that, in the shape of grain, meat, liquors and dairy products, this vast surplus is constantly moved to the Atlantic States and to Europe. The money value of this exported product is equal to $100,000,000 per annum, and to a solid capital of $1,500,000,000, after all the sustenance of the people has been taken out of the annual crop.

We are speaking of agriculture alone. We are speaking of a State which began its career more than a quarter of a century after the Declaration of Independence was made. And now, it may be asked, what is the real cause of this extraordinary result, which, without saying anything invidious of other States, we may safely say has never been surpassed in any country? We have already stated two of the advantages possessed by Ohio. The first is that it is a compact, unbroken body of arable land, surrounded and intersected by water-courses, equal to all the demands of commerce and navigation. Next, that it was secured forever to freedom and intelligence by the ordinance of 1787. The intelligence of its future people was secured by immense grants of public lands for the purpose of education; but neither the blessings of nature, nor the wisdom of laws, could obtain such results without the continuous labor of an intelligent people. Such it had, and we have only to take the testimony of Washington, already quoted, and the statistical results I have given, to prove that no people has exhibited more steady industry, nor has any people directed their labor with more intelligence.

After the agricultural capacity and production of a country, its most important physical feature is its mineral products; its capacity for coal and iron, the two great elements of material civilization. If we were to take away from Great Britain her capacity to produce coal in such vast quantities, we should reduce her to a third-rate position, no longer numbered among the great nations of the earth. Coal has smelted her iron, run her steam engines, and is the basis of her manufactures. But when we compare the coal fields of Great Britain with those of this country, they are insignificant. The coal fields of all Europe are small compared with those of the central United States. The coal district of Durham and Northumberland, in England, is only 880 square miles. There are other districts of smaller extent, making in the whole probably one-half the extent of that in Ohio. The English coal-beds are represented as more important, in reference to extent, on account of their thickness. There is a small coal district in Lancashire, where the workable coal-beds are in all 150 feet in thickness. But this involves, as is well known, the necessity of going to immense depths and incurring immense expense. On the other hand, the workable coal-beds of Ohio are near the surface, and some of them require no excavating, except that of the horizontal lead from the mine to the river or the railroad. In one county of Ohio there are three beds of twelve, six and four feet each, within fifty feet of the surface. At some of the mines having the best coal, the lead from the mines is nearly horizontal, and just high enough to dump the coal into the railroad cars. These coals are of all qualities, from that adapted to the domestic fire to the very best quality for smelting or manufacturing iron. Recollecting these facts, let us try to get an idea of the coal district of Ohio. The bituminous coal region descending the western slopes of the Alleghanies, occupies large portions of Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee. I suppose that this coal field is not less than fifty thousand square miles, exclusive of Western Maryland and the southern terminations of that field in Georgia and Alabama. Of this vast field of coal, exceeding anything found in Europe, about one-fifth part lies in Ohio. Prof. Mather, in his report on the geology of the State (first Geological Report of the State) says:

"The coal-measures within Ohio occupy a space of about one hundred and eighty miles in length by eighty in breadth at the widest part, with an area of about ten thousand square miles, extending along the Ohio from Trumbull County in the north to near the mouth of the Scioto in the south. The regularity in the dip, and the moderate inclination of the strata, afford facilities to the mines not known to those of most other countries, especially Great Britain, where the strata in which the coal is imbedded have been broken and thrown out of place since its deposit, occasioning many slips and faults, and causing much labor and expense in again recovering the bed. In Ohio there is very little difficulty of this kind, the faults being small and seldom found."

Now, taking into consideration these geological facts, let us look at the extent of the Ohio coal field. It occupies, wholly or in part, thirty-six counties, including, geographically, 14,000 square miles; but leaving out fractions, and reducing the Ohio coal field within its narrowest limits, it is 10,000 square miles in extent, lies near the surface, and has on an average twenty feet thickness of workable coal-beds. Let us compare this with the coal mines of Durham and Northumberland (England), the largest and best coal mines there. That coal district is estimated at 850 square miles, twelve feet thick, and is calculated to contain 9,000,000,000 tons of coal. The coal field of Ohio is twelve times larger and one-third thicker. Estimated by that standard, the coal field of Ohio contains 180,000,000,000 tons of coal. Marketed at only $2 per ton, this coal is worth $360,000,000,000, or, in other words, ten times as much as the whole valuation of the United States at the present time. But we need not undertake to estimate either its quantity or value. It is enough to say that it is a quantity which we can scarcely imagine, which is tenfold that of England, and which is enough to supply the entire continent for ages to come.

After coal, iron is beyond doubt the most valuable mineral product of a State. As the material of manufacture, it is the most important. What are called the "precious metals" are not to be compared with it as an element of industry or profit. But since no manufactures can be successfully carried on without fuel, coal becomes the first material element of the arts. Iron is unquestionably the next. Ohio has an iron district extending from the mouth of the Scioto River to some point north of the Mahoning River, in Trumbull County. The whole length is nearly two hundred miles, and the breadth twenty miles, making, as near as we can ascertain, 4,000 square miles. The iron in this district is of various qualities, and is manufactured largely into bars and castings. In this iron district are one hundred furnaces, forty-four rolling-mills, and fifteen rail-mills, being the largest number of either in any State in the Union, except only Pennsylvania.

Although only the seventeenth State in its admission, I find that, by the census statistics of 1870, it is the third State in the production of iron and iron manufactures. Already, and within the life of one man, this State begins to show what must in future time be the vast results of coal and iron, applied to the arts and manufactures. In the year 1874, there were 420,000 tons of pig iron produced in Ohio, which is larger than the product of any State, except Pennsylvania. The product and the manufacture of iron in Ohio have increased so rapidly, and the basis for increase is so great, that we may not doubt that Ohio will continue to be the greatest producer of iron and iron fabrics, except only Pennsylvania. At Cincinnati, the iron manufacture of the Ohio Valley is concentrating, and at Cleveland the ores of Lake Superior are being smelted.

After coal and iron, we may place salt among the necessities of life. In connection with the coal region west of the Alleghanies, there lies in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio, a large space of country underlaid by the salt rock, which already produces immense amounts of salt. Of this, Ohio has its full proportion. In a large section of the southeastern portion of the State, salt is produced without any known limitation. At Pomeroy and other points, the salt rock lies about one thousand feet below the surface, but salt water is brought easily to the surface by the steam engine. There, the salt rock, the coal seam, and the noble sandstone lie in successive strata, while the green corn and the yellow wheat bloom on the surface above. The State of Ohio produced, in 1874, 3,500,000 bushels of salt, being one-fifth of all produced in the United States. The salt section of Ohio is exceeded only by that of Syracuse, New York, and of Saginaw, Michigan. There is no definite limit to the underlying salt rock of Ohio, and, therefore, the production will be proportioned only to the extent of the demand.

Having now considered the resources and the products of the soil and the mines of Ohio, we may properly ask how far the people have employed their resources in the increase of art and manufacture. We have two modes of comparison, the rate of increase within the State, and the ratio they bear to other States. The aggregate value of the products of manufacture, exclusive of mining, in the last three censuses were: in 1850, $62,692,000; in 1860, $121,691,000; in 1870, $269,713,000.

The ratio of increase was over 100 per cent in each ten years, a rate far beyond that of the increase of population, and much beyond the ratio of increase in the whole country. In 1850, the manufactures of Ohio were one-sixteenth part of the aggregate in the country; in 1860, one-fifteenth part; in 1870, one-twelfth part. In addition to this, we find, from the returns of Cincinnati and Cleveland, that the value of the manufactured products of Ohio in 1875, must have reached $400,000,000, and, by reference to the census tables, it will be seen that the ratio of increase exceeded that of the great manufacturing States of New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut. Of all the States admitted into the Union prior to Ohio, Pennsylvania alone has kept pace in the progress of manufacture. Some little reference to the manufacture of leading articles may throw some light on the cause of this. In the production of agricultural machinery and implements, Ohio is the first State; in animal and vegetable oils and in pig iron, the second; in cast iron and in tobacco, the third; in salt, in machinery and in leather, the fourth. These facts show how largely the resources of coal, iron and agriculture have entered into the manufactures of the State. This great advance in the manufactures of Ohio, when we consider that this State is, relatively to its surface, the first agricultural State in the country, leads to the inevitable inference that its people are remarkably industrious. When, on forty thousand square miles of surface, three millions of people raise one hundred and fifty million bushels of grain, and produce manufactures to the amount of $269,000,000 (which is fifty bushels of breadstuff to each man, woman and child, and $133 of manufacture), it will be difficult to find any community surpassing such results. It is a testimony, not only to the State of Ohio, but to the industry, sagacity and energy of the American people.

Looking now to the commerce of the State, we have said there are six hundred miles of coast line, which embraces some of the principal internal ports of the Ohio and the lakes, such as Cincinnati, Cleveland, Toledo and Portsmouth, but whose commerce is most wholly inland. Of course, no comparison can be made with the foreign commerce of the ocean ports. On the other hand, it is well known that the inland trade of the country far exceeds that of all its foreign commerce, and that the largest part of this interior trade is carried on its rivers and lakes. The materials for the vast consumption of the interior must be conveyed in its vessels, whether of sail or steam, adapted to these waters. Let us take, then, the ship-building, the navigation, and the exchange trades of Ohio, as elements in determining the position of this State in reference to the commerce of the country. At the ports of Cleveland, Toledo, Sandusky and Cincinnati, there have been built one thousand sail and steam vessels in the last twenty years, making an average of fifty each year. The number of sail, steam and all kinds of vessels in Ohio is eleven hundred and ninety, which is equal to the number in all the other States in the Ohio Valley and the Upper Mississippi.

When we look to the navigable points to which these vessels are destined, we find them on all this vast coast line, which extends from the Gulf of Mexico to the Yellowstone, and from Duluth to the St. Lawrence.

Looking again to see the extent of this vast interior trade which is handled by Ohio alone, we find that the imports and exports of the principal articles of Cincinnati, amount in value to $500,000,000; and when we look at the great trade of Cleveland and Toledo, we shall find that the annual trade of Ohio exceeds $700,000,000. The lines of railroad which connect with its ports, are more than four thousand miles in length, or rather more than one mile in length to each ten square miles of surface. This great amount of railroads is engaged not merely in transporting to the Atlantic and thence to Europe, the immense surplus grain and meat in Ohio, but in carrying the largest part of that greater surplus, which exists in the States west of Ohio, the granary of the West. Ohio holds the gateway of every railroad north of the Ohio, from the Mississippi to the Atlantic, and hence it is that the great transit lines of the country pass through Ohio.

Let us now turn from the progress of the arts to the progress of ideas; from material to intellectual development. It is said that a State consists of men, and history shows that no art or science, wealth or power, will compensate for the want of moral or intellectual stability in the minds of a nation. Hence, it is admitted that the strength and perpetuity of our republic must consist in the intelligence and morality of the people. A republic can last only when the people are enlightened. This was an axiom with the early legislators of this country. Hence it was that when Virginia, Connecticut and the original colonies ceded to the General Government that vast and then unknown wilderness which lay west of the Alleghenies, in the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi, they took care that its future inhabitants should be an educated people. The Constitution was not formed when the celebrated ordinance of 1787 was passed.

That ordinance provided that, "Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged;" and by the ordinance of 1785 for the survey of public lands in the Northwestern Territory, Section 16 in each township, that is, one thirty-sixth part, was reserved for the maintenance of public schools in said townships. As the State of Ohio contained a little more than twenty-five millions of acres, this, together with two special grants of three townships to universities, amounted to the dedication of 740,000 acres of land to the maintenance of schools and colleges. It was a splendid endowment, but it was many years before it became available. It was sixteen years after the passage of this ordinance (in 1803), when Ohio entered the Union, and legislation upon this grant became possible. The Constitution of the State pursued the language of the ordinance, and declared that "schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged by legislative provision." The Governors of Ohio, in successive messages, urged attention to this subject upon the people; but the thinness of settlement, making it impossible, except in few districts, to collect youth in sufficient numbers, and impossible to sell or lease lands to advantage, caused the delay of efficient school system for many years. In 1825, however, a general law establishing a school system, and levying a tax for its support, was passed.

This was again enlarged and increased by new legislation in 1836 and 1846. From that time to this, Ohio has had a broad, liberal and efficient system of public instruction. The taxation for schools, and the number enrolled in them at different periods, will best show what has been done. In 1855 the total taxation for school purposes was $2,672,827. The proportion of youth of schoolable age enrolled was 67 per cent. In 1874 the amount raised by taxation was $7,425,135. The number enrolled of schoolable age was 70 per cent, or 707,943.

As the schoolable age extends to twenty-one years, and as there are very few youth in school after fifteen years of age, it follows that the 70 per cent of schoolable youths enrolled in the public schools must comprehend nearly the whole number between four and fifteen years. It is important to observe this fact, because it has been inferred that, as the whole number of youth between five and twenty-one have not been enrolled, therefore they are not educated. This is a mistake; nearly all over fifteen years of age have been in the public schools, and all the native youth of the State, and all foreign born, young enough, have had the benefit of the public schools. But in consequence of the large number who have come from other States and from foreign countries, there are still a few who are classed by the census statistics among the "illiterate;" the proportion of this class, however, is less in proportion than in twenty-eight other States, and less in proportion than in Connecticut and Massachusetts, two of the oldest States most noted for popular education. In fact, every youth in Ohio, under twenty-one years of age, may have the benefit of a public education; and, since the system of graded and high schools has been adopted, may obtain a common knowledge from the alphabet to the classics. The enumerated branches of study in the public schools of Ohio are thirty-four, including mathematics and astronomy, French, German and the classics. Thus the State which was in the heart of the wilderness in 1776, and was not a State until the nineteenth century had begun, now presents to the world, not merely an unrivaled development of material prosperity, but an unsurpassed system of popular education.

In what is called the higher education, in the colleges and universities, embracing the classics and sciences taught in regular classes, it is the popular idea, and one which few dare to question, that we must look to the Eastern States for superiority and excellence; but that also is becoming an assumption without proof; a proposition difficult to sustain. The facts in regard to the education of universities and colleges, their faculties, students and course of instruction, are all set forth in the complete statistics of the Bureau of Education for 1874. They show that the State of Ohio had the largest number of such institutions; the largest number of instructors in their faculties, except one State, New York; and the largest number of students in regular college classes, in proportion to their population, except the two States of Connecticut and Massachusetts. Perhaps, if we look at the statistics of classical students in the colleges, disregarding preparatory and irregular courses, we shall get a more accurate idea of the progress of the higher education in those States which claim the best. In Ohio, 36 colleges, 258 teachers, 2,139 students, proportion, 1 in 124; in Pennsylvania, 27 colleges, 239 teachers, 2,359 students, proportion, 1 in 150; in New York, 26 colleges, 343 teachers, 2,764 students, proportion, 1 in 176; in the six New England States, 17 colleges, 252 teachers, 3,341 students, proportion, 1 in 105; in Illinois, 24 colleges, 219 teachers, 1,701 students, proportion, 1 in 140.

This shows there are more collegiate institutions in Ohio than in all New England; a greater number of college teachers, and only a little smaller ratio of students to the population; a greater number of such students than either in New York or Pennsylvania, and, as a broad, general fact, Ohio has made more progress in education than either of the old States which formed the American Union. Such a fact is a higher testimony to the strength and the beneficent influence of the American Government than any which the statistician or the historian can advance.

Let us now turn to the moral aspects of the people of Ohio. No human society is found without its poor and dependent classes, whether made so by the defects of nature, by acts of Providence, or by the accidents of fortune. Since no society is exempt from these classes, it must be judged not so much by the fact of their existence, as by the manner in which it treats them. In the civilized nations of antiquity, such as Greece and Rome, hospitals, infirmaries, orphan homes, and asylums for the infirm, were unknown. These are the creations of Christianity, and that must be esteemed practically the most Christian State which most practices this Christian beneficence. In Ohio, as in all the States of this country, and of all Christian countries, there is a large number of the infirm and dependent classes; but, although Ohio is the third State in population, she is only the fourteenth in the proportion of dependent classes. The more important point, however, was, how does she treat them? Is there wanting any of all the varied institutions of benevolence? How does she compare with other States and countries in this respect? It is believed that no State or country can present a larger proportion of all these institutions which the benevolence of the wise and good have suggested for the alleviation of suffering and misfortune, than the State of Ohio. With 3,500 of the insane within her borders, she has five great lunatic asylums, capable of accommodating them all. She has asylums for the deaf and dumb, the idiotic, and the blind. She has the best hospitals in the country. She has schools of reform and houses of refuge. She has "homes" for the boys and girls, to the number of 800, who are children of soldiers. She has penitentiaries and jails, orphan asylums and infirmaries. In every county there is an infirmary, and in every public institution, except the penitentiary, there is a school. So that the State has used every human means to relieve the suffering, to instruct the ignorant, and to reform the criminal. There are in the State 80,000 who come under all the various forms of the infirm, the poor, the sick and the criminal, who, in a greater or less degree, make the dependent class. For these the State has made every provision which humanity or justice or intelligence can require. A young State, developed in the wilderness, she challenges, without any invidious comparison, both Europe and America, to show her superior in the development of humanity manifested in the benefaction of public institutions.

Intimately connected with public morals and with charitable institutions, is the religion of a people. The people of the United States are a Christian people. The people of Ohio have manifested their zeal by the erection of churches, of Sunday schools, and of religious institutions. So far as these are outwardly manifested, they are made known by the social statistics of the census. The number of church organizations in the leading States were: In the State of Ohio, 6,488; in the State of New York, 5,627; in the State of Pennsylvania, 5,984; in the State of Illinois, 4,298. It thus appears that Ohio had a larger number of churches than any State of the Union. The number of sittings, however, was not quite as large as those in New York and Pennsylvania. The denominations are of all the sects known in this country, about thirty in number, the majority of the whole being Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists. Long before the American Independence, the Moravians had settled on the Mahoning and Tuscarawas Rivers, but only to be destroyed; and when the peace with Great Britain was made, not a vestige of Christianity remained on the soil of Ohio; yet we see that within ninety years from that time the State of Ohio was, in the number of its churches, the first of this great Union.

In the beginning of this address, I said that Ohio was the oldest and first of these great States, carved out of the Northwestern Territory, and that it was in some things the greatest State of the American Union. I have now traced the physical, commercial, intellectual and moral features of the State during the seventy-five years of its constitutional history. The result is to establish fully the propositions with which I began. These facts have brought out:

1. That Ohio is, in reference to the square miles of its surface, the first State in agriculture of the American Union; this, too, notwithstanding it has 800,000 in cities and towns, and a large development of capital and products in manufactures.

2. That Ohio has raised more grain per square mile than either France, Austria, or Great Britain. They raised 1,450 bushels per square mile, and 10 bushels to each person. Ohio raised 3,750 bushels per square mile, and 50 bushels to each one of the population; or, in other words, five times the proportion of grain raised in Europe.

3. Ohio was the first State of the Union in the production of domestic animals, being far in advance of either New York, Pennsylvania or Illinois. The proportion of domestic animals to each person in Ohio was three and one-third, and in New York and Pennsylvania less than half that. The largest proportion of domestic animals produced in Europe was in Great Britain and Russia, neither of which come near that of Ohio.

4. The coal-field of Ohio is vastly greater than that of Great Britain, and we need make no comparison with other States in regard to coal or iron; for the 10,000 square miles of coal, and 4,000 square miles of iron in Ohio, are enough to supply the whole American continent for ages to come.

5. Neither need we compare the results of commerce and navigation, since, from the ports of Cleveland and Cincinnati, the vessels of Ohio touch on 42,000 miles of coast, and her 5,000 miles of railroad carry her products to every part of the American continent.

6. Notwithstanding the immense proportion and products of agriculture in Ohio, yet she has more than kept pace with New York and New England in the progress of manufactures during the last twenty years. Her coal and iron are producing their legitimate results in making her a great manufacturing State.

7. Ohio is the first State in the Union as to the proportion of youth attending school; and the States west of the Alleghanies and north of the Ohio have more youth in school, proportionably, than New England and New York. The facts on this subject are so extraordinary that I may be excused for giving them a little in detail.

The proportion of youth in Ohio attending school to the population, is 1 in 4.2; in Illinois, 1 in 4.3; in Pennsylvania, 1 in 4.8; in New York, 1 in 5.2; in Connecticut and Massachusetts, 1 in 8.7.

These proportions show that it is in the West, and not in the East, that education is now advancing; and it is here that we see the stimulus given by the ordinance of 1787, is working out its great and beneficent results. The land grant for education was a great one, but, at last, its chief effort was in stimulating popular education; for the State of Ohio has taxed itself tens of millions of dollars beyond the utmost value of the land grant, to found and maintain a system of public education which the world has not surpassed.

We have seen that above and beyond all this material and intellectual development, Ohio has provided a vast benefaction of asylums, hospitals, and infirmaries, and special schools for the support and instruction of the dependent classes. There is not within all her borders a single one of the deaf, dumb, and blind, of the poor, sick, and insane, not an orphan or a vagrant, who is not provided for by the broad and generous liberality of the State and her people. A charity which the classic ages knew nothing of, a beneficence which the splendid hierarchies and aristocracies of Europe cannot equal, has been exhibited in this young State, whose name was unknown one hundred years ago, whose people, from Europe to the Atlantic, and from the Atlantic to the Ohio, were, like Adam and Eve, cast out—"the world before them where to choose."

Lastly, we see that, although the third in population, and the seventeenth in admission to the Union, Ohio had, in 1870, 6,400 churches, the largest number in any one State, and numbering among them every form of Christian worship. The people, whose fields were rich with grain, whose mines were boundless in wealth, and whose commerce extended through thousands of miles of lakes and rivers, came here, as they came to New England's rock-bound coast—

"With freedom to worship God."

The church and the schoolhouse rose beside the green fields, and the morning bells rang forth to cheerful children going to school, and to a Christian people going to the church of God.

Let us now look at the possibilities of Ohio in the future development of the American Republican Republic. The two most populous parts of Europe, because the most food-producing, are the Netherlands and Italy, or, more precisely, Belgium and ancient Lombardy; to the present time, their population is, in round numbers, three hundred to the square mile. The density of population in England proper is about the same. We may assume, therefore, that three hundred to the square mile is, in round numbers, the limit of comfortable subsistence under modern civilization. It is true that modern improvements in agricultural machinery and fertilization have greatly increased the capacity of production, on a given amount of land, with a given amount of labor. It is true, also, that the old countries of Europe do not possess an equal amount of arable land with Ohio in proportion to the same surface. It would seem, therefore, that the density of population in Ohio might exceed that of any part of Europe. On the other hand, it may be said with truth that the American people will not become so dense as in Europe while they have new lands in the West to occupy. This is true; but lands such as those in the valley of the Ohio are now becoming scarce in the West, and we think that, with her great capacity for the production of grain on one hand, and of illimitable quantities of coal and iron to manufacture with on the other, that Ohio will, at no remote period, reach nearly the density of Belgium, which will give her 10,000,000 of people. This seems extravagant, but the tide of migration, which flowed so fast to the West, is beginning to ebb, while the manufactures of the interior offer greater inducements.

With population comes wealth, the material for education, the development of the arts, advance in all the material elements of civilization, and the still grander advancements in the strength and elevation of the human mind, conquering to itself new realms of material and intellectual power, acquiring in the future what we have seen in the past, a wealth of resources unknown and undreamed of when, a hundred years ago, the fathers of the republic declared their independence. I know how easy it is to treat this statement with easy incredulity, but statistics is a certain science; the elements of civilization are now measured, and we know the progress of the human race as we know that of a cultivated plant. We know the resources of the country, its food-producing capacity, its art processes, its power of education, and the undefined and illimitable power of the human mind for new inventions and unimagined progress. With this knowledge, it is not difficult nor unsafe to say that the future will produce more, and in a far greater ratio, than the past. The pictured scenes of the prophets have already been more than fulfilled, and the visions of beauty and glory, which their imagination failed fully to describe, will be more than realized in the bloom of that garden which republican America will present to the eyes of astonished mankind. Long before another century shall have passed by, the single State of Ohio will present fourfold the population with which the thirteen States began their independence, more wealth than the entire Union now has; greater universities than any now in the country, and a development of arts and manufacture which the world now knows nothing of. You have seen more than that since the Constitution was adopted, and what right have you to say the future shall not equal the past?

I have aimed, in this address, to give an exact picture of what Ohio is, not more for the sake of Ohio than as a representation of the products which the American Republic has given to the world. A State which began long after the Declaration of Independence, in the then unknown wilderness of North America, presents to-day the fairest example of what a republican government with Christian civilization can do. Look upon this picture and upon those of Assyria, of Greece or Rome, or of Europe in her best estate, and say where is the civilization of the earth which can equal this. If a Roman citizen could say with pride, "Civis Romanus sum," with far greater pride can you say this day, "I am an American citizen."

CHAPTER XIV.

EDUCATION*—EARLY SCHOOL LAWS—NOTES—INSTITUTES AND EDUCATIONAL JOURNALS—SCHOOL SYSTEM—SCHOOL FUNDS—COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES.

WHEN the survey of the Northwest Territory was ordered by Congress, March 20, 1785, it was decreed that every sixteenth section of land should be reserved for the "maintenance of public schools within each township." The ordinance of 1787—thanks to the New England Associates—proclaimed that, "religion, morality and knowledge being essential to good government, schools and the means of education should forever be encouraged." The State Constitution of 1802 declared that "schools and the means of instruction should be encouraged by legislative provision, not inconsistent with the rights of conscience." In 1825, through the persevering efforts of Nathan Guilford, Senator from Hamilton County, Ephraim Cutler, Representative from Washington County, and other friends of education, a bill was passed, "laying the foundation for a general system of common schools." This bill provided a tax of one-half mill, to be levied by the County Commissioners for school purposes; provided for school examiners, and made Township Clerks and County Auditors school officers. In 1829, this county tax was raised to three-fourths of a mill; in 1834 to one mill, and, in 1836, to one and a half mills.

In March, 1837, Samuel Lewis, of Hamilton County, was appointed State Superintendent of Common Schools. He was a very energetic worker, traveling on horseback all over the State, delivering addresses and encouraging school officers and teachers. Through his efforts much good was done, and many important features engrafted on the school system. He resigned in 1839, when the office was abolished, and its duties imposed on the Secretary of State.

The most important adjunct in early education in the State was the college of teachers organized in Cincinnati in 1831. Albert Pickett, Dr. Joseph Ray, William H. McGuffey—so largely known by his Readers—and Milo G. Williams, were at its head. Leading men in all parts of the West attended its meetings. Their published deliberations did much for the advancement of education among the people. Through the efforts of the college, the first convention held in Ohio for educational purposes was called at Columbus, January 13, 1836. Two years after, in December, the first convention in which the different sections of the State were represented, was held. At both these conventions, all the needs of the schools, both common and higher, were ably and fully discussed, and appeals made to the people for a more cordial support of the law. No successful attempts were made to organize a permanent educational society until December, 1847, when the Ohio State Teachers' Association was formed at Akron, Summit County, with Samuel Galloway as President; T. W. Harvey, Recording Secretary; M. D. Leggett, Corresponding Secretary; William Bowen, Treasurer, and M. F. Cowdrey, Chairman of the Executive Committee. This Association entered upon its work with commendable earnestness, and has since

* From the School Commissioners' Reports, principally those of Thomas W. Harvey, A. M.

NOTE 1.—The first school taught in Ohio, or in the Northwestern Territory, was in 1791. The first teacher was Maj. Austin Tupper, eldest son of Gen. Benjamin Tupper, both Revolutionary officers. The room occupied was the same as that in which the first Court was held, and was situated in the northwest block-house of the garrison, called the stockade, at Marietta. During the Indian war school was also taught at Fort Harmar, Point Marietta, and at other settlements. A meeting was held in Marietta, April 29, 1797, to consider the erection of a school building suitable for the instruction of the youth, and for conducting religious services. Resolutions were adopted which led to the erection of a building called the Muskingum Academy. The building was of frame, forty feet long and twenty-four feet wide, and is yet (1878) standing. The building was twelve feet high, with an arched ceiling. It stood upon a stone foundation, three steps from the ground. There were two chimneys and a lobby projection. There was a cellar under the whole building. It stood upon a beautiful lot, fronting the Muskingum River, and about sixty feet back from the street. Some large trees were upon the lot and on the street in front. Across the street was an open common, and beyond that the river. Immediately opposite the door, on entering, was a broad aisle, and, at the end of the aisle, against the wall, was a desk or pulpit. On the right and left of the pulpit, against the wall, and fronting the pulpit, was a row of slips. On each side of the door, facing the pulpit, were two slips, and, at each end of the room, one slip. These slips were stationary, and were fitted with desks that could be let down, and there were boxes in the desks for holding books and papers. In the center of the room was an open space, which could be filled with movable seats. The first school was opened here in 1800.—Letter of A. T. Nye.

NOTE 2.—Another evidence of the character of the New England Associates is the founding of a public library as early as 1796, or before. Another was also established at Belpre about the same time. Abundant evidence proves the existence of these libraries, all tending to the fact that the early settlers, though conquering a wilderness and a savage foe, would not allow their mental faculties to lack for food. The character of the books shows that "solid" reading predominated.

never abated its zeal. Semi-annual meetings were at first held, but, since 1858, only annual meetings occur. They are always largely attended, and always by the best and most energetic teachers. The Association has given tone to the educational interests of the State, and has done a vast amount of good in popularizing education. In the spring of 1851, Lorin Andrews, then Superintendent of the Massillon school, resigned his place, and became a common-school missionary. In July, the Association, at Cleveland, made him its agent, and instituted measures to sustain him. He remained zealously at work in this relation until 1853, when he resigned to accept the presidency of Kenyon College, at Gambier. Dr. A. Lord was then chosen general agent and resident editor of the Journal of Education, which positions he filled two years, with eminent ability.

The year that Dr. Lord resigned, the ex officio relation of the Secretary of State to the common schools was abolished, and the office of school commissioner again created. H. H. Barney was elected to the place in October, 1853. The office has since been held by Rev. Anson Smyth, elected in 1856, and re-elected in 1859; E. E. White, appointed by the Governor, November 11, 1863, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of C. W. H. Cathcart, who was elected in 1862; John A. Norris, in 1865; W. D. Henkle, in 1868; Thomas W. Harvey, in 1871; C. S. Smart, in 1875, and the present incumbent, J. J. Burns, elected in 1878, his term expiring in 1881.

The first teachers' institute in Northern Ohio was held at Sandusky, in September, 1845, conducted by Salem Town, of New York, A. D. Lord and M. F. Cowdrey. The second was held at Chardon, Geauga Co., in November of the same year. The first institute in the southern part of the State was held at Cincinnati, in February, 1837; the first in the central part at Newark, in March, 1848. Since then these meetings of teachers have occurred annually, and have been the means of great good in elevating the teacher and the public in educational interests. In 1848, on petition of forty teachers, county commissioners were authorized to pay lecturers from surplus revenue, and the next year, to appropriate $100 for institute purposes, upon pledge of teachers to raise half that amount. By the statutes of 1864, applicants for teachers were required to pay 50 cents each as an examination fee. One-third of the amount thus raised was allowed the use of examiners as traveling expenses, the remainder to be applied to institute instruction. For the year 1871, sixty-eight teachers' institutes were held in the State, at which 308 instructors and lecturers were employed, and 7,158 teachers in attendance. The expense incurred was $16,361.99, of which $10,127.13 was taken from the institute fund; $2,730.34, was contributed by members; $680, by county commissioners, and the balance, $1,371.50, was obtained from other sources. The last report of the State Commissioners—1878—shows that eighty-five county institutes were held in the State, continuing in session 748 days; 416 instructors were employed; 11,466 teachers attended; $22,531.47 were received from all sources, and that the expenses were $19,587.51, or $1.71 per member. There was a balance on hand of $9,460.74 to commence the next year, just now closed, whose work has been as progressive and thorough as any former year. The State Association now comprises three sections; the general association, the superintendents' section and the ungraded school section. All have done a good work, and all report progress.

The old State Constitution, adopted by a convention in 1802, was supplemented in 1851 by the present one, under which the General Assembly, elected under it, met in 1852. Harvey Rice, a Senator from Cuyahoga County, Chairman of Senate Committee on "Common Schools and School Lands," reported a bill the 29th of March, to provide "for the re-organization, supervision and maintenance of common schools." This bill, amended in a few particulars, became a law March 14, 1853. The prominent features of the new law were: The substitution of a State school tax for the county tax; creation of the office of the State School Commissioner; the creation of a Township Board of Education, consisting of representatives from the subdistricts; the abolition of rate-bills, making education free to all the youth of the State; the raising of a fund, by a tax of one-tenth of a mill yearly, "for the purpose of furnishing school libraries and apparatus to all the common schools." This "library tax" was abolished in 1860, otherwise the law has remained practically unchanged.

School journals, like the popular press, have been a potent agency in the educational history of the State. As early as 1838, the Ohio School Director was issued by Samuel Lewis, by legislative authority, though after six months' continuance, it ceased for want of support. The same year the Pestalozzian, by E. L. Sawtell and H. K. Smith, of Akron, and the Common School

Advocate, of Cincinnati, were issued. In 1846, the School Journal began to be published by A. D. Lord, of Kirtland. The same year saw the Free School Clarion, by W. Bowen, of Massillon, and the School Friend, by W. B. Smith & Co., of Cincinnati. The next year, W. H. Moore & Co., of Cincinnati, started the Western School Journal. In 1851, the Ohio Teacher, by Thomas Rainey, appeared; the News and Educator, in 1863, and the Educational Times, in 1866. In 1850, Dr. Lord's Journal of Education was united with the School Friend, and became the recognized organ of the teachers in Ohio. The Doctor remained its principal editor until 1856, when he was succeeded by Anson Smyth, who edited the journal one year. In 1857, it was edited by John D. Caldwell; in 1858 and 1859, by W. T. Coggeshall; in 1860, by Anson Smyth again, when it passed into the hands of E. E. White, who yet controls it. It has an immense circulation among Ohio teachers, and, though competed by other journals, since started, it maintains its place.

The school system of the State may be briefly explained as follows: Cities and incorporated villages are independent of township and county control, in the management of schools, having boards of education and examiners of their own. Some of them are organized for school purposes, under special acts. Each township has a board of education, composed of one member from each sub-district. The township clerk is clerk of this board, but has no vote. Each subdistrict has a local board of trustees, which manages its school affairs, subject to the advice and control of the township board. These officers are elected on the first Monday in April, and hold their offices three years. An enumeration of all the youth between the ages of five and twenty-one is made yearly. All public schools are required to be in session at least twenty-four weeks each year. The township clerk reports annually such facts concerning school affairs as the law requires, to the county auditor, who in turn reports to the State Commissioner, who collects these reports in a general report to the Legislature each year.

A board of examiners is appointed in each county by the Probate Judge. This board has power to grant certificates for a term not exceeding two years, and good only in the county in which they are executed; they may be revoked on sufficient cause. In 1864, a State Board of Examiners was created, with power to issue life certificates, valid in all parts of the State. Since then, up to January 1, 1879, there have been 188 of these issued. They are considered an excellent test of scholarship and ability, and are very creditable to the holder.

The school funds, in 1865, amounted to $3,271,275.66. They were the proceeds of appropriations of land by Congress for school purposes, upon which the State pays an annual interest of 6 per cent. The funds are known as the Virginia Military School Fund, the proceeds of eighteen quarter-townships and three sections of land, selected by lot from lands lying in the United States Military Reserve, appropriated for the use of schools in the Virginia Military Reservation; the United States Military School Fund, the proceeds of one thirty-sixth part of the land in the United States Military District, appropriated "for the use of schools within the same;" the Western Reserve School Fund, the proceeds from fourteen quarter-townships, situated in the United States Military District, and 37,758 acres, most of which was located in Defiance, Williams, Paulding, Van Wert and Putnam Counties, appropriated for the use of the schools in the Western Reserve; Section 16, the proceeds from the sixteenth section of each township in that part of the State in which the Indian title was not extinguished in 1803; the Moravian School Fund, the proceeds from one thirty-sixth part of each of three tracts of 4,000 acres situated in Tuscarawas County, originally granted by Congress to the Society of United Brethren, and reconveyed by this Society to the United States in 1824. The income of these funds is not distributed by any uniform rule, owing to defects in the granting of the funds. The territorial divisions designated receive the income in proportion to the whole number of youth therein, while in the remainder of the State, the rent of Section 16, or the interest on the proceeds arising from its sale, is paid to the inhabitants of the originally surveyed townships. In these territorial divisions, an increase or decrease of population must necessarily increase or diminish the amount each youth is entitled to receive; and the fortunate location or judicious sale of the sixteenth section may entitle one township to receive a large sum, while an adjacent township receives a mere pittance. This inequality of benefit may be good for localities, but it is certainly a detriment to the State at large. There seems to be no legal remedy for it. In addition to the income from the before-mentioned funds, a variable revenue is received from certain fines and licenses paid to either county or township treasurers for the use of schools; from the sale of swamp lands ($25,720.07 allotted to the State in 1850), and from personal property escheated to the State.

Aside from the funds, a State school tax is fixed by statute. Local taxes vary with the needs of localities, are limited by law, and are contingent on the liberality and public spirit of different communities.

The State contains more than twenty colleges and universities, more than the same number of female seminaries, and about thirty normal schools and academies. The amount of property invested in these is more than $6,000,000. The Ohio University is the oldest college in the State.

In addition to the regular colleges, the State controls the Ohio State University, formerly the Agricultural and Mechanical College, established from the proceeds of the land scrip voted by Congress to Ohio for such purposes. The amount realized from the sale was nearly $500,000. This is to constitute a permanent fund, the interest only to be used. In addition, the sum of $300,000 was voted by the citizens of Franklin County, in consideration of the location of the college in that county. Of this sum $111,000 was paid for three hundred and fifteen acres of land near the city of Columbus, and $112,000 for a college building, the balance being expended as circumstances required, for additional buildings, laboratory, apparatus, etc. Thorough instruction is given in all branches relating to agriculture and the mechanical arts. Already excellent results are attained.

By the provisions of the act of March 14, 1853, township boards are made bodies politic and corporate in law, and are invested with the title, care and custody of all school property belonging to the school district or township. They have control of the central or high schools of their townships; prescribe rules for the district schools; may appoint one of their number manager of the schools of the township, and allow him reasonable pay for his services; determine the text-books to be used; fix the boundaries of districts and locate schoolhouse sites; make estimates of the amount of money required; apportion the money among the districts, and are required to make an annual report to the County Auditor, who incorporates the same in his report to the State Commissioner, by whom it reaches the Legislature.

Local directors control the subdistricts. They enumerate the children of school age, employ and dismiss teachers, make contracts for building and furnishing schoolhouses, and make all necessary provision for the convenience of the district schools. Practically, the entire management rests with them.

AGRICULTURE—AREA OF THE STATE—EARLY AGRICULTURE IN THE WEST—MARKETS—LIVE STOCK—NURSERIES, FRUITS, ETC.—CEREALS—ROOT AND CUCURBITACEOUS CROPS—AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS—AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES—POMOLOGICAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETIES.

"Oft did the harvest to their sickles yield,
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has broke;
How jocund did they drive their teams afield!
How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke."

THE majority of the readers of these pages are farmers, hence a resume of agriculture in the State, would not only be appropriate, but valuable as a matter of history. It is the true basis of national prosperity, and, therefore, justly occupies a foremost place.

In the year 1800, the Territory of Ohio contained a population of 45,365 inhabitants, or a little more than one person to the square mile. At this date, the admission of the Territory into the Union as a State began to be agitated. When the census was made to ascertain the legality of the act, in conformity to the "Compact of 1787," no endeavor was made to ascertain additional statistics, as now; hence, the cultivated land was not returned, and no account remains to tell how much existed. In 1805, three years after the admission of the State into the Union, 7,252,856 acres had been purchased from the General Government. Still no returns of the cultivated lands were made. In 1810, the population of Ohio was 230,760, and the land purchased from the Government amounted to 9,933,150 acres, of which amount, however, 3,569,314 acres, or more than one-third, was held by non-residents. Of the lands occupied by resident land-owners, there appear to have been 100,968 acres of first-rate, 1,929,600 of second, and 1,538,745 acres of third rate lands. At this period there were very few exports from the farm, loom or shop. The people still needed all they produced to sustain themselves, and were yet in that pioneer period where they were obliged to produce all they wanted, and yet were opening new farms, and bringing the old ones to a productive state.

Kentucky, and the country on the Monongahela, lying along the western slopes of the Alleghany Mountains, having been much longer settled, had begun, as early as 1795, to send considerable quantities of flour, whisky, bacon and tobacco to the lower towns on the Mississippi, at that time in the possession of the Spaniards. At the French settlements on the Illinois, and at Detroit, were being raised much more than could be used, and these were exporting also large quantities of these materials, as well as peltries and such commodities as their nomadic lives furnished. As the Mississippi was the natural outlet of the West, any attempt to impede its free navigation by the various powers at times controlling its outlet, would lead at once to violent outbreaks among the Western settlers, some of whom were aided by unscrupulous persons, who thought to form an independent Western country. Providence seems to have had a watchful eye over all these events, and to have so guided them that the attempts with such objects in view, invariably ended in disgrace to their perpetrators. This outlet to the West was thought to be the only one that could carry their produce to market, for none of the Westerners then dreamed of the immense system of railways now covering that part of the Union. As soon as ship-building commenced at Marietta, in the year 1800, the farmers along the borders of the Ohio and Muskingum Rivers turned their attention to the cultivation of hemp, in addition to their other crops. In a few years sufficient was raised, not only to furnish cordage to the ships in the West, but large quantities were worked up in the various rope-walks and sent to the Atlantic cities. Iron had been discovered, and forges on the Juniata were busy converting that necessary and valued material into implements of industry.

By the year 1805, two ships, seven brigs and three schooners had been built and rigged by the citizens of Marietta. Their construction gave a fresh impetus to agriculture, as by means of them the surplus products could be carried away to a foreign market, where, if it did not bring money, it could be exchanged for merchandise equally valuable. Captain David Devoll was one of the earliest of Ohio's shipwrights. He settled on the fertile Muskingum bottom, about five miles above Marietta, soon after the Indian war. Here he built a "floating mill," for making flour, and, in 1801, a ship of two hundred and fifty tons, called the Muskingum, and the brig Eliza Greene, of one hundred and fifty tons. In 1804, he built a schooner on his own account, and in the spring of the next year, it was finished and loaded for a voyage down the Mississippi. It was small, only of seventy tons burden, of a light draft, and intended to run on the lakes east of New Orleans. In shape and model, it fully sustained its name, Nonpareil. Its complement of sails, small at first, was completed when it arrived in New Orleans. It had a large cabin to accommodate passengers, was well and finely painted, and sat gracefully on the water. Its load was of assorted articles, and shows very well the nature of exports of the day. It consisted of two hundred barrels of flour, fifty barrels of kiln-dried corn meal, four thousand pounds of cheese, six thousand of bacon, one hundred sets of rum puncheon shooks, and a few grindstones. The flour and meal were made at Captain Devoll's floating mill, and the cheese made in Belpre, at that date one of Ohio's most flourishing agricultural districts. The Captain and others carried on boating as well as the circumstances of the days permitted, fearing only the hostility of the Indians, and the duty the Spaniards were liable to levy on boats going down to New Orleans, even if they did not take it into their erratic heads to stop the entire navigation of the great river by vessels other than their own. By such means, merchandise was carried on almost entirely until the construction of canals, and even then, until modern times, the flat-boat was the main-stay of the shipper inhabiting the country adjoining the upper Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

Commonly, very little stock was kept beyond what was necessary for the use of the family and to perform the labor on the farm. The Scioto Valley was perhaps the only exception in Ohio to this general condition. Horses were brought by the emigrants from the East and were characteristic of that region. In the French settlements in Illinois and about Detroit, French ponies, marvels of endurance, were chiefly used. They were impracticable in hauling the immense emigrant wagons over the mountains, and hence were comparatively unknown in Ohio. Until 1828, draft horses were chiefly used here, the best strains being brought by the "Tunkers," "Mennonites," and "Ormish,"—three religious sects, whose members were invariably agriculturists. In Stark, Wayne, Holmes, and Richland Counties, as a general thing, they congregated in communities, where the neatness of their farms, the excellent condition of their stock, and the primitive simplicity of their manners, made them conspicuous.

In 1828, the French began to settle in Stark County, where they introduced the stock of horses known as "Selim," "Florizel," "Post Boy" and "Timolen." These, crossed upon the descents of the Norman and Conestoga, produced an excellent stock of farm horses, now largely used.

In the Western Reserve, blooded horses were introduced as early as 1825. John I. Van Meter brought fine horses into the Scioto Valley in 1815, or thereabouts. Soon after, fine horses were brought to Steubenville from Virginia and Pennsylvania. In Northern Ohio the stock was more miscellaneous, until the introduction of improved breeds from 1815 to 1835. By the latter date the strains of horses had greatly improved. The same could be said of other parts of the State. Until after 1825, only farm and road horses were required. That year a race-course—the first in the State—was established in Cincinnati, shortly followed by others at Chillicothe, Dayton and Hamilton. From that date the race-horse steadily improved. Until 1838, however, all race-courses were rather irregular, and, of those named, it is difficult to determine which one has priority of date over the others. To Cincinnati, the precedence is, however, generally given. In 1838, the Buckeye Course was established in Cincinnati, and before a year had elapsed, it is stated, there were fifteen regular race-courses in Ohio. The effect of these courses was to greatly stimulate the stock of racers, and rather detract from draft and road horses. The organization of companies to import blooded horses has again revived the interest in this class, and now, at annual stock sales, these strains of horses are eagerly sought after by those having occasion to use them.

Cattle were brought over the mountains, and, for several years, were kept entirely for domestic uses. By 1805, the country had so far settled that the surplus stock was fattened on corn and fodder, and a drove was driven to Baltimore. The drove was owned by George Renick, of Chillicothe, and the feat was looked upon as one of great importance. The drove arrived in Baltimore in excellent condition. The impetus given by this movement of Mr. Renick stimulated greatly the feeding of cattle, and led to the improvement of the breed, heretofore only of an ordinary kind.

Until the advent of railroads and the shipment of cattle thereon, the number of cattle driven to eastern markets from Ohio alone, was estimated at over fifteen thousand annually, whose value was placed at $600,000. Besides this, large numbers were driven from Indiana and Illinois, whose boundless prairies gave free scope to the herding of cattle. Improved breeds, "Short Horns," "Long Horns" and others, were introduced into Ohio as early as 1810 and 1815. Since then the stock has been gradually improved and acclimated, until now Ohio produces as fine cattle as any State in the Union. In some localities, especially in the Western Reserve, cheesemaking and dairy interests are the chief occupations of whole neighborhoods, where may be found men who have grown wealthy in this business.

Sheep were kept by almost every family, in pioneer times, in order to be supplied with wool for clothing. The wool was carded by hand, spun in the cabin, and frequently dyed and woven as well as shaped into garments there, too. All emigrants brought the best household and farming implements their limited means would allow, so also did they bring the best strains of horses, cattle and sheep they could obtain. About the year 1809, Mr. Thomas Rotch, a Quaker, emigrated to Stark County, and brought with him a small flock of Merino sheep. They were good, and a part of them were from the original flock brought over from Spain, in 1801, by Col. Humphrey, United States Minister to that country. He had brought 200 of these sheep, and hoped, in time, to see every part of the United States stocked with Merinos. In this he partially succeeded only, owing to the prejudice against them. In 1816, Messrs. Wells & Dickenson, who were, for the day, extensive woolen manufacturers in Steubenville, drove their fine flocks out on the Stark County Plains for the summer, and brought them back for the winter. This course was pursued for several years, until farms were prepared, when they were permanently kept in Stark County. This flock was originally derived from the Humphrey importation. The failure of Wells & Dickenson, in 1824, placed a good portion of this flock in the hands of Adam Hildebrand, and became the basis of his celebrated flock. Mr. T. S. Humrickhouse, of Coshocton, in a communication regarding sheep, writes as follows:

"The first merinos brought to Ohio were doubtless by Seth Adams, of Zanesville. They were Humphrey's Merinos—undoubtedly the best ever imported into the United States, by whatever name called. He kept them part of the time in Washington, and afterward in Muskingum County. He had a sort of partnership agency from Gen. Humphrey for keeping and selling them. They were scattered, and, had they been taken care of and appreciated, would have laid a better foundation of flocks in Ohio than any sheep brought into it from that time till 1852. The precise date at which Adams brought them cannot now be ascertained; but it was prior to 1813, perhaps as early as 1804."

"The first Southdowns," continues Mr. Humrickhouse, "New Leicester, Lincolnshire and Cotswold sheep I ever saw, were brought into Coshocton County from England by Isaac Maynard, nephew of the famous Sir John, in 1834. There were about ten Southdowns and a trio of each of the other kinds. He was offered $500 for his Lincolnshire ram, in Buffalo, as he passed through, but refused. He was selfish, and unwilling to put them into other hands when he went on a farm, all in the woods, and, in about three years, most of them had perished."

The raising and improvement of sheep has kept steady tread with the growth of the State, and now Ohio wool is known the world over. In quantity it is equal to any State in America, while its quality is unequalled.

The first stock of hogs brought to Ohio were rather poor, scrawny creatures, and, in a short time, when left to themselves to pick a livelihood from the beech mast and other nuts in the woods, degenerated into a wild condition, almost akin to their originators. As the country settled, however, they were gathered from their lairs, and, by feeding them corn, the farmers soon brought them out of their semi-barbarous state. Improved breeds were introduced. The laws for their protection and guarding were made, and now the hog of to-day shows what improvement and civilization can do for any wild animal. The chief city of the State has become famous as a slaughtering place; her bacon and sides being known in all the civilized world.

Other domestic animals, mules, asses, etc., have been brought to the State as occasion required. Wherever their use has been demanded, they have been obtained, until the State has her complement of all animals her citizens can use in their daily labors.

Most of the early emigrants brought with them young fruit trees or grafts of some favorite variety from the "old homestead." Hence, on the Western Reserve are to be found chiefly—especially in old orchards—New England varieties, while, in the localities immediately south of the Reserve, Pennsylvania and Maryland varieties predominate; but at Marietta, New England fruits are again found, as well as throughout Southeastern Ohio. One of the oldest of these orchards was on a Mr. Dana's farm, near Cincinnati, on the Ohio River bank. It consisted of five acres, in which apple seeds and seedlings were planted as early as 1790. Part of the old orchard is yet to be seen, though the trees are almost past their usefulness. Peaches, pears, cherries and apples were planted by all the pioneers in their gardens. As soon as the seed produced seedlings, these were transplanted to some hillside, and the orchard, in a few years, was a productive unit in the life of the settler. The first fruit brought, was, like everything else of the pioneers, rather inferior, and admitted of much cultivation. Soon steps were taken by the more enterprising settlers to obtain better varieties. Israel Putnam, as early as 1796, returned to the East, partly to get scions of the choicest apples, and, partly, on other business. He obtained quite a quantity of choice apples, of some forty or fifty varieties, and set them out. A portion of them were distributed to the settlers who had trees, to ingraft. From these old grafts are yet to be traced some of the best orchards in Ohio. Israel Putnam was one of the most prominent men in early Ohio days. He was always active in promoting the interests of the settlers. Among his earliest efforts, that of improving the fruit may well be mentioned. He and his brother, Aaron W. Putnam, living at Belpre, opposite Blennerhasset's Island, began the nursery business soon after their arrival in the West. The apples brought by them from their Connecticut home were used to commence the business. These, and the apples obtained from trees planted in their gardens, gave them a beginning. They were the only two men in Ohio engaged in the business till 1817.

In early times, in the central part of Ohio, there existed a curious character known as "Johnny Appleseed." His real name was John Chapman. He received his name from his habit of planting, along all the streams in that part of the State, apple-seeds from which sprang many of the old orchards. He did this as a religious duty, thinking it to be his especial mission. He had, it is said, been disappointed in his youth in a love affair, and came West about 1800, and ever after followed his singular life. He was extensively known, was quite harmless, very patient, and did, without doubt, much good. He died in 1847, at the house of a Mr. Worth, near Fort Wayne, Indiana, who had long known him, and often befriended him. He was a minister in the Swedenborgian Church, and, in his own way, a zealous worker.

The settlers of the Western Reserve, coming from New England, chiefly from Connecticut, brought all varieties of fruit known in their old homes. These, whether seeds or grafts, were planted in gardens, and as soon as an orchard could be cleared on some favorable hillside, the young trees were transplanted there, and in time an orchard was the result. Much confusion regarding the kinds of fruits thus produced arose, partly from the fact that the trees grown from seeds did not always prove to be of the same quality as the seeds. Climate, soil and surroundings often change the character of such fruits. Many new varieties, unknown to the growers, were the result. The fruit thus produced was often of an inferior growth, and when grafts were brought from the old New England home and grafted into the Ohio trees, an improvement as well as the old home fruit was the result. After the orchards in the Reserve began to bear, the fruit was very often taken to the Ohio River for shipment, and thence found its way to the Southern and Eastern seaboard cities.

Among the individuals prominent in introducing fruits into the State, were Mr. Dille, of Euclid, Judge Fuller, Judge Whittlesey, and Mr. Lindley. George Hoadly was also very prominent and energetic in the matter, and was, perhaps, the first to introduce the pear to any extent. He was one of the most persistent and enthusiastic amateurs in horticulture and pomology in the West. About the year 1810, Dr. Jared Kirtland, father of Prof. J. P. Kirtland, so favorably known among horticulturists and pomologists, came from Connecticut and settled in Poland, Mahoning County, with his family. This family has done more than any other in the State, perhaps, to advance fruit culture. About the year 1824, Prof. J. P. Kirtland, in connection with his brother, established a nursery at Poland, then in Trumbull County, and brought on from New England above a hundred of their best varieties of apples, cherries, peaches, pears, and smaller fruits, and a year or two after brought from New Jersey a hundred of the best varieties of that State; others were obtained in New York, so that they possessed the largest and most varied stock in the Western country. These two men gave a great impetus to fruit culture in the West, and did more than any others of that day to introduce improved kinds of all fruits in that part of the United States.

Another prominent man in this branch of industry was Mr. Andrew H. Ernst, of Cincinnati. Although not so early a settler as the Kirtlands, he was, like them, an ardent student and propagator of fine fruits. He introduced more than six hundred varieties of apples and seven hundred of pears, both native and foreign. His object was to test by actual experience the most valuable sorts for the diversified soil and climate of the Western country.

The name of Nicholas Longworth, also of Cincinnati, is one of the most extensively known of any in the science of horticulture and pomology. For more than fifty years he made these his especial delight. Having a large tract of land in the lower part of Cincinnati, he established nurseries, and planted and disseminated every variety of fruits that could be found in the United States—East or West—making occasional importations from European countries of such varieties as were thought to be adapted to the Western climate. His success has been variable, governed by the season, and in a measure by his numerous experiments. His vineyards, cultivated by tenants, generally Germans, on the European plan, during the latter years of his experience paid him a handsome revenue. He introduced the famous Catawba grape, the standard grape of the West. It is stated that Mr. Longworth bears the same relation to vineyard culture that Fulton did to steam navigation. Others made earlier effort, but he was the first to establish it on a permanent basis. He has also been eminently successful in the cultivation of the strawberry, and was the first to firmly establish it on Western soil. He also brought the Ohio Ever-bearing Raspberry into notice in the State, and widely disseminated it throughout the country.

Other smaller fruits were brought out to the West like those mentioned. In some cases fruits indigenous to the soil were cultivated and improved, and as improved fruits, are known favorably wherever used.

In chronology and importance, of all the cereals, corn stands foremost. During the early pioneer period, it was the staple article of food for both man and beast. It could be made into a variety of forms of food, and as such was not only palatable but highly nutritious and strengthening.

It is very difficult to determine whether corn originated in America or in the Old World. Many prominent botanists assert it is a native of Turkey, and originally was known as "Turkey wheat." Still others claimed to have found mention of maize in Chinese writings antedating the Turkish discovery. Grains of maize were found in an Egyptian mummy, which goes to prove to many the cereal was known in Africa since the earliest times. Maize was found in America when first visited by white men, but of its origin Indians could give no account. It had always been known among them, and constituted their chief article of vegetable diet. It was cultivated exclusively by their squaws, the men considering it beneath their dignity to engage in any manual labor. It is altogether probable corn was known in the Old World long before the New was discovered. The Arabs or Crusaders probably introduced it into Europe. How it was introduced into America will, in all probability, remain unknown. It may have been an indigenous plant, like many others. Its introduction into Ohio dates with the settlement of the whites, especially its cultivation and use as an article of trade. True, the Indians had cultivated it in small quantities; each lodge a little for itself, but no effort to make of it a national support began until the civilization of the white race became established. From that time on, the increase in crops has grown with the State, and, excepting the great corn States of the West, Ohio produces an amount equal to any State in the Union. The statistical tables printed in agricultural reports show the acres planted, and bushels grown. Figures speak an unanswerable logic.

Wheat is probably the next in importance of the cereals in the State. Its origin, like corn, is lost in the mists of antiquity. Its berry was no doubt used as food by the ancients for ages anterior to any historical records. It is often called corn in old writings, and under that name is frequently mentioned in the Bible.

"As far back in the vistas of ages as human records go, we find that wheat has been cultivated, and, with corn, aside from animal food, has formed one of the chief alimentary articles of all nations; but as the wheat plant has nowhere been found wild, or in a state of nature, the inference has been drawn by men of unquestioned scientific ability, that the original plant from which wheat has been derived was either totally annihilated, or else cultivation has wrought so great a change, that the original is by no means obvious, or manifest to botanists."

It is supposed by many, wheat originated in Persia. Others affirm it was known and cultivated in Egypt long ere it found its way into Persia. It was certainly grown on the Nile ages ago, and among the tombs are found grains of wheat in a perfectly sound condition, that unquestionably have been buried thousands of years. It may be, however, that wheat was grown in Persia first, and thence found its way into Egypt and Africa, or, vice versa. It grew first in Egypt and Africa and thence crossed into Persia, and from there found its way into India and all parts of Asia.

It is also claimed that wheat is indigenous to the island of Sicily, and that from there it spread along the shores of the Mediterranean into Asia Minor and Egypt, and, as communities advanced, it was cultivated, not only to a greater extent, but with greater success.

The goddess of agriculture, more especially of grains, who, by the Greeks, was called Demeter, and, by the Romans, Ceres—hence the name cereals—was said to have her home at Enna, a fertile region of that island, thus indicating the source from which the Greeks and Romans derived their *Cereal*ia. Homer mentions wheat and spelt as bread; also corn and barley, and describes his heroes as using them as fodder for their horses, as the people in the South of Europe do at present. Rye was introduced into Greece from Thrace, or by way of Thrace, in the time of Galen. In Cæsar's time the Romans grew a species of wheat enveloped in a husk, like barley, and by them called "Far."

During the excavations of Herculaneum and Pompeii, wheat, in an excellent state of preservation, was frequently found.

Dr. Anson Hart, Superintendent, at one time, of Indian Affairs in Oregon, states that he found numerous patches of wheat and flax growing wild in the Yackemas country, in Upper Oregon. There is but little doubt that both cereals were introduced into Oregon at an early period by the Hudson Bay, or other fur companies. Wheat was also found by Dr. Boyle, of Columbus, Ohio, growing in a similar state in the Carson Valley. It was, doubtless, brought there by the early Spaniards. In 1530, one of Cortez's slaves found several grains of wheat accidentally mixed with the rice. The careful negro planted the handful of grains, and succeeding years saw a wheat crop in Mexico, which found its way northward, probably into California.

Turn where we may, wherever the foot of civilization has trod, there will we find this wheat plant, which, like a monument, has perpetuated the memory of the event; but nowhere do we find the plant wild. It is the result of cultivation in bygone ages, and has been produced by "progressive development."

It is beyond the limit and province of these pages to discuss the composition of this important cereal; only its historic properties can be noticed. With the advent of the white men in America, wheat, like corn, came to be one of the staple products of life. It followed the pioneer over the mountains westward, where, in the rich Mississippi and Illinois bottoms, it has been cultivated by the French since 1690. When the hardy New Englanders came to the alluvial lands adjoining the Ohio, Muskingum or Miami Rivers, they brought with them this "staff of life," and forthwith began its cultivation. Who sowed the first wheat in Ohio, is a question Mr. A. S. Guthrie answers, in a letter published in the Agricultural Report of 1857, as follows:

"My father, Thomas Guthrie, emigrated to the Northwest Territory in the year 1788, and arrived at the mouth of the Muskingum in July, about three months after Gen. Putnam had arrived with the first pioneers of Ohio. My father brought a bushel of wheat with him from one of the frontier counties of Pennsylvania, which he sowed on a lot of land in Marietta, which he cleared for that purpose, on the second bottom or plain, in the neighborhood of where the Court House now stands."

Mr. Guthrie's opinion is corroborated by Dr. Samuel P. Hildreth, in his "Pioneer Settlers of Ohio," and is, no doubt, correct.

From that date on down through the years of Ohio's growth, the crops of wheat have kept pace with the advance and growth of civilization. The soil is admirably adapted to the growth of this cereal, a large number of varieties being grown, and an excellent quality produced. It is firm in body, and, in many cases, is a successful rival of wheat produced in the great wheat-producing regions of the United States—Minnesota, and the farther Northwest.

Oats, rye, barley, and other grains were also brought to Ohio from the Atlantic Coast, though some of them had been cultivated by the French in Illinois and about Detroit. They were at first used only as food for home consumption, and, until the successful attempts at river and canal navigation were brought about, but little was ever sent to market.

Of all the root crops known to man, the potato is probably the most valuable. Next to wheat, it is claimed by many as the staff of life. In some localities, this assumption is undoubtedly true. What would Ireland have done in her famines but for this simple vegetable? The potato is a native of the mountainous districts of tropical and subtropical America, probably from Chili to Mexico; but there is considerable difficulty in deciding where it is really indigenous, and where it has spread after being introduced by man. Humboldt, the learned savant, doubted if it had ever been found wild, but scholars no less famous, and of late date, have expressed an opposite opinion. In the wild plant, as in all others, the tubers are smaller than in the cultivated. The potato had been cultivated in America, and its tubers used for food, long before the advent of the Europeans. It seems to have been first brought to Europe by the Spaniards, from the neighborhood of Quito, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and spread through Spain, the Netherlands, Burgundy and Italy, cultivated in gardens as an ornament only and not for an article of food. It long received through European countries the same name with the batatas—sweet potato, which is the plant meant by all English writers down to the seventeenth century.

It appears that the potato was brought from Virginia to Ireland by Hawkins, a slave-trader, in 1565, and to England by Sir Francis Drake, twenty years later. It did not at first attract much notice, and not until it was a third time imported from America, in 1623, by Sir Walter Raleigh, did the Europeans make a practical use of it. Even then it was a long time before it was extensively cultivated. It is noticed in agricultural journals as food for cattle only as late as 1719. Poor people began using it, however, and finding it highly nutritious, the Royal Geographical Society, in 1663, adopted measures for its propagation. About this time it began to be used in Ireland as food, and from the beginning of the eighteenth century, its use has never declined. It is now known in every quarter of the world, and has, by cultivation, been greatly improved.

The inhabitants of America learned its use from the Indians, who cultivated it and other root crops—rutabagas, radishes, etc., and taught the whites their value. When the pioneers of Ohio came to its fertile valleys, they brought improved species with them, which by cultivation and soil, are now greatly increased, and are among the standard crops of the State.

The cucurbitaceous plants, squashes, etc., were, like the potato and similar root crops, indigenous to America—others, like the melons, to Asia—and were among the staple foods of the original inhabitants. The early French missionaries of the West speak of both root crops and cucurbitaceous plants as in use among the aboriginal inhabitants. "They are very sweet and wholesome," wrote Marquette. Others speak in the same terms, though some of the plants in this order had found their way to these valleys through the Spaniards and others through early Atlantic Coast and Mexican inhabitants. Their use by the settlers of the West, especially Ohio, is traced to New England, as the first settlers came from that portion of the Union. They grow well in all parts of the State, and by cultivation have been greatly improved in quality and variety. All cucurbitaceous plants require a rich, porous soil, and by proper attention to their cultivation, excellent results can be attained.

Probably the earliest and most important implement of husbandry known is the plow. Grain, plants and roots will not grow well unless the soil in which they are planted be properly stirred, hence the first requirement was an instrument that would fulfill such conditions.

The first implements were rude indeed; generally, stout wooden sticks, drawn through the earth by thongs attached to rude ox-yokes, or fastened to the animal's horns. Such plows were in use among the ancient Egyptians, and may yet be found among uncivilized nations. The Old Testament furnishes numerous instances of the use of the plow, while, on the ruins of ancient cities and among the pyramids of Egypt, and on the buried walls of Babylon, and other extinct cities, are rude drawings of this useful implement. As the use of iron became apparent and general, it was utilized for plow-points, where the wood alone would not penetrate the earth. They got their plowshares sharpened in Old Testament days, also coulters, which shows, beyond a doubt, that iron-pointed plows were then in use. From times mentioned in the Bible, on heathen tombs, and ancient catacombs, the improvement of the plow, like other farming tools, went on, as the race of man grew in intelligence. Extensive manors in the old country required increased means of turning the ground, and, to meet these demands, ingenious mechanics, from time to time, invented improved plows. Strange to say, however, no improvement was ever made by the farmer himself. This is accounted for in his habits of life, and, too often, the disposition to "take things as they are." When America was settled, the plow had become an implement capable of turning two or three acres per day. Still, and for many years, and even until lately, the mold-board was entirely wooden, the point only iron. Later developments changed the wood for steel, which now alone is used. Still later, especially in prairie States, riding plows are used. Like all other improvements, they were obliged to combat an obtuse public mind among the ruralists, who surely combat almost every move made to better their condition. In many places in America, wooden plows, straight ax handles, and a stone in one end of the bag, to balance the grist in the other, are the rule, and for no other reason in the world are they maintained than the laconic answer:

"My father did so, and why should not I? Am I better than he?"

After the plow comes the harrow, but little changed, save in lightness and beauty. Formerly, a log of wood, or a brush harrow, supplied its place, but in the State of Ohio, the toothed instrument has nearly always been used.

The hoe is lighter made than formerly, and is now made of steel. At first, the common iron hoe, sharpened by the blacksmith, was in constant use. Now, it is rarely seen outside of the Southern States, where it has long been the chief implement in agriculture.

The various small plows for the cultivation of corn and such other crops as necessitated their use are all the result of modern civilization. Now, their number is large, and, in many places, there are two or more attached to one carriage, whose operator rides. These kinds are much used in the Western States, whose rootless and stoneless soil is admirably adapted to such machinery.

When the grain became ripe, implements to cut it were in demand. In ancient times, the sickle was the only instrument used. It was a short, curved iron, whose inner edge was sharpened and serrated. In its most ancient form, it is doubtful if the edge was but little, if any, serrated. It is mentioned in all ancient works, and in the Bible is frequently referred to.

"Thrust in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe," wrote the sacred New Testament, while the Old chronicles as early as the time of Moses: "As thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn."

In more modern times, the handle of the sickle was lengthened, then the blade, which in time led to the scythe. Both are yet in use in many parts of the world. The use of the scythe led some thinking person to add a "finger" or two, and to change the shape of the handle. The old cradle was the result. At first it met considerable opposition from the laborers, who brought forward the old-time argument of ignorance, that it would cheapen labor.

Whether the cradle is a native of America or Europe is not accurately decided; probably of the mother country. It came into common use about 1818, and in a few years had found its way into the wheat-producing regions of the West. Where small crops are raised, the cradle is yet much used. A man can cut from two to four acres per day, hence, it is much cheaper than a reaper, where the crop is small.

The mower and reaper are comparatively modern inventions. A rude reaping machine is mentioned by Pliny in the first century. It was pushed by an ox through the standing grain. On its front was a sharp edge, which cut the grain. It was, however, impracticable, as it cut only a portion of the grain, and the peasantry preferred the sickle. Other and later attempts to make reapers do not seem to have been successful, and not till the present century was a machine made that would do the work required. In 1826, Mr. Bell, of Scotland, constructed a machine which is yet used in many parts of that country. In America, Mr. Hussey and Mr. McCormick took out patents for reaping machines of superior character in 1833 and 1834. At first the cutters of these machines were various contrivances, but both manufacturers soon adopted a serrated knife, triangular shaped, attached to a bar, and driven through "finger guards" attached to it, by a forward and backward motion. These are the common ones now in use, save that all do not use serrated knives. Since these pioneer machines were introduced into the harvest fields they have been greatly improved and changed. Of late years they have been constructed so as to bind the sheaves, and now a good stout boy, and a team with a "harvester," will do as much as many men could do a few years ago, and with much greater ease.

As was expected by the inventors of reapers, they met with a determined resistance from those who in former times made their living by harvesting. It was again absurdly argued that they would cheapen labor, and hence were an injury to the laboring man. Indeed, when the first machines were brought into Ohio, many of them were torn to pieces by the ignorant hands. Others left fields in a body when the proprietor brought a reaper to his farm. Like all such fallacies, these, in time, passed away, leaving only their stain.

Following the reaper came the thresher. As the country filled with inhabitants, and men increased their possessions, more rapid means than the old flail or roller method were demanded. At first the grain was trodden out by horses driven over the bundles, which were laid in a circular inclosure. The old flail, the tramping-out by horses, and the cleaning by the sheet, or throwing the grain up against a current of air, were too slow, and machines were the result of the demand. In Ohio the manufacture of threshers began in 1846, in the southwestern part. Isaac Tobias, who came to Hamilton from Miamisburg that year, commenced building the threshers then in use. They were without the cleaning attachment, and simply hulled the grain. Two years later, he began manufacturing the combined thresher and cleaner, which were then coming into use. He continued in business till 1851. Four years after, the increased demand for such machines, consequent upon the increased agricultural products, induced the firm of Owens, Lane & Dyer to fit their establishment for the manufacture of threshers. They afterward added the manufacture of steam engines to be used in the place of horse power. Since then the manufacture of these machines, as well as that of all other agricultural machinery, has greatly multiplied and improved, until now it seems as though but little room for improvement remains. One of the largest firms engaged in the manufacture of threshers and their component machinery is located at Mansfield—the Aultman & Taylor Co. Others are at Massillon, and at other cities in the West.

Modern times and modern enterprise have developed a marvelous variety of agricultural implements —too many to be mentioned in a volume like this. Under special subjects they will occasionally be found. The farmer's life, so cheerless in pioneer times, and so full of weary labor, is daily becoming less laborious, until, if they as a class profit by the advances, they can find a life of ease in farm pursuits, not attainable in any other profession. Now machines do almost all the work. They sow, cultivate, cut, bind, thresh, winnow and carry the grain. They cut, rake, load, mow and dry the hay. They husk, shell and clean the corn. They cut and split the wood. They do almost all; until it seems as though the day may come when the farmer can sit in his house and simply guide the affairs of his farm.

Any occupation prospers in proportion to the interest taken in it by its members. This interest is always heightened by an exchange of views, hence societies and periodicals exercise an influence at first hardly realized. This feeling among prominent agriculturists led to the formation of agricultural societies, at first by counties, then districts, then by States, and lastly by associations of States. The day may come when a national agricultural fair may be one of the annual attractions of America.

Without noticing the early attempts to found such societies in Europe or America, the narrative will begin with those of Ohio. The first agricultural society organized in the Buckeye State was the Hamilton County Agricultural Society. Its exact date of organization is not now preserved, but to a certainty it is known that the Society held public exhibitions as a County Society prior to 1823. Previous to that date there were, doubtless, small, private exhibitions held in older localities, probably at Marietta, but no regular organization seems to have been maintained. The Hamilton County Society held its fairs annually, with marked success. Its successor, the present Society, is now one of the largest county societies in the Union.

During the legislative session of 1832-33, the subject of agriculture seems to have agitated the minds of the people through their representatives, for the records of that session show the first laws passed for their benefit. The acts of that body seem to have been productive of some good, for, though no records of the number of societies organized at that date exist, yet the record shows that "many societies have been organized in conformity to this act," etc. No doubt many societies held fairs from this time, for a greater or less number of years. Agricultural journals* were, at this period, rare in the State, and the subject of agricultural improvement did not receive that attention from the press it does at this time; and, for want of public spirit and attention to sustain these fairs, they were gradually discontinued until the new act respecting their organization was passed in 1846. However, records of several county societies of the years between 1832 and 1846 yet exist, showing that in some parts of the State, the interest in these fairs was by no means diminished. The Delaware County Society reports for the year 1833—it was organized in June of that year—good progress for a beginning, and that much interest was manifested by the citizens of the county.

Ross County held its first exhibition in the autumn of that year, and the report of the managers is quite cheerful. Nearly all of the exhibited articles were sold at auction, at greatly advanced prices from the current ones of the day. The entry seems to have been free, in an open inclosure, and but little revenue was derived. Little was expected, hence no one was disappointed.

Washington County reports an excellent cattle show for that year, and a number of premiums awarded to the successful exhibitors. This same year the Ohio Importation Company was organized at the Ross County fair. The Company began the next season the importation of fine cattle from England, and, in a few years, did incalculable good in this respect, as well as make considerable money in the enterprise.

These societies were re-organized when the law of 1846 went into effect, and, with those that had gone down and the new ones started, gave an impetus to agriculture that to this day is felt. Now every county has a society, while district, State and inter-State societies are annually held; all promotive in their tendency, and all a benefit to every one.

The Ohio State Board of Agriculture was organized by an act of the Legislature, passed February 27, 1846. Since then various amendments to the organic law have been passed from time to time as

*The Western Tiller was published in Cincinnati, in 1826. It was "miscellaneous," but contained many excellent articles on agriculture.

The Farmers' Record was published in Cincinnati, in 1831, and continued for several years.

The Ohio Farmer was published at Batavia, Clermont County, in 1833, by Hon. Samuel Medary.

These were the early agricultural journals, some of which yet survive, though in new names, and under new management. Others have, also, since been added, some of which have an exceedingly large circulation, and are an influence for much good in the State.

the necessities of the Board and of agriculture in the State demanded. The same day that the act was passed creating the State Board, an act was also passed providing for the erection of county and district societies, under which law, with subsequent amendments, the present county and district agricultural societies are managed. During the years from 1846 down to the present time, great improvements have been made in the manner of conducting these societies, resulting in exhibitions unsurpassed in any other State.

Pomology and horticulture are branches of industry so closely allied with agriculture that a brief resume of their operations in Ohio will be eminently adapted to these pages. The early planting and care of fruit in Ohio has already been noticed. Among the earliest pioneers were men of fine tastes, who not only desired to benefit themselves and their country, but who were possessed with a laudable ambition to produce the best fruits and vegetables the State could raise. For this end they studied carefully the topography of the country, its soil, climate, and various influences upon such culture, and by careful experiments with fruit and vegetables, produced the excellent varieties now in use. Mention has been made of Mr. Longworth and Mr. Ernst, of Cincinnati; and Israel and Aaron W. Putnam, on the Muskingum River; Mr. Dille, Judges Fuller and Whittlesey, Dr. Jared Kirtland and his sons, and others—all practical enthusiasts in these departments. At first, individual efforts alone, owing to the condition of the country, could be made. As the State filled with settlers, and means of communication became better, a desire for an interchange of views became apparent, resulting in the establishment of periodicals devoted to these subjects, and societies where different ones could meet and discuss these things.

A Horticultural and Pomological Society was organized in Ohio in 1866. Before the organization of State societies, however, several distinct or independent societies existed; in fact, out of these grew the State Society, which in turn produced good by stimulating the creation of county societies. All these societies, aids to agriculture, have progressed as the State developed, and have done much in advancing fine fruit, and a taste for æsthetic culture. In all parts of the West, their influence is seen in better and improved fruit; its culture and its demand.

To-day, Ohio stands in the van of the Western States in agriculture and all its kindred associations. It only needs the active energy of her citizens to keep her in this place, advancing as time advances, until the goal of her ambition is reached.

CHAPTER XVI.

CLIMATOLOGY—OUTLINE—VARIATION IN OHIO—ESTIMATE IN DEGREES—RAINFALL—AMOUNT—VARIABILITY.

THE climate of Ohio varies about four degrees. Though originally liable to malaria in many districts when first settled, in consequence of a dense vegetation induced by summer heats and rains, it has become very healthful, owing to clearing away this vegetation, and proper drainage. The State is as favorable in its sanitary characteristics as any other in its locality. Ohio is remarkable for its high productive capacity, almost every thing grown in the temperate climates being within its range. Its extremes of heat and cold are less than almost any other State in or near the same latitude, hence Ohio suffers less from the extreme dry or wet seasons which affect all adjoining States. These modifications are mainly due to the influence of the Lake Erie waters. These not only modify the heat of summer and the cold of winter, but apparently reduce the profusion of rainfall in summer, and favor moisture in dry periods. No finer climate exists, all conditions considered, for delicate vegetable growths, than that portion of Ohio bordering on Lake Erie. This is abundantly attested by the recent extensive development there of grape culture.

Mr. Lorin Blodget, author of "American Climatology," in the agricultural report of 1853, says; "A district bordering on the Southern and Western portions of Lake Erie is more favorable in this respect (grape cultivation) than any other on the Atlantic side of the Rocky Mountains, and it will ultimately prove capable of a very liberal extension of vine culture."

Experience has proven Mr. Blodget correct in his theory. Now extensive fields of grapes are everywhere found on the Lake Erie Slope, while other small fruits find a sure footing on its soil.

"Considering the climate of Ohio by isothermal lines and rain shadings, it must be borne in mind," says Mr. Blodget, in his description of Ohio's climate, from which these facts are drawn, "that local influences often require to be considered. At the South, from Cincinnati to Steubenville, the deep river valleys are two degrees warmer than the hilly districts of the same vicinity. The lines are drawn intermediate between the two extremes. Thus, Cincinnati, on the plain, is 2° warmer than at the Observatory, and 4° warmer for each year than Hillsboro, Highland County—the one being 500, the other 1,000, feet above sea-level. The immediate valley of the Ohio, from Cincinnati to Gallipolis, is about 75° for the summer, and 54° for the year; while the adjacent hilly districts, 300 to 500 feet higher, are not above 73° and 52° respectively. For the summer, generally, the river valleys are 73° to 75° ; the level and central portions 72° to 73° , and the lake border 70° to 72° . A peculiar mildness of climate belongs to the vicinity of Kelley's Island, Sandusky and Toledo. Here, both winter and summer, the climate is 2° warmer than on the highland ridge extending from Norwalk and Oberlin to Hudson and the northeastern border. This ridge varies from 500 to 750 feet above the lake, or 850 to 1,200 feet above sea level. This high belt has a summer temperature of 70° , 27° for the winter, and 49° for the year; while at Sandusky and Kelley's Island the summer is 72° , the winter 29° , and the year 50° . In the central and eastern parts of the State, the winters are comparatively cold, the average falling to 32° over the more level districts, and to 29° on the highlands. The Ohio River valley is about 35° , but the highlands near it fall to 31° and 32° for the winter."

As early as 1824, several persons in the State began taking the temperature in their respective localities, for the spring, summer, autumn and winter, averaging them for the entire year. From time to time, these were gathered and published, inducing others to take a step in the same direction. Not long since, a general table, from about forty localities, was gathered and compiled, covering a period of more than a quarter of a century. This table, when averaged, showed an average temperature of 52.4° , an evenness of temperature not equaled in many bordering States.

Very imperfect observations have been made of the amount of rainfall in the State. Until lately, only an individual here and there throughout the State took enough interest in this matter to faithfully observe and record the averages of several years in succession. In consequence of this fact, the illustration of that feature of Ohio's climate is less satisfactory than that of the temperature. "The actual rainfall of different months and years varies greatly," says Mr. Blodget. "There may be more in a month, and, again, the quantity may rise to 12 or 15 inches in a single month. For a year, the variation may be from a minimum of 22 or 25 inches, to a maximum of 50 or even 60 inches in the southern part of the State, and 45 to 48 inches along the lake border. The average is a fixed quantity, and, although requiring a period of twenty or twenty-five years to fix it absolutely, it is entirely certain and unchangeable when known. On charts, these average quantities are represented by depths of shading. At Cincinnati, the last fifteen years of observation somewhat reduce the average of 48 inches, of former years, to 46 or 47 inches."

Spring and summer generally give the most rain, there being, in general, 10 to 12 inches in the spring, 10 to 14 inches in the summer, and 8 to 10 inches in the autumn. The winter is the most variable of all the seasons, the southern part of the State having 10 inches, and the northern part 7 inches or less—an average of 8 or 9 inches.

The charts of rainfall, compiled for the State, show a fall of 30 inches on the lake, and 46 inches at the Ohio River. Between these two points, the fall is marked, beginning at the north, 32, 34, 36 and 38 inches, all near the lake. Farther down, in the latitude of Tuscarawas, Monroe and Mercer Counties, the fall is 40 inches, while the southwestern part is 42 and 44 inches.

The clearing away of forests, the drainage of the land, and other causes, have lessened the rainfall, making considerable difference since the days of the aborigines.

STARK CO. COURT HOUSE & JAIL

CHAPTER I.*

PHYSICAL FEATURES—GEOLOGICAL SURVEY—ROCK SECTION—COALS OF STARK COUNTY—BLACK-BAND IRON ORE—SURFACE PRODUCTS—EARLY EXPERIENCES IN AGRICULTURE—IMPROVEMENTS IN FARMING AND STOCK-RAISING—AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES.

THE surface of Stark County is without any striking features. It is generally rolling, and along the southern border may be called hilly, since the valleys of some of the draining streams are cut to a depth of 300 feet. In most parts of the county, the surface is pleasantly diversified by rounded hills, with very gentle slopes, and which are cultivated to their summits. The valleys that divide these hills are broad and shallow, and rarely show precipitous sides or exposures of rock. The soil is generally light, often loam, sand or gravel, and was originally covered with a forest composed principally of oak, but, in the central portion of the county there were many glades and openings, where the timber was light. This consisted largely of willow-oak and blackjack-oak, which formed clumps and islands, separated by spaces overgrown with wild grasses, flowers and scrub-oak. From the nature of the soil, the farmers of the county have usually been cultivators of grain, and Stark has long been famous for its crops of wheat.

The altitude of the county is from 350 to 750 feet above Lake Erie, its eastern portion reaching up on the great divide or water-shed between the Ohio and Lake Erie. Like most of the counties that lie along the water-shed, the surface of Stark County is dotted over with lakes; of these, Congress Lake, in Lake Township, Myer's Lake, Sippo Lake, etc., may be taken as examples. Here, too, as in adjacent counties, we find many drained or filled lake-basins, where peat and marl now hold the place formerly occupied by water. The extent of this kind of surface is, however, not great, as Stark has little marsh land, and, since it is so abundantly supplied with excellent coal, it is scarcely probable that the scattered patches of peat will ever become of importance, as a source of fuel. As fertilizers, however, the muck and shell-marl will be of great practical value, especially on light and open soils, such as that which covers most of the county. It may be important, therefore, for the farmers who have patches of swamp upon their land to test them by boring, to ascertain whether they are underlain by strata of peat or marl, which may be used to cheaply fertilize their fields.

In most parts of Stark County, the surface deposits are such as have been transported to greater or less distances from their places of origin, and it is only on the hills of the southern townships that we find the soil derived from the decomposition of the underlying rocks. Numerous facts indicate that the county has formerly been traversed from north to south by a great line of drainage. This is now imperfectly represented by the Tuscarawas River, but it is evident that this, though a noble stream, is but a rivulet compared with the flood which once flowed somewhat in the direction it follows, from the lake basin into the Ohio. The records of this ancient river are seen in the deeply excavated channels, now filled with gravel, in the Tuscarawas Valley, and between Canton and Massillon. In the valley of the Tuscarawas an extensive series of borings has been made for coal, and these have revealed the fact that this stream is now running far above its former bed, and that it does not accurately follow the line of its ancient valley. That old valley is in many places filled with gravel, and is now so thoroughly obliterated as to give to the common observer little indication of its existence. A few facts will show, however, that this interesting feature in the surface geology of Stark County has a real existence. The borings made for coal east of the present river, in Lawrence and Jackson Townships, have, in many instances, been carried below the present streams without reaching solid rock, and heavy beds of gravel are found to occupy a broad and deep valley, which lies for the most part on the east side of the present water-course. From Fulton to Millport, and thence to Massillon, many borings have been made, and in these, where the course of the auger was not arrested by bowlders, the drift deposits have often been found to be more than 100 feet in thickness. As the rock is exposed on both sides of the river at Massillon and Millport, it is seen that the river is running on the west side of its ancient trough, and, though it here has a rocky bottom, east of the present course, the rock would not be found, even at a considerably greater depth. Just how deep the ancient valley of the Tuscarawas is in this section of the county, there are no means at hand of ascertaining; but we learn from the salt-wells bored at Canal Dover that the bottom of the rocky valley is there 175 feet below the surface of the stream. Another, and perhaps the most important of these ancient lines of drainage, runs between Canton and Massillon. At the "Four-Mile Switch," half way between these towns, rock comes near the surface, and coal has been worked at Bahney's mine and other places in this vicinity. Explorations have been made, which show that between "Four-Mile Switch" and Massillon is a ridge of rock, which lies between two valleys, viz., that through which the Tuscarawas flows, and another, completely filled, between Massillon and Canton.

Between Massillon and Navarre, the road for the most part lies upon a terrace, the surface of which is about seventy-five feet above the river. This terrace is part of a plateau, which extends in some places more than a mile east of the river. It is composed of gravel and sand, of which the depth is not known. On the other side of the Tuscarawas, the rock comes to the surface, quarries have been opened, and borings for coal have been made, which show that, for some miles below Massillon, comparatively little drift covers the rock. It is evident, therefore, that the ancient river channel passed under the terrace over which the road runs from Massillon to Navarre. Below Navarre, the river sways over to the east side of its ancient valley, striking its rocky border on the "Wetmore Tract." Here the gravel-beds, which filled the old valley, are on the west side of the river.

The succession of the rocks which come to the surface in Stark County will be most readily learned by reference to the general section, which is as follows:

	FEET.
1. Soil and drift deposits.....	10 to 100
2. Shale and sandstone of barren coal measures only found in hilltops of Osnaburg, Paris, Nimishillen and Washington.....	30 to 50
3. Buff ferruginous limestone, Osnaburg and Paris.....	0 to 6
4. Black-band-iron ore, Osnaburg and Paris.....	0 to 10
5. Coal No. 7, same localities as No. 4....	1 to 3
6. Fire clay.....	1 to 3
7. Shale and sandstone, sometimes containing a thin coal seam near the middle hills of Washington, Nimishillen, Paris, Osnaburg and Sandy; hilltops of Pike, Bethlehem and Sugar Creek.....	75 to 110
8. Coal No. 6, same localities as No. 7....	2 to 6
9. Fire clay.....	2 to 5
10. Gray and black shales, with iron ore near base.....	40 to 60
11. Coal No. 5, "thirty-inch seam," southern and eastern portion of the county.	2 to 3
12. Fire clay.....	2 to 5
13. Shale and sandstone, sometimes containing thin coal.....	40 to 60
14. Putnam Hill limestone.....	0 to 4
15. Coal No. 4, "upper limestone seam"....	1 to 6
16. Fire clay.....	1 to 5
17. Shale and sandstone, sometimes with thin coal and limestone.....	20 to 50
18. Zoar limestone.....	0 to 4
19. Coal No. 3, "lower limestone coal"....	0 to 3
20. Fire clay.....	1 to 8

	FEET.
21. Shale and sandstone, sometimes with thin coal at base.....	50 to 60
22. Massillon sandstone, sometimes with thin coal at base.....	30 to 100
23. Gray or black shale.....	5 to 50
24. Coal No. 1, "Massillon coal".....	0 to 6
25. Fire clay.....	1 to 5
26. Shaly sandstone.....	30 to 50
27. Conglomerate.....	20 to 50

The strata enumerated in the foregoing section all belong to the carboniferous system, and, with the exception of a limited area in the northwestern corner, where the conglomerate appears, the entire area of the county is occupied by the coal measures. The only outcrops of the conglomerate occur in the extreme northwestern portion of the county, in the corner of Lawrence Township, so that it might as well be omitted from enumeration among the rocks of the county, except that it underlies, at no great depth, all portions of the surface, and deserves notice as the easily recognizable base of the productive coal measures. It should also be mentioned in this connection that some of the higher sandstones of the coal measures sometimes contain pebbles, especially that over Coal No. 6; but the pebbles in these beds are usually quite small—rarely exceeding a bean in size—so that there is little danger that they will be confounded with the true conglomerate.

The coal measures of Stark County are composed, as usual, of sandstone, limestone, shale, fire-clay, coal, etc., and include all the lower group of coal seams—seven in number. Of these, the lowest, or, as we have named it, Coal No. 1, the Massillon, or Briar Hill seam, is one of the most valuable in the entire series. This is well developed in Stark County, and forms one of the most important sources of business and wealth. The coal which is obtained from this seam is generally called the Massillon coal, and is so well known that little need be said of its character. Though varying somewhat in different localities, as a general rule it is bright and handsome in appearance, contains little sulphur and ash, is open-burning, and possesses high heating power. By long and varied trial, it has proved to be one of the most serviceable coals found in the State. In Stark County, it is somewhat more bituminous than the coal of the same seam in the Mahoning Valley, but it is more like it in composition than its appearance would indicate. The Massillon coal is well adapted to a great variety of uses. It is successfully employed in the smelting of iron in blast furnaces, and is there used in the raw state. It is also a good rolling-mill coal, serves an excellent purpose for the generation of steam, would do well for the manufacture of gas, and is the most highly esteemed household fuel in all the districts where it is used. This combination of excellences makes it a special favorite in the markets of the lake ports, and maintains for it an active demand.

The Massillon coal seam, being generally cut by the valley of the Tuscarawas, forms a great number of outcrops in the western part of the county, and in that region more than a hundred mines are opened into it. As the dip of all the rocks in the county is southeast, it passes out of sight east of the Tuscarawas Valley, and along the eastern margin of the county it is at least 200 feet below the surface. It will thus be seen that it ought to underlie nearly all the county, but it unfortunately happens here, as in Summit and Mahoning, this coal lies in limited basins, and is absent from a larger part of the territory where it belongs. It is therefore of much less practical value than it was supposed to be before the irregularity of its distribution was ascertained. Nevertheless, the most important question connected with the geology of Stark County is that of the presence or absence of the Massillon coal in the townships east of where it is mined. Unfortunately, but little light has been thrown upon this subject by any explorations yet made, and, from the peculiar character of this coal seam, it is quite impossible to predict, with any certainty, what will be the result of a systematic search for it where it lies deeply buried. Between the valley of the Tuscarawas and the western margin of the coal area in Wayne County, numerous outcrops of the Massillon coal have been found, a number of important basins have been opened, and now many thousand tons are annually mined in this district.

East of the Tuscarawas Valley, the geological structure is obscured by heavy masses of drift, and Coal No. 1 has not been mined or found to any extent on that side of the river. Near Millport, however, and still further north, and east around Mud Brook Church, important basins of coal have been discovered, and it is probable that, when the real difficulties of the search on this side of the river are overcome, i. e., when certain clews that can be followed up shall have been found it will be learned that valuable deposits of coal stretch eastward far beyond any present knowledge.

Considerable boring has been done in the central and eastern portions of the county, and such as might be supposed would go far to decide the question of the reach eastward of the Massillon coal, but these explorations have not proven the existence of any considerable body of this coal east of the river. It should be said, however, that of the borings made, only such as were made for the express purpose of finding coal are worthy of any confidence. The oil-wells, by which the whole county has been pierced, were bored for oil, and nothing else. As a general rule, every other product was neglected, and where coal seams were passed through, the evidence of the fact afforded by the sand-pump was unheeded.

On the eastern line of the county, few borings have been made which can be depended upon for giving any accurate information. At Limaville, in the northeastern corner of the county, the Briar Hill coal has been struck in several holes. These borings, and others at Canton, show that the belief that no valuable deposits of the Massillon coal exist east of the Tuscarawas River, is without a solid foundation, and it is predicted that some most important and valuable coal basins will be reached in the eastern portion of the county, and where their presence has not been suspected. The borings at Limaville show the lower coal of workable thickness. It exists over a considerable area in that vicinity, as it was found in a number of holes running with great regularity. The well was located near Limaville Station, the well head ten feet above, or 570 above Lake Erie. The coal was struck 165 feet from the surface, or 405 feet above the lake. This shows a dip of about 100 feet from the nearest outcrop of the coal in Tallmadge, eighteen miles north of west, and about the same dip from the vicinity of Ravenna, fifteen miles due north; but the coal lies higher here than at Massillon, southwest, or Youngstown, northeast, a fact due, doubtless, to one of the folds which traverse our coal fields.

The Massillon coal district is, practically, one of the most important in the State. The number of miners employed here is about fifteen hundred. A capital of over $2,000,000 is used in the production of coal, and the annual yield of the mines may be estimated at 1,000,000 tons. Most of this coal goes to Cleveland, by way of the Lake Shore & Tuscarawas Valley, Cleveland, Mt. Vernon & Columbus, and other railroads, and by the Ohio Canal. A large amount is consumed in and about Massillon, where it is used for a considerable variety of manufactures. The most important use to which this coal is here put is for iron-smelting, since it is the fuel exclusively used in the two furnaces at Massillon, and one at Dover. These furnaces have been in operation for many years, and that which they produce has a well-established and excellent reputation. It is for the most part made of black-band iron ore, and closely resembles the Scotch pig. This is not surprising, since the materials and methods employed are almost exactly the same as those used in Scotland. These have proved remunerative during years of experience, yet the methods of the Scotch iron-masters can be easily shown to be susceptible of improvement. By adding close tops to the furnaces, increasing their dimensions and the temperature of the blast, there is little doubt that most important economy in the use of the fuel may be effected. With the present method of manufacture, the Massillon furnaces consume three and a half to four tons of coal for every ton of iron made. This is certainly a wasteful use of fuel, which, from its great excellence and limited quantity, ought to be husbanded with the greatest care. The Massillon coal constitutes a great source of wealth to the county, and is the mainspring of many industries; but the fact should be recognized that this is a capital which is daily being exhausted, and, when exhausted, can never be reproduced. All the coal basins now known about Massillon will be worked out within a generation, and, although new discoveries will certainly be made, and much territory will become productive where the coal is not now supposed to exist, still the value of the coal is so great, and the consumption of it so rapidly increasing, that it is to be feared not many years will elapse before the supply from this region will be exhausted.

A list of the principal mines in the Massillon district is as follows:*

The specimens are from the following mines: 1. Lawrence Coal Company, lower bench. 2. The same, upper bench. 3. Blue Chippewa. 4. Fulton Mining Company. 5. Burton's coal, lower bench. 6. Same, upper bench (thin and slaty).

Some doubt has been expressed among the residents of Massillon whether the coal that crops out at Bridgeport is identical with that worked elsewhere in this vicinity. It is thinner, and lies somewhat higher than that in most of the neighboring mines. Still, its physical character and composition, as well as its relation to the associated rocks, seem to prove that it is really Coal No. 1. A similar phase of the Massillon coal is seen in the mine of the German Coal Company, just north of the stone quarry of Warthorst & Co., at Massillon. Here, also, the coal is thin, very much laminated, and even somewhat slaty. This peculiarity of structure may be attributed to the fact that the coal seam in these two mines is overlain by a great mass of sandstone, which, when all the materials were in a soft and plastic condition, must have pressed down upon the coal in such a way as to reduce its thickness and give it its laminated structure. Borings made in the vicinity of Bridgeport and Massillon have failed to find any lower seam, and it is scarcely possible that there should be another below that mined. The section at Bridgeport is precisely what it should be if the Bridgeport coal were Coal No. 1.

The diminished thickness of the coal in the Bridgeport and German Companies' mines may be due to another cause, i. e., as well in the bottom of the marsh, where the coal accumulated as peat, and on which, being relatively high, the peat was thin. It is well known that the “swamps,” or lowest portions of the coal mines, have the thickest coal in them, and this is simply because the peat was deep-seated there. On the ridges or swells of the bottom, the coal is thin and high, because the top only of the peat-bed reached over them. The barren ridges which so often separate the coal “swamps” were islands in, or the shores of the coal marshes. These rose above the water-level, and on their slopes the peat diminished in thickness upward till it came to an edge. When covered with clay and sand, and compressed to solid coal, that was thickest where the peat was thickest in the bottoms of the basins, and thinned out to nothing on the slopes which bounded these basins.

The Massillon coal is usually overlain by a few feet of shale, and above this is found a massive sandstone, which is known as the Massillon sandstone. The stone of this stratum varies considerably in texture in different localities and different layers, but much of it affords very excellent building material, as well as good grindstone. In these, a large and active industry has been created about Massillon, Warthorst & Co. giving employment to 100 men, and shipping 300 and 400 car-loads of block-stones, and 1,500 to 2,000 tons of grindstones per annum. The product of this quarry is mainly sold in Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Baltimore. The stones for dry grinding—plows and springs, etc.—are especially esteemed. In Paul's quarries, near Fulton, a light variety of this stone is ground up, and the sand shipped to Pittsburgh for the manufacture of glass.

In many parts of Stark County, borings have indicated the existence of a thin seam of coal above the massive Massillon sandstone, and it is sometimes referred to by drillers as the "Fifteen-inch Seam," but it is oftener from six to twelve inches. Though persistent over a large area, it has rarely any economic value, and deserves notice simply as a tolerably constant feature in the section, and one that is liable to be mistaken for the lower coal. The distance which separates it from the Massillon seam is quite inconstant, and varies from sixty to one hundred feet. In another county, this seam becomes of workable thickness, and it has therefore been named in the reports as Coal No. 2. Another thin coal-seam is also sometimes found immediately beneath the Massillon sandstone, but this is frequently cut away by the forces which deposited this rock. It may be seen, however, at several of the quarries in the vicinity of Massillon.

At a distance of from 150 to 200 feet above Coal No. 1, occurs the lowest of the two limestone seams which traverse this as they do many other, of our coal-bearing counties. In Stark County, Coal No. 3 is sometimes absent, sometimes has a thickness of a few inches, and rarely becomes of any economic importance. From twenty-five to fifty feet above it occurs the second limestone coal (Coal No. 4). This is well developed in Stark County, and in some cases has considerable value. In the subterranean, rocky ridge, which lies between the valley of the Tuscarawas and the old channel west of Canton, both the limestones referred to, and sometimes both limestone coals, may be seen, the upper one only being of workable thickness. Coal No. 5 lies usually about fifty feet above the gray limestone over Coal No. 4. As a general rule, in Stark County it is two and a half to three feet in thickness, and has much less value than in Tuscarawas County, where it is sometimes four feet thick and of superior quality. West of Navarre, Coal No. 5 has been opened in several places, and is about three feet thick—a soft coking coal, of fair quality. In Pike Township, this coal is found on both sides of the Nimishillen, somewhat back from the stream, here, as at Mineral Point, holding its normal position about midway between Coals No. 4 and 6. It is in this region, known as the "Thirty-inch Seam," and the coal it furnishes is generally good. Toward the south, this seam attains its best development at Mineral Point, in the adjacent county.

Typical exposures of Coal No. 5 may be seen at the mine of David Miller, in Section 12, Canton Township, three miles east of the city of Canton, and in several other openings made in this seam south of this point. The coal in Miller's mine is twenty-eight to thirty inches thick, overlain by gray shale, with its characteristic deposit of nodular iron ore. The coal is bright and good, more free from sulphur than that of the seam below, more open-burning than the next higher seam (No. 6), which is so extensively mined in Osnaburg Township. In that part of the county lying south and east of Canton Township, the higher hills reach up to the Bowen Coal Measures, and the black-band ore, which lies over Coal No. 7, occurs in some of the hilltops of Osnaburg and Paris. Coal No. 6 is here the principal seam worked. This generally lies conveniently above drainage in the valleys of Osnaburg and Paris, while in the lower part of these valleys, which are traversed by streams draining into the Sandy, Coal No. 5 is exposed in numerous localities as far up the Sandy as Minerva, and it is opened on many farms for local uses. In the very bottoms of these valleys, in a few places, Coal No. 4, with its overlying Putnam Hill limestone, is reached, but it is scarcely worked, except along the Sandy. In Nimishillen and Washington Townships, as the land is high, Coal No. 5 is generally buried beneath the surface. In Lexington Township, however, on the north side of the divide, the tributaries of the Mahoning have opened the lower coals freely, and, at Alliance, Coal No. 5 lies ten feet below the station (500 feet above Lake Erie), and is worked in a shaft thirty-one feet deep, in the western part of the village. The coal is here three and a half to four feet in thickness, of fairly good quality, but, from the want of cover, rather soft, and contains considerable sulphur.

Coal No. 6 lies some fifty feet above Coal No. 5, or from eighty to one hundred feet above the upper of the two lower limestones, and is one of the most important and widespread coal seams in the State. It is the "Big Vein" of Columbiana County, the shaft coal at Steubenville, the most important seam of Holmes, Tuscarawas and Coshocton Counties, and is also the "Great Vein" of the Hocking Valley district. In Stark County, it runs through all the hills east and south of Canton. It is the coal mined at several of the mines in Osnaburg, and is thence transported for blacksmiths' use to all parts of the county. In this region, it varies from four to six feet in thickness, and crops out and is worked in numerous localities in Osnaburg and Mapleton. Passing thence southward, it loses in thickness and importance, until, in the edge of Tuscarawas County, it becomes less valuable than the next lower seam. At Waynesburg it appears well, and then reaches around through the highlands of Paris and Washington into Columbiana County, retaining its volume and value all the way to the State line. At New Franklin, in Paris, it shows a seam five feet ten inches thick, with the usual slate parting eighteen inches above the bottom. It extends from this point northward, through Washington, as far as Alliance, but becomes thinner in this direction. In all parts of Stark County, Coal No. 6 is a coking coal, generally of good thickness, and capable of affording an excellent fuel for blacksmiths' use or the generation of steam. When coked, it may be used for iron-smelting. It sometimes contains considerable sulphur, but this may, however, be eliminated by washing. In the southern tier of townships—Sugar Creek, Bethlehem, Pike and Sandy—Coal No. 6 is found in most of the higher hills. It is, however, in this region, thinner and less pure than in the southeastern portion of the county. Its best development seems to be in Osnaburg and Paris. It here lies for the most part, conveniently above drainage, is from four to six feet in thickness, with a slate parting from twelve to twenty inches above the bottom. The coal of the lower bench is much purer than that of the upper, and is the portion so much esteemed for blacksmiths' use. From the large area it occupies, its thickness and its adaptation to manufacturing purposes, this coal holds a prominent place in the mineral resources of the county, and forms a capital which will doubtless be largely drawn upon in the development of various industries.

Coal No. 7 is the highest of the lower coal group, and no workable coal is found above it in this section of the State. In the counties lying south and east of Stark, where the members of the upper coal series are represented, Coal No. 7 is overlain by a mass, some 400 feet in thickness, of shales and sandstones, the former frequently colored red, which contain little coal, and hence are called the Barren Coal Measures. The highest hills in Stark County are composed of the lowest portion of this series, generally a mass of gray shale, with more or less sandstone. The hill-tops on both sides of the valley of the Sandy have this character, and it is only here that Coal No. 7 is found. In this region it is a thin seam, from one and a half to two and a half feet thick, and the coal is of inferior quality, so that in Stark County it has no considerable value. It becomes, however, of much greater consequence in the counties which lie further south.

The chief interest which attaches to Coal No. 7 in Stark County comes from the fact of its association with the black-band ore which overlies it. This is a bituminous shale, highly impregnated with iron. It often, though not constantly, forms the roof of Coal No. 7, and, where present, attains a thickness of from three to eight feet. The black-band ore is generally, though not always overlain by a ferruginous limestone, in which the quantity of iron is sometimes sufficient to render it a calcareous iron ore. From the fact that this is only found in the tops of the hills, it is sometimes designated as the mountain ore; and the limestone, from its ferruginous character, assumes, on weathering, a brownish color, and hence is often referred to as the "buff" limestone, to distinguish it from the blue limestone below. These ore-beds are detached outlyers of a great ferruginous sheet, which once covered much of Stark and Carroll, and all of Tuscarawas County. Patches of this ore sheet, separated from their connections by the erosion of the valleys of the Sandy, Connotton and Tuscarawas, occur in the isolated hills of Osnaburg and Paris, the only portions of the county geologically high enough to include them. Such being the geological position of this important formation, it cannot be expected to be found in any other portion of the county.

With such natural resources, it follows that the manufacturing interests should be rapidly developed, and this result has followed building of the thriving manufacturing and mining communities of Canton and Massillon. But Stark is no less favored in point of purely agricultural resources. The varied productiveness of the soil with which it is provided, has made it one of the chief wheat and fruit producing counties in the State, and enables its agriculture to divide the domain with manufactures.

The first settlers here found a country thickly covered with a heavy growth of timber, and the land, shielded from the piercing rays of the sun by the dense forest foliage, saturated with the moisture which the character of a large part of the country favored. To erect here a home, and render the land subject to an annual tribute for the support of his family, tasked the powers of the pioneers to their utmost. It was an even-handed struggle for subsistence, and anything accomplished might safely be set down as an improvement. This was practically true for the first twenty years in the history of a settlement. An average of five years was consumed before the frontier farm could be relied upon to furnish support, and, in the meantime, the fare furnished by the abundance of game and wild fruit was eked out with economical purchases of corn and wheat from the older settlements. After erecting a cabin, with the aid of hospitable neighbors, from five to ten acres were felled. This was then "chopped over," i. e., the trees were cut into suitable lengths for rolling into piles for burning. After the universal bee for rolling came the burning, which frequently engaged the services of the wife in attending the fire, while the husband chopped by the light thus afforded, carrying on their labors often to the small hours of the night. On a single farm, this much was frequently accomplished in three months, and a small crop of corn harvested in the first year; but the average results were not so favorable. The efforts of the settler were directed toward getting ready for the "bee" as early as possible, for when the "rolling season" began, there was an uninterrupted demand upon the settler for from six to eight weeks in the fields of his neighbors. Many were called upon when they could least afford the time, but, from the necessities of the situation, there was no refusal possible, and, large as this demand appears, it will not be considered exorbitant when it is remembered that a "neighborhood" covered an area of miles in extent. With such an abundance of timber and the total lack of foreign demand, the prevailing tendency is to underrate the value of timber, and to carry the work of clearing to the very verge of denuding the land of this important aid to agriculture. This tendency seems to have been quite marked in Stark County. There was quite an extent of plains in the county, known for some time as "Canton Plains," running through the townships of Jackson, Perry, Canton and Bethlehem. This plain country was avoided by the early settlers, as it did not meet their judgment as to what a pioneer farm should be, and the earlier settlements were made in the wood. The county but partially supplied with timber at first, the rapid clearing of the remaining forest was soon sensibly felt. The discovery of coal, and its use as fuel as early as 1806, in great measure relieved the later demand on the timber. Ten years later, coal began to be used as the principal article of fuel in the villages, and since then its use has gradually extended, until but comparatively little wood is used. The building of railroads, and the consequent accessibility to the pine forests, has relieved another strain upon the timber of the county which began to be seriously felt. The revolution in the style of building has done much in this direction, and but comparatively little of the native timber finds its way into the modern dwelling. There are, however, sufficient demands, for the various manufactures, mines and railroads, to beget serious apprehension as to where the later supply is to be secured.

The prevailing system of agriculture in this county may properly be termed that of mixed husbandry, with a special prominence given to the culture of wheat. Specialties otherwise find little favor with the farmers. The practice is to cultivate the various kinds of grain and grasses, and to raise, keep and fatten stock—the latter business, however, being a leading pursuit of not a large proportion of the farmers. The early mode of cultivating the farming lands was not of the highest type. Provided with productive soil, and his father having made a fair support in a certain line of farming, the average farmer has not had the opportunity, or has not felt the need, of studying the principles of such branches of learning as relate to agriculture, and has hesitated to receive, or promptly rejected, the teachings of science. A few persons, however, were found at a comparatively early day who brought to the business of farming that amount of patient investigation which the greatest industry of this country demands, and farmers have become less and less unwilling to learn from others. This has had its effect upon the husbandry of the county, which has attained a commendable thoroughness, and is rapidly improving in every respect.

The soil is considerably diversified. About three-fourths of the county, including the eastern, southern and western portions, may be called clay and gravel soil; the northeastern portion, more level, is furnished with a heavy subsoil of clay, while the valley of the Sandy has a soil of sandy loam, which proves highly productive. The surface soil of the whole county is composed of vegetable mold. On the rolling or hilly portions of the county, this soil is thin and light, owing, doubtless, to the washing of rains. On the lower and more level portions, this surface soil is found deeper, and, in valleys or bottom lands, it varies from a few inches to several feet in depth.

The depth of this soil, other things being equal, is a fair showing of the value of the land. Clay underlies this surface soil throughout almost the entire county, and varies in thickness from a few inches to two feet; is generally of a pale yellow color, and affords abundant material for brick-making. It absorbs water slowly, and is too compact for the roots of tender plants to penetrate to any great depth, and yet this dull clay is the basis of Stark County's agricultural wealth. Resting upon a substratum of gravel, it holds no more water than is necessary for healthy vegetation, and yet prevents the surface soil from sinking away into the gravel; holds manures which are applied to the land, which, when plowed under with clay, forms the most productive soil.

The subject of fertilizers has received considerable attention from the farmers, and plaster is freely used upon corn and clover. Lime is not much used, save occasionally to old, worn-out fields, which have run into sour grass, and is then applied only when slaked. There have, however, been some experiments made of spreading it unslaked and plowing it under, with satisfactory results. Phosphates have come into limited use of late years, but only as an experiment, and the general voice is that it does not "pay." Nor are any artificial means used to increase the barn-yard supply, which is not unfrequently treated as a serious inconvenience rather than a fortunate possession of the farmer. The constant cropping of a field for a considerable number of years without renewing is not often met with in Stark County. Occasional fields on the river bottoms are found which will bear such treatment and give good returns, but they are very limited in number. Rotation of crops has been the rule with the average farmer for some years, corn being the first crop planted on sod ground, followed by barley or oats, and then wheat; the latter is sometimes sown directly after corn. In the ordinary rotation of crops, the manure is generally applied to the wheat crop, as it is thought it is more effectively applied here, and leaves a better soil for the grass which follows. Deep plowing, with the Michigan double plow, was practiced to a considerable extent some twenty-five years ago, with variable results. It afterward fell into disrepute on account of its heavy draft, or from the fact that the upper soil was buried so deep that several seasons were required to effect the proper mixture of the soils. Later, another system was adopted, with satisfactory effects. Two plows were used, and the team divided between them. A shallow soil-plow turned over the surface, which was followed by a long steel plow without a turning-board. The latter simply raised and loosened the subsoil to a depth of twelve or fifteen inches, and upon this the top soil was turned by a lighter implement. This proved a vast improvement on the old plan, furnishing the requisite depth without burying the upper soil, and loosening the subsoil, thus furnishing a natural escape for the excessive moisture which the character of the hard-pan too often resists, allowing it to escape only by evaporation. The practice of subsoiling is still kept up in the northeastern portion of the county, where the subsoil is a cold, dark-colored clay, impervious to water. It was originally a beech forest, but, cleared and cultivated, it has proven excellent pasturage, and, when deeply plowed, fine corn, oats, rye, flax and vegetables, are easily produced. This manner of plowing is found necessary about every three years.

Artificial drainage has not been extensively used. A large portion of the county is high, rolling country, with a natural drainage, that has served the purpose of carrying off the surplus water. In the northern part, there is quite a marsh, known as Cranberry Swamp, a portion of the waters of which flows north to the lake, but the larger portion runs south to the Ohio River. Nearly all the streams run southward, the Tuscarawas River, in the western part of the county, being the largest. The Nimishillen Creek is the next largest stream, which, with its western and eastern branches, drains the northern and northeastern portions of the county, and afford many fine mill-sites. The Sandy is a fine stream in the eastern portion of the county. There has been but little underdraining in this county, except to draw off the water of the ponds and swamps. This has been done to some extent with tile, but generally by ditching and filling the ditch with bowlders, and then covering up with rubbish and dirt. Tile-draining, as a general thing, is looked upon simply as a means of carrying off the surface water, and but little account is made of it as a means of improving the character of the soil.

The grass crop, while not demanding the same attention as other crops, is one that must always prove important. No regular system has been adopted in regard to its cultivation, however, in Stark County. A kind of spear-grass and white clover are indigenous to the soil, covering the common and soon spreading over any cleared and uncultivated land, making a fair pasturage, but proving too short for a good hay crop. Timothy grass, with clover, is mainly relied upon for the supply of hay, meadows being turned over about once in five years. Meadows are pastured to some extent in the fall, but are seldom "turned out" for this purpose, grass lands being seeded for the especial purpose for which they are designed. Meadows are seldom underdrained, and have generally received very little attention in the way of top-dressing, the manure being generally applied to the wheat crop, which preceded the seeding down. Orchard and blue grass have been introduced to a limited extent of late years, but they have not found favor among the farmers. There is considerable hesitation manifested in experimenting with the blue-grass, as it is claimed by many—among them some scientific agriculturists—that the June-grass, poa pratensis, is the same thing, modified by difference of soil and climate. Clover is sown in large quantities throughout the county. It is found most successful upon the uplands, but it does reasonably, with plaster, on all grounds. This is generally mown the first and second years for hay, and the third year, when full-grown, is plowed under for wheat or corn the next spring. It is usually sown with timothy for meadow, the latter being sown in the fall, and the clover with the growing wheat in the spring. The yield, when mown, varies from one and a half to two and a half tons per acre. This combination constitutes the chief part of the pasturage, and is in high favor with farmers.

While the survey of the agriculture of Stark County does not exhibit the cultivation of any specialty, it will be observed that wheat-culture and sheep-raising have, from the first, occupied the larger share of attention. But, while this is true, these objects have not absorbed the activities of the farmers to the exclusion of other branches of farm industry. The aim of the earliest settlers, with their lands as their only resource, was to derive from these a complete support, and, to this end, a system of mixed husbandry was a necessity. Their descendants, hedged about by the results of experience, and aiming to sell their surplus products in such form as would take from the land the smallest amount of its fertility, have, from the nature of the case, followed in their footsteps.

The early settlers were principally of German descent, from Pennsylvania, and brought with them a strong preference for wheat-raising, and the county soon took the leading place as a wheat county. In the early culture of wheat, a great many discouragements were met. The weevil and rust destroyed it year after year, and, when it escaped these, the frost worked great damage. But perseverance and improved methods have wrought a great success in the culture of this grain, and it is now the leading crop in the county. There is trouble experienced from insects, but frosts have proved disastrous occasionally. The Todd wheat has been a favorite variety with the farmers of late years, though the Mediterranean for a long time held sway. This was found the most favorable, and less liable to be injured by insects and frosts. The greatest objection to this was its long, dark grain, but little superior to rye; but the effect of soil and climate greatly improved its qualities, and it soon grew a plump, fair grain, strong in straw and quite a favorite for bread, and has not yet entirely lost its hold in the farming community. There is a great diversity in the practice and opinions of farmers in regard to the cultivation of this grain, and no particular system has been adopted. The prevailing method is not to sow wheat on the same field oftener than once in three years, and then only when, for two years, it shall have been in clover. It does well to follow barley or oats with wheat or rye, but it is considered bad farming to have wheat or corn follow each other. Wheat, in early years, was sown among the standing corn, and later, between the shocks that were placed in rows through the field, and the spaces thus left put in oats on the following spring. The latter method is occasionally practiced yet, but generally an oat crop intervenes. Manure is generally spread in the spring, and plowed under in the fall for wheat. The ground is carefully prepared, and the seed generally drilled in. The breadth of land sown is pretty uniform, though discouraging crops have the effect to limit somewhat the acreage devoted to it. The grain is usually threshed in the barn, the machine worked by the portable steam engine manufactured in this county, being the favorite, and largely used. For some years, Stark led the counties of the State in the yield of this grain, but its dismemberment by the formation of Carroll and Summit, together with the ravages of insects and frost, has reduced the yield one-half.

Rye and barley are not extensively cultivated. Rye is marketed entirely at home, both the black and white varieties being sown. The first, however, though good for feed and distilling, has rapidly given way to the white, which is not inferior for these purposes, and makes a whiter flour. Spring barley, some years since, was quite an important crop, not only on account of its marketable value, but also because it leaves the ground in fine condition for wheat. The average crop is about twenty-five bushels per acre. Under the revolutionizing effect of the Great West, however, these grains are gradually losing favor here, and are no longer cultivated to any considerable extent. Buckwheat is very little cultivated for home consumption, and scarcely enough for that. Oats is quite an important crop, though what is raised is barely sufficient for home consumption. There are three varieties cultivated to more or less extent—side oats, branch oats and black oats, the latter being now seldom seen. The side oats weigh more to the bushel, but are not so prolific as the branch oats. The average yield is about fifty bushels to the acre. This is a reasonably sure crop, and, though occasionally injured by the blight, it is relied upon with considerable confidence for home use. Rust has at times proved a serious drawback to the raising of this crop, and a late frost occasionally ruins the crop, but these have not been troublesome of late years.

The corn crop, while not grown to the exclusion of the others, is the one on which the farmers of Stark County most confidently rely, and the land devoted to its culture is only limited by the necessities of the situation. It is far more stable in its yield, less liable to disease, and may be slighted in its cultivation with greater impunity than any other crop. The soft varieties of seed are generally preferred, and are usually planted on sod ground. It is usually well put in the ground, being prepared with considerable care, and worked until it "tassels out." The old rule of "going through" the field a certain number of times before "laying by" the crop, has long since been abandoned by the better farmers. The last plowing, after the corn has reached the height of five or six feet, is considered the most effective in its cultivation, but the exigencies of the season often prevent the farmer bestowing this crowning attention. The farms, many of them small, are worked by the owner alone, and the clover and wheat cutting coming close together, frequently obliges the small farmer to slight his corn. When, however, the farmer is able to hire help, or has boys who can be trusted to do the work, the plow is kept going through the corn, an expense which is amply paid by the increased yield. The crop is cut and husked in the field, the corn being stored in cribs. The habit of husking from the standing stock is also practiced, though it is generally conceded to be a wasteful method of harvesting this crop. Corn is sown broadcast for forage to a considerable extent.

The other crops that occupy, or have occupied, a more or less prominent place among the agricultural products of the county, are potatoes and sorghum. The quality of the soil is well adapted to the raising of potatoes, and farmers who have given considerable attention to the proper cultivation of this highly prized and indispensable esculent, have always been well rewarded for their labor and painstaking. It is a staple vegetable, universally used, always commands a fair price, and its general cultivation for exportation would undoubtedly prove highly remunerative. This fact seems to have made no impression upon the farmers, as no more are produced than are used at home. The leading variety is the early rose, with the peach-blow and peerless cultivated in considerable quantities. The Neshannock is highly prized by many, while other varieties are being cultivated as experiments, or to suit individual tastes. The average yield of this crop is good, and is not often seriously affected by disease or insects.

Sorghum was, in Stark County, an exception to the general rule. It was introduced here about 1857, but most of the farmers conceived a dislike to it. It was planted in small quantities by a good many, but it was allowed to pass without any particular care, and many never harvested it at all. Two or three mills were bought, but comparatively little molasses was manufactured. The first product, owing to the lack of interest and information, and the carelessness with which it was manufactured, was sorry stuff. This result reacted with discouraging effect upon the producers. Another cause which contributed to this result was the exercise of a ruinous economy on the part of the mass of the farmers. Instead of purchasing new seed and sparing no pains to make a fair trial of this new crop, the majority of those who planted a second crop procured seed of their neighbors, and allowed the farm work to seriously interfere with the cultivation of the cane. The result was that it deteriorated in quantity and quality, and the whole thing was voted a failure. No great effort was made to produce sugar, as the expense proved an insurmountable barrier to its successful prosecution.

Tobacco is cultivated here and there by individuals, for the private use of the producer, and it may well be hoped that its culture may not be further extended. It is an exacting crop upon the land, and, sooner or later, the exhaustive process will ultimately work the deterioration of any neighborhood or farming district where its culture is a prominent part of the farming operations.

The forests of Stark County are well supplied with the sugar maple, and farmers have not been slow to utilize them in the way of making sugar. It was the practice, at an early date, to manufacture this product in grain sugar, as it proved more available for the uses of the household, but of late years it has found a more valuable market in cakes and as sirup.

A survey of this branch of Stark County's agriculture would hardly be complete without some reference to the late frosts of 1859 and 1845. The frost of 1859 came on a Saturday night in June. The previous night had brought a fall of rain, and on Saturday it cleared off with a cool atmosphere, which grew colder as night approached. In the morning, the "killing frost" had left scarcely a vestige of the growing crops alive. Corn was about eight or ten inches high, and potatoes had reached the growth that made the effect of frost most damaging. All grain was ruined, and the people found themselves face to face with "perilous times," if not starvation. The frost had been general over the State, and the situation was considered alarming. Some time was lost in unavailing regrets, and some crops that might have been saved by prompt cutting off even with the ground were lost by delay. Fortunately, there were some late crops that had not come forward enough to become involved in the general disaster, and others were saved by favorable locations. The less fortunate farmers set at once to repair the misfortune so far as possible. The corn and potatoes were replanted, buckwheat was sowed in the place of wheat, and, thanks to an unusually long season, these crops were fairly matured. There was a large proportion of soft corn, hundreds of bushels of which proved almost a complete loss.

Fruit culture has, from the first, occupied a prominent place in the care and attention of the farmers, so that Stark is now the leading county for fruit in the State. As early as 1806, orchards were set out and considerable care given to their culture. In this year, Rev. Mr. Gans, of Lexington, had an orchard; Valentine Weaver, in Plain, had an orchard raised from seed at the same time; James Gaff, two miles north of Canton, followed in 1808, as well as Simon Essig and Frederick Stump; Jacob Shanabager started an orchard on the farm of J. Harmer in 1806 and 1807. Considerable care was exercised in the selection of varieties and in cultivating the trees, and among some of the early varieties were some which still find a large number of cultivators. Among these may be mentioned the Pennock, Blair, New Town Pippin, Vandever, Romanite, Roman Stem, Spitzenberg, Bell Flower, French Pippin, etc. During the first years, apples were a great luxury, and found a ready sale when brought into the settlements from the older communities. They were brought in from Steubenville as early as 1809, and were among the regular order of things on training days. On these occasions, the wagon-loads of apples were hailed with as much enthusiasm as the loads of water-melons at a fair in these later days, and were rapidly sold at a shilling a dozen. Among the early varieties, the Blair, though a small apple, was a prime favorite, and was readily sold at $1 per barrel. The Romanite was especially marked as an excellent keeper, and was in good demand.

Stark is well situated for a fruit country. It is particularly free from frost-killing, and, with a little more of the iron element in the soil, would be the ideal location for fruit-growing. The natural hindrances to this branch of farm industry, by intelligent experiment and careful husbandry, have been so far overcome that much of the best fruit of the country is produced here in excellent quality and profitable quantity. Among the leading modern varieties may be mentioned the Baldwin, Bell Flower, Vandever, Red Canada, Wells Apple, Ohio Nonpareil, and King. The last-named, known by many as "King of Tompkins County," is a great favorite. It is a fine, large apple, some of the fruit measuring fourteen and a half inches in circumference, and at the same time retaining a fine flavor and smooth texture. The demand here is not, however, for a large apple. They are found more liable to rot, with a consequent greater loss, than in the case of a smaller apple; fruit-growers find the loss from dropping from the tree greater, and, as the larger part of the picked fruit is marketed in the county, the various demands of the domestic economy are better served with fruit of medium size. The apple is the hardiest fruit in this locality, and there are probably more acres in apple orchards than in all other fruits combined. The extensive cultivation of apples in orchards, however, has been of comparatively recent effort. Most of the surplus crop finds a market in Germany, and is dried for shipment. The recently improved evaporators are used on most of the farms, which save time and give a better color to the fruit, enhancing the market value of the dried product 100 per cent.

Peaches are not so successful in this county. They were grown here as early as 1809, and were at first as prosperous, perhaps, as apples, but succeeding years have wrought such climatic changes that there is a good crop hardly more than once in five years. There is an exception, perhaps, to this rule, in the case of Sandy and Pike Townships, where the great bulk of the peach crop of this county is produced. The peach-tree is found to mature too early, and consequently to rapidly decline, the average life of a tree not reaching more than ten years. The leading varieties are the early and late Crawfords, which, in the particular localities mentioned, produce reasonable results. There is, however, no disposition to surrender the cultivation of this fruit entirely. Fresh trees are being planted, careful investigations are being made, and it is hoped that the present obstacles will be overcome.

Pears were found in this county at an early date, the first being cultivated on Adam Oberlin's place, on the Fulton road. Stark takes the third place in the State in the growth of this fruit, and many orchards of considerable size are devoted to it. The Bartlett, Flemish Beauty, Siecle, White Doyen, etc., are the leading varieties. The tendency to blight, which the pear-tree shows here as elsewhere in Ohio, has caused considerable loss in the culture of this fruit, but a remedy has been found which, it is thought, will effectually prevent it. This is the application of salt to the ground about the tree. The theory of this remedy has not been explained, but, so far as experiments have been made, its success seems to be demonstrated.

Cherries of the hardier sort are found to do pretty well, though, as it is a fruit into which iron enters more than any other, the soil here is found the best adapted to the highest success in the cultivation of this fruit. The various kinds of English Morellos are the only kinds grown to any extent, and, though needing considerable attention, they produce a fair return. They are seldom injured by frost, and are planted in considerable numbers. The history of the plum-tree here is that of this fruit in most parts of the State. It is a natural plum country, and, until about 1845, it was the surest fruit in this section; but about this time, the curculio came in, and has taken the fruit regularly ever since. Occasionally a fair product is got from a single tree, by a lavish outlay of time and pains, but the result does not warrant the expense needed to secure it.

The number of large towns, with their large proportion of mechanic population, found in the county, has of late years given a marked impetus to the cultivation of small fruits and vegetables. Strawberries, raspberries and blackberries of the improved varieties are largely cultivated, and find a ready sale at fair prices in the different towns. There is no surplus for exportation or for wine-making, and little of either is done in Stark. Grapes are found to flourish here scarcely second to any other place in the State. The Concord, Delaware, Lady and Agawain are the leading varieties. The Isabella is not grown, and the Ionia and Catawba are unsuited to this location, the early frost of autumn preventing their maturing. These also find a ready market in the various towns, and are not made into wine at all.

Of late years, the interest and profit in the cultivation of vegetables for the home market has shown a marked increase. Last year, a considerable "annex" was built by the agricultural society to accommodate the display of exhibits in this class.

This success in fruit-growing is doubtless to be referred not less to the intelligence with which the subject has been studied, than to the natural advantages of the soil. An outgrowth of the interest in this subject was the organization of the Horticultural Society, October 11, 1878, by such gentlemen as J. K. Neisz, Levi Stump, Andrew Pontius, Lewis Essig, H. W. Firestone, J. F. Neisz, W. W. Reed and others. This society has its meetings monthly, at the residences of its various members, and has accomplished a great deal for the fruit-growers of the county. Experiments are constantly being made, which are fully discussed at their meetings, and the value of these discussions is being felt and acted upon by the mass of farmers.

In the matter of stock-breeding, there is a very general interest, though the number of those who make it a specialty, or a leading feature of their farm industry, is small. Probably less than one-tenth can be placed in this class, though among these may be included many of the wealthier farmers. Among this portion of the farming community, a persevering, patient, investigating spirit has been manifested, that has accomplished large results for the stock of the county. No class of stock has been slighted in this respect, though perhaps horses and sheep have profited most.

It is quite natural that the early history of the horse in Stark County should be somewhat obscure. In the early settlement, the nature of farm work called for the steady strength, the freedom from accident and the easy keeping of the ox, and horses found no general demand until the pioneers could afford the luxury of speed in travel. It was not long before this demand made a marked change in the character of the teams, which has continued until now one would scarcely meet with an ox team in a month's travel through the county. The early stock of horses were such as could be bought in the older settlements, and were marked by no particular characteristic of breed or quality. The only demand was for the ordinary purposes of the farm, and the people were not only not in a position to "look a gift horse in the mouth," but were quite as powerless to be fastidious in regard to any horse. Among the earliest efforts to improve upon this stock was the importation of a horse known as "Merry Andrew," from Virginia, and which was reputed to be a thoroughbred animal. The old settlers, who remember his appearance, agree that his equal has not since been in the county. He was imported in 1825, by Dr. Simmonds. Henry Barber, who was a devoted lover of fine horses, had at this time a fine imported mare, of good blood, and from these two animals some excellent stock was raised, which gave the first impetus to an effort to improve the grade of horses. About 1832, John Meyers brought into the county a fine chestnut-sorrel stallion, called "Windflower." He was a good-blooded horse, of fine parts and splendid action, and left a marked impress upon the stock of the county. He sired a great many colts, and his blood can be traced in the fine appearance and action of many of the best horses yet to be found in the county. In 1849, "Napoleon Morgan" was brought from the East, and first introduced this strain in the county. His trotting qualities, fine action and splendid appearance gave him a popularity, and for several years the Morgan strain was in high favor. "Green Mountain," a dark brown horse, was brought here in 1859, and was the sire of a number of valuable horses. The natural tastes of the people who settled this county, however, did not lead them to prefer this class of horses, and in a few years the demand veered around to those of heavier proportions. This led to the introduction of the English draft horses, "Scotch Clyde" and "Plow Boy." This class of horses are of Scottish descent, of the largest size, averaging from sixteen to eighteen hands high, with ponderous bodies, stout limbs, hairy at the fetlocks, of high and noble carriage, and unsurpassed in weight and strength. They occasionally reached a weight of seventeen and even eighteen hundred pounds. Of late years, the Norman, though not bred here, has been brought in from neighboring counties, and are largely used in the extensive teaming business which the mining and manufacturing interests support. They are natives of France, and embody more speed in action than the ordinary draft horse, together with great strength of limb and power of locomotion. Their average size is from sixteen to seventeen hands high, compact in body, symmetrical in shape, clean in limb and enduring in labor. Their color is a fine silver gray, the best adapted to withstand the burning rays of the sun in the field or on the highway. Other horses that have contributed to the present status of the horses in Stark County are "Chilton," "Timoleon," "Tuckahoe," and the Messenger strain. Both carriage and draft horses are well represented in the county, and a marked improvement has been going on for the past twenty years.

The introduction of cattle into the county was as early as the coming of the first settler. Cows were a necessary part of the pioneer's outfit, without which his chances for obtaining a reasonably comfortable existence were very poor indeed, and few families were without them. But, once here, it required all the care and diligence of the settler to protect them against the ravages of wild beasts and disease. Wolves were not so dangerous to cattle as in many places, but now and then a yearling or calf was sacrificed to their voracious appetites. The murrain, a little later, took off scores of these animals, entailing considerable privation before they could be replaced. Then the marshes and the rank vegetation took their quota, so that, in spite of the employment of all the available children in the settlement as herders, and the dosing of cattle with alum, soot and soft soap, hundreds fell victims to the snares of a new country. Under such circumstances, the effort was narrowed down to a struggle to maintain, rather than improve, the breed. The short-horn Durhams were probably the first introduced. These cattle were introduced into Ohio from Kentucky at first, but, in 1834, the "Ohio Importing Company" was formed to import short-horn Durhams from England. Seven bulls and twelve cows, nineteen in all, were imported, and exhibited the following year at the State Fair. This company subsequently increased the number of their importation to thirty head. In 1852, the "Scioto Importing Company" imported sixteen head, and, in the following year, a similar company formed in Madison County, imported twenty-two head. In 1854, similar companies were formed in Clinton and Clark Counties, by which some forty more animals were brought to the State. Amid all this activity in the improvement of stock, it is not to be expected that the enterprising people of this county should fail to profit by it. The Devons are also held in high esteem here. This is a strikingly distinct breed in form and quality, medium in size, uniformly red in color, and comely in appearance. This blood, or that which was closely allied to it, seems to have been imported into New England in the seventeenth century, and the native stock of that section has for many generations borne strong resemblances to this stock. The stock of the county has been greatly improved by the intermixture of these breeds, and it is estimated that at least three-fourths of the stock of cattle are more or less mixed with these breeds. Among those who have been identified with this movement are Edward Brook & Son, of Marlboro Township, John Shock, of Canton, and Thomas Chapman, of Bethlehem, with Durham stock; Benjamin Thompson, of Lake, Jonas Brougher, of Jackson, and H. Reynolds, of Canton, with Devon. The value of this stock over the native breed is plainly apparent in their keeping qualities, size, form, early maturity, increase of milk, and superior beef. It is claimed by the friends of these improved cattle that there has been an increase of one-third, at least, in the value of the cattle of the county by their introduction.

Sheep were introduced into Stark County almost as early as any stock. The first settlers seemed to have looked the ground all over, and to have prepared for an isolated existence in the woods. In these plans, sheep formed a conspicuous item, as the production of wool for the various articles of clothing seemed nearly indispensable. But the number and boldness of the wolves made sheep-raising a burden upon the frontier farmer, taxed as he was with the cares and anxieties of a "clearing," that he could ill afford, and many soon gave up the experiment. Others, however, persevered in spite of discouragements, and the county has probably not been without sheep since their first introduction, though the number has been very small at times. After the wolf had been exterminated under the influence of liberal bounties paid for their scalps, the dogs caused serious havoc among them, a farmer sometimes finding as many as twenty or thirty killed and wounded in a single night. It did not need any outside encouragement to wage a war of extermination upon these animals, and many a sheep-killing dog was summarily disposed of.

It is difficult to determine the characteristics of the early sheep. In 1816, Wells & Dickinson, large woollen manufacturers at Steubenville, had large flocks of Spanish merino sheep, derived from the Humphrey importations. These were pastured at this time on the Stark County plains, and were the talk of stock admirers of the State. In 1824, the failure of this firm caused these sheep to be scattered in small parcels all over the State, and they fell into the hands of many who cared more to improve on the common stock than to breed full-blooded animals. These sheep were characterized by a light carcass and fleece, though the latter was of fine texture and good fiber. American cultivation has done much to improve these original and subsequent importations, so that at this day no fine-wooled sheep in the world excel, and few equal, the American merinos in the heavy product of their fleeces, or the size and stamina of their bodies.

Previous to the Wells & Dickinson flock, about 1809, "Mr. Thomas Rotch, a member of the Society of Friends, emigrated from Connecticut to this county, and brought with him a small flock of merino sheep. They were good, and a few of them were of the flock imported by Col. Humphrey. At that early day he hoped, in twenty years' time, to see every farm in the county stocked with merinos. In this he partially succeeded, but a prejudice against the breed prevented them from becoming so general as he had anticipated."* To this statement Secretary Klippart adds a note to the effect "that his wife, Charity," frequently solicited from him a fund which might be invested for charitable or benevolent purposes. But he hesitated, until, one spring morning, he gave her two sick merino lambs, and told her that she might take them as "capital" for benevolent purposes; the noble-hearted wife thankfully accepted them, nursed them and cured them. With this, as foundation of a flock, she accumulated a sum which, in course of time, became sufficient to build and endow the "Kendall Charity School."

Many efforts have been subsequently made by farmers to improve the breeds, both native and those early imported. The Vermont merino, Cotswold and Liecester, have been introduced, but none have gained the suffrage of the whole county. The Dickinson merinos still hold their place with old wool-growers, while the younger portion of wool-growers prefer the Vermont sheep. There does not seem to be any middle ground on which the two classes can meet. It is claimed on the one part that the Vermont merinos require more care and attention than the Dickinson, and that the increased weight of the fleeces is caused entirely by a gummy grease peculiar to them. It is also claimed that they will not thrive in large flocks, and that, although the fiber may be longer, this advantage is more than counterbalanced by the other disadvantages. On the other hand, it is claimed for the Vermont sheep that they not only have a longer fiber, but finer wool, and that they will clip from half a pound to two pounds more clean wool. It has been suggested that a cross between the merino and Cotswold would make a better sheep for all purposes, but this experiment has not yet been fully tested.

Swine were the earliest and the most easily maintained of any stock on the frontier farms. No family was so poor as to be without them, and none were so rich as not to need them. In many parts of the county, they were allowed to run at large in the forest, gradually taking on the nature of the wild hog, which was found here by the first settlers. This breed of hogs was of thin flesh, large bones, thick skin and formidable tusks. They were wholly unfit for food, though the exigencies of pioneer life often made them the only resource. Their skin was used for tanning purposes, and furnished a very desirable leather for horse collars and other parts of the harness. The woods breed of hogs, however, has long since become extinct in this county, and, where it used to take two years to make a 200-pound hog, a 300 and 400-pound hog can be made in nine to twelve months. In these animals there are more evidences of improvement than in any other class of stock. The original breed was long in the body, long in the legs and long in the snout, famous for rooting and jumping fences, and were distinctly termed "land sharks." The "grass breed" and the Berkshires were introduced about the same time, and a cross between these produced a hog before which the native swine fast disappeared. The principal breeds which have been more or less introduced here are the Suffolk, Chester White and Berkshire. The latter, when first introduced, were a rough, coarse-boned animal, and were crossed with the "grass breed" and soon abandoned in their purity. A fine-boned Suffolk followed, but they were found as much in the one extreme as the early Berkshires had been in the other. A cross between these and the Chester White has produced a favorite animal with many. A later Berkshire, which answers the demands of the critic, has been introduced to some extent, but the Chester Whites and Suffolks are preferred, and a cross between these two are the great favorite in the county. They are noted for their rapid growth, fine form and fattening qualities.

In poultry, Stark County is perhaps second to no county in the State. About 1860, there was a marked interest taken in this branch of "farm stock," and several varieties of chickens were introduced, among which were the Game, Shanghai, Dorking, Brahma-Pootra and Black Spanish. The last-named is the only one that time has proved to be a considerable improvement. Many turkeys are raised, but no special effort has been made to improve the variety. The same may be said of geese and ducks. Guinea and pea fowls are found here and there, but they are raised more for appearance than for profit.

The Stark County Agricultural Society held its first fair on the 15th and 16th of October, 1850, and numbered at that time 235 members. The exhibition of stock was held on the south part of the grounds belonging to the Presbyterian Church, while the domestic and fruit display was made in two rooms of the West Tuscarawas Street Schoolhouse. The State Report of that year says in regard to this fair: "More than enough to pay all the expenses for diplomas, arranging grounds, erecting pens, providing feed, preparing rooms, paying hands, and all the printing bills, were procured by the committee from the citizens of Canton. The streets of Canton, during the whole time, were thronged with the members of the society, and with anxious and admiring spectators." After using this ground two years, the society bought twelve acres on the "Young farm," now in the Fourth Ward of the city. Here the grounds were inclosed, permanent buildings erected, and a track built. In the course of some eight or ten years, this was found to be too small, and a tract of land extending from Lawrence avenue to the Louisville road, in the north part of the city of Canton, was secured. Here a good half-mile track has been constructed, and good buildings. In 1866, a magnificent hall was erected, at a cost of about $6,400. The center is octagonal, eighty feet in diameter, surmounted with a dome ninety feet high. Wings extend north and south, 56x22 feet, each having recesses and a dome. In capacity and architectural beauty, it exceeded, it is said, anything of the kind in the State at that time. The exhibitions of the society continue to increase in interest, and considerable inconvenience is being felt at the lack of room, though the grounds cover some forty acres.

[NOTE.—The geological features of the foregoing chapter have been compiled from the State Report, and the agricultural part has been largely drawn from an essay by M. Reynolds, written in 1866.—Ed.]

CHAPTER II.*

THE EARLY INHABITANTS—PRE-HISTORIC OCCUPATION AND REMAINS OF STARK COUNTY—CLASSIFICATION OF EARTHWORKS—SKETCHES OF THE INDIAN TRIBES—STARK COUNTY INDIANS DURING THE BORDER WARS —INTERESTING INCIDENTS.

THE development of all the branches of natural science within the last half-century has been so colossal that a flood of light has been thrown upon numberless subjects, that before were either wholly or partially unknown. New fields of instruction have been opened to the race in every department of science, and a vast fund of information that touches the springs of human life, and widens and elevates the sphere of social usefulness, has been placed before every true philomathean for his improvement. One of the most baffling undertakings for the unpromising research of scientific men, is to clear up the mystery enveloping the origin and early stages of human life. That all earnest efforts looking to this result have signally and wholly failed, is not because millions in money have not been expended, nor because unremitting research of splendid intellects has not been turned in this direction; but is probably because the subject lies beyond the limits of the circle in which the mind of man must move. The sedulous endeavors to clear up the mystery have disclosed many circumstances connected with the early history of the human race that are of vast social value, and are regarded with universal interest throughout the earth. Many of the factors which combine to form the wonderful organism of society, many of the relations and forces compelling and controlling individual conduct, and many of the pre-existing, environing conditions, which metamorphose the laws governing social intercourse, have been revealed by the persistent labor of scientific men.

The general desire and inclination to sift all subjects of this character to the bottom, have led antiquarians to the study of the lives of the ancient people, now universally known as Mound-Builders. That a strange and semi-civilized people resided throughout all the country in times which antedate the Indians' occupancy of the soil is established by conclusive evidence, aside from the almost universal denial of the savage tribes of their having had any participation in the erection of the vast number of earthworks scattered throughout the continent. It is estimated that, in Ohio alone, there are 10,000 of these works, many of them being in a fair state of preservation. All that is known of this mysterious people has been discovered from the decaying remnants of their works; but their origin and final fate are enshrouded in hopeless obscurity. Some authorities have suggested that they ultimately deteriorated into the ancestors of the Indian tribes, though the majority of intelligent writers on the subject discourage such a view, and give evidence tending to show that an interval of many centuries elapsed between the reign of the two races. Others state the conviction that they were Mongolians, having reached the Western Continent by way of Behring's Strait. Various antiquarians have referred their origin to the Hebrews, Tartars, Persians, Celts, Egyptians, Toltecs, Aztecs and Peruvians; but in most cases the reference is largely speculative. From their works must be derived the solution of their modes of life; habits; customs; advancement in intelligence, morals, social intercourse, and the means of sustaining life; their degree of civilization; their knowledge of the arts of peace and war; their language, religion, and labor; and their final fate, whether by extinction through war, famine, or pestilence, or whether they became the ancestors of the succeeding Indian tribes. Although the pre-historic remains of Stark

County are few in number and comparatively uninteresting in detail; yet, since research has thrown so much light upon the subject, and aroused so much interest among scientists and lovers of science, a brief statement will here be given of the progress that has been made in this branch of archaeology.

The ancient earthworks, conceived to have been erected by the Mound-Builders, have been divided from the theory of their special uses into mounds, effigies and inclosures. Mounds are subdivided into sepulchral, sacrificial, templar, observative and memorial. Effigies are animal, emblematic, symbolical and religious. Inclosures are military, covered, sacred and festival. Earth was the usual material used in the construction of these works. Some are found built wholly of stone, and some of earth and stone in varying proportions. Sepulchral mounds are ordinarily conical in form, are of all sizes, varying in height from a foot to seventy feet, and are more numerous than any other class. Within them, and usually at the center of the base, there are always found bones, which sometimes are hard and sound, but usually are brittle or in a crumbled condition. The universal presence of human bones renders the view plausible, that these mounds were used as sepulchers. They always contain one or more skeletons, together with implements and ornaments, supposed to have been placed there when the individual was buried, for use in the Spirit Land. It is thought that the size of the mound bears some relation to the illustrious character of the person, in whose honor it was erected. Others infer from the quantity of bones often found in the larger ones, that they were the tombs of many individuals. Igneous stones, ashes, and charcoal are often found in proximity with the skeletons, under conditions which render it probable that fires were used in the burial ceremony. With the skeletons are also found specimens of mica, pottery, bone and copper beads, and animal bones. Ordinarily these mounds contain but one skeleton, though in Licking County seventeen were found. The most noteworthy of this class was one in Hardin County, which contained 300 crumbling skeletons. Col. Whittlesey and others, however, entertain the opinion that they belong to the Indians, who had used the mounds for burial purposes. Templar mounds are few in number, and are ordinarily circular. They are invariably truncated, and are often surrounded with embankments, inclined planes, or spiral pathways or steps, leading to the summit. They are found round, square, oblong, oval and octangular, and generally rest upon a large base, but have a limited altitude. It is supposed that these elevations were surmounted with wooden temples, all traces of which have been removed by the ravages of time. These mounds and the buildings at their summits, are thought to have been erected for religious purposes. Sacrificial mounds are ordinarily stratified, with convex layers of clay and loam above a stratum of sand. They generally contain ashes, charcoal, igneous stones, calcined animal bones, beads, stone implements, pottery, and specimens of rude sculpture. They are often found within inclosures, which are supposed to have been associated with the religious ceremonies of the Mound-Builders. Altars of igneous clay or stone are often found. Evidences of fire upon the altars yet remain, showing that various animals and probably human beings were immolated to secure the favor of the Great Spirit. These mounds infrequently contain skeletons, together with implements of war; mica from the Alleghenies; shells from the Gulf of Mexico; differently colored varieties of obsidian; red, purple, and green specimens of porphyry; and silver, copper and other metallic ornaments and utensils. Observative mounds were apparently designed for alarm-towers, or signal stations. Some writers have fancied that they "occur in chains, or regular systems, and that many of them still bear traces of the beacon fires that were once burning upon them." They are often found built like towers from the summits of embankments surrounding the inclosures. One of the latter, in Licking County, has a height of twenty-five feet. "Along the Miami River," says Judge Force, "are dotted small mounds or projecting highland which seem to have been built to carry intelligence by signals along the valley." Memorial mounds are of that class of tumuli intended to commemorate some important event, or to perpetuate the memory of some distinguished character. Most of the stone mounds belong to this class, and usually contain no bones, for the supposed reason that they were not used as sepulchers. They are thought to have been monuments over the illustrious dead of the Mound-Builders.

Effigies are elevations of earth in the form of men, beasts, birds, reptiles, and, occasionally, of inanimate objects, varying in height from one foot to six feet above the surrounding soil, and often covering many acres of land. Mr. Schoolcraft expresses the belief that this class of works were designed for "totems," or "tribular symbols;" while Prof. Daniel Wilson and other writers of distinction entertain the opinion that they were erected in accordance with the religious belief of the various tribes of Mound-Builders, who worshiped or in some way venerated the animals or objects represented by the elevations. A large work near Newark represents a bird of enormous size, with its wings outspread in the act of flight. Its total length is about 200 feet. An excavation in this effigy disclosed a clay and stone altar, upon which were found charcoal, ashes, igneous stone, and other evidences of fire. The surroundings indicated that the altar had been used for sacrificial offerings. It is called "Eagle Mound," from its fancied resemblance to that bird. Another work near Newark represents a huge alligator, having a total length of 200 feet. Prof. Wilson believes that it "symbolizes some object of special awe and veneration thus reared on one of the chief high places of the nation, with its accompanying altar, upon which these ancient people of the valley could witness the celebration of the rites of their worship, its site having been obviously selected as the most prominent feature in a populous district abounding with military, civic and religious structures." The greatest breadth of the body is twenty feet, and its body, from hind-legs to fore-legs, is fifty feet. Each limb is twenty-five feet long. The principal portions of the animal are elevated about six feet, while other portions are much lower. The most remarkable earth work in Ohio is in Adams County. Its form is that of an enormous serpent more than a thousand feet in length, with body in graceful anfractuous folds, and tail ending in triple coils. The greatest width of the body is thirty feet, and the effigy is elevated about five feet above the surrounding soil. "The neck of the figure," says the American Cyclopaedia, "is stretched out and slightly curved, and the mouth is opened wide, as if in the act of swallowing or ejecting an oval figure, which rests partly within the distended jaws. The combined figure has been regarded by some as a representation of the oriental cosmological idea of the serpent and the egg."

Defensive inclosures are irregular in form, and are always on high ground, in positions difficult to approach by a hostile foe. "The walls," says the American Cyclopaedia, "generally wind around the borders of the elevations they occupy, and when the nature of the ground renders some point more accessible than others, the height of the wall and the depth of the ditch in these weak points are proportionally increased. The gateways are narrow and few in number, and well guarded by embankments of earth placed a few yards inside of the openings or gateways, but parallel with them and projecting somewhat beyond them at each end, thus fully covering the entrances, which, in some cases, are still farther protected by prejecting walls on either side. These works are somewhat numerous, and indicate a clear appreciation of, at least, the elements of fortification, and unmistakably point out a certain degree of engineering in their general make-up.

"A large number of these defensive works consist of a line of ditches and embankments, or several lines, carried across the neck of peninsulas or bluff-headlands, formed within the bends of streams—an easy and obvious mode of fortification common to all rude peoples." The embankments of one of this class in Warren County are nearly four miles in length, varying in height from ten to twenty feet, to accord with the locality to be protected, and inclose several hundred acres. Covered ways or parallel walls are often found, either connecting different inclosures, or portions of the same. They were undoubtedly designed to protect those passing back and forth within. There are large numbers of sacred inclosures in the form of circles, squares, hexagons, octagons, ellipses, parallelograms, and others, many of which are designed and executed with surprising geometrical accuracy. They are sometimes found within military inclosures, and very likely were connected with the religious rites and ceremonies of the people, as small elevations are found within them, which were evidently used for altars, upon which sacrifices of various kinds were offered. Some archæologists maintain that many of the so-called sacred inclosures were intended and used for national games and celebrations, and it is probable that those without the altar were used as such.

The earthworks and their contents afford abundant opportunity to speculate as to the characters and customs of this ancient people, of whom nothing is left save their crumbling habitations. They were a numerous people, as is clearly proved by the magnitude and elaboration of their works. Their presence here, beyond question, antedates the coming of Columbus, and very probably extends back a thousand years or more. Perhaps a majority of intelligent men who have made the subject a study place the Mound Builders' period back to that of the Egyptians, Assyrians and Babylonians—to a period two or more thousand years before the Christian Era. Some place them back much farther in the past—back to a time when Southern Europe and the British Isles were inhabited by what is now known among antiquarians as "Fossil Man." The antiquity of man is now an established fact.* Pre-historic archæology, the latest-born of the sciences, has lived through the successive stages of scornful denial, doubt and unwilling assent, and has finally won for itself substantial recognition. Even its most strenuous opponents are forced to concede that there are proofs of man's existence during a lapse of time far exceeding the limits of the previously approved chronology. In the Quaternary gravels and caverns, mingled with the bones of numerous extinct species of animals, such as the mammoth, the woolly rhinoceros, and the cave bear; human bones have been discovered, although comparatively rarely, while the implements and objects of man's fabrication are found in large quantities. Those found imbedded in or covered by stalagmitic formation, sometimes many feet in thickness, render it impossible to confuse these evidences of man's prehistoric existence with those of a later date. The human remains discovered show man, at this earliest epoch, to have been possessed of a cranial development quite equal to the average now. But, though the antiquity of man is admitted, and the fact of his co-existence with extinct animals during the Quaternary period cannot be denied; yet both the duration of the Quaternary period, and the question of his existence in the previous Tertiary age, are still stoutly contested. Whether the duration of Quaternary times extended over a period of one hundred thousand years, as some claim, or over twenty thousand, or even less, can never probably be absolutely determined. The most satisfactory explanation of the chronological question has been found in the systematic explorations that have been carried on without interruption since 1865, by a most competent committee of the British Association, of a large cavern in South Devonshire, near Torquay, called "Kent's Hole." The most scrupulous care and vigilant watchfulness have characterized these explorations and investigations. The following is a brief sketch of what has been discovered in the course of the exploration: The bottom of the cavern was found to be encumbered with huge blocks of limestone that had become detached from the roof, between and under which was a layer of vegetable mold of varying depths, up to a foot or more. In this layer were found objects of various periods, running back as far as the time of the Roman occupation of the island. Below this came a floor, a stalagmite of an average thickness of sixteen to twenty inches, and underneath it a layer of cave earth four feet deep, in which were found objects of man's fabrication. Still lower, they came upon a second floor of stalagmite, which in some places had attained a thickness as great as twelve feet. Below all came a breccia (angular fragments of rock cemented together), in which were found numerous teeth and bones of the cave bear, and with them three undoubted flint instruments. Now, in one part of the cavern is a huge boss of stalagmite rising from the floor, and on it is inscribed, "Robert Hedges, of Ireland, February 20, 1688." For nearly two hundred years, the process of the formation of stalagmite appears to have been going on, and still the letters are now only covered by a film of not more than one-twentieth of an inch in thickness. Even granting that the deposition of stalagmite may have proceeded much more rapidly under former conditions than at present, when more water and more carbonic acid may have penetrated the cavern, still it is evident what a lapse of time is required to account for the formation of such a mass of material. Nor can accident or fraud be invoked to explain the presence of these relics of man, under the circumstances in which these have been found. The work was executed under the daily supervision of the committee, and by trustworthy laborers, and no intermingling of objects falling from a higher level; no burying of them in later times in excavations made in an older deposit; no attempt at making gain from forged articles, palmed off upon the credulous collectors, in this case, is possible."

Much more might be quoted in this connection, if space permitted. The distant antiquity of the Mound-Builders is not so well established as that of the "Fossil Man." While some intelligent authorities place the latter twice, or thrice, or even more times, back of the Mosaic account of creation, the former are allotted a period in history corresponding, as has been said, with that of the Egyptians, when records were first chronicled. Many important inferences can be drawn of the character of the Mound-Builders, from their works. They were unquestionably subservient to rulers or superiors, who had power to enforce the erection of gigantic structures, which, considering the semi-barbarous condition of the people, their lack of suitable implements of labor, and their imperfect and insufficient knowledge of mechanical principles, are surprisingly vast in extent and ingenious in design. Their works indicate that the people were warlike; that they were familiar with many mechanical and mathematical rules; that they were religious and probably idolatrous; that they were skilled in the manufacture of metallic and bone ornaments and pottery; that they had attained no little degree of perfection in the working of metals; and that they were essentially homogeneous in customs, pursuits, religion and government. They, of necessity, were an agricultural people, being too numerous to live by the chase alone. They offered burnt and other sacrifices and oblations to both good and bad spirits. Dr. Foster says they worshiped the elements, such as fire, air and water—also the sun, moon and stars, and offered human sacrifices to the gods they worshiped. Many implements and ornaments have been found scattered throughout the continent, that undoubtedly belonged to the Mound-Builders. Of these there are stone axes, mauls, hammers, celts, mortars, pestles, flint arrow and spear heads, fleshing and skinning instruments, ceremonial stones, shuttles, colored slate ornaments, breastplates of stone or shell, ornamental charms or totems, shell ornaments, rude and imperfect specimens of pottery, bone and metallic ornaments, igneous stones, slate implements for weaving, inscriptions and devices, and a multitude more, of all sizes and shapes, whose uses are unknown. That many of these were made and used by the Indians is certainly true. It is quite likely that the latter people would learn something from their predecessors, especially of those implements used in the arts of war, even though an interval of many years elapsed between the reigns of the two races.

It is now the design to give a brief, accurate description of every earthwork in the county, whether it was constructed by the Mound-Builders or by the Indians. In Congress Lake, in the northern part of the county, is a singular formation. Near the center of the western side of the lake, bounded on the east by its waters, and on all other sides by a deep, marshy swamp, is a large mound, some seventy-five feet in diameter north and south, and about fifty east and west. It is conical, rises some fifteen or eighteen feet above the level of the swamp and lake, and is composed of the same material as the adjacent bluffs. It is difficult to determine whether this is an artificial or natural formation. In either case, it must have been an island in an early day, and, if occupied by either of the above-mentioned races, must have been an impregnable position. An excavation of a few feet was made on the eastern side, but nothing of note was discovered. Future efforts in this direction may bring to light important facts.

On the farm of David Yant, in the southeastern part of Bethlehem Township, is a structure which must be referred either to the Mound-Builders or to the Indians. In a large, level field on a low tract of land, is a large mound, which must have been erected long before the white man came to the country. The mound is some sixty feet in diameter and five feet in height, although, when first erected, it is evident it was much narrower at the base, and had a corresponding increase in height. Time has accomplished the change by washing the soil from the summit. The mound is constructed of earth and stone, and, from the design, it would seem that the latter was at first heaped together, very likely with some distinct order in view, and afterward, over all was thrown a large quantity of dirt. There is a strange tradition regarding this mound, which is as follows: Two powerful Indian tribes had been at war for many years, and still the feud between them was unsettled, and the tomahawk and scalping-knife continued to do their dreadful work. The older sachems of both tribes saw that the hostile parties were so equally matched that both tribes would be almost or wholly exterminated should the feud continue until settled by the arbitrament of war. Treaties for peace were called, but no terms could be mutually agreed upon that would be satisfactory to both parties. Finally, after many such attempts to adjust the difference by overtures of peace, it was agreed that twenty of the bravest and strongest warriors of each tribe should assemble on the level tract of land where the mound now rests, and there, with knife and tomahawk and war-club, should be closed in deadly strife, after which the "hatchet" should be buried, and peace should prevail. Accordingly, on a given day, the two parties of dusky warriors, armed cap-a-pie for the fray, assembled, and, after array-ing themselves in the grotesque paraphernalia of war, and assuming a hostile attitude near each other, the word for the onset sounded, and the dreadful work began. Every art of desperate encounter was practiced by the combatants, and the brave men, one by one, sank down in death, until at last but a single one remained, a powerful young warrior, the coming chief of his tribe. But the terms by which the feud was to be adjusted called for the blood of this young warrior, and his father, an old man, and the chief of his tribe, stepped forward, and, with one blow of his tomahawk, stretched his son dead at his feet. The bodies of the forty sacrificed warriors were placed together on the ground where they fell, and over them were heaped the stones and the earth constituting the present mound. If the tradition be true, the mound should contain the crumbling skeletons of the dead warriors. It has never been opened, and it will be left to some future historian to record the probable truth of the tradition, after the mound has been opened and its contents disclosed. As far back as the memory of man runneth, a large oak tree, between two and three hundred years old, was growing from the summit of the mound. This was removed many years ago, and the soil around the mound is now a cultivated field. The Mound Builders are known to have erected similar structures, and possibly this formation may be properly referred to them. Even if the mound is found to contain many crumbling skeletons, or evidences thereof, either the tradition may be true, or the structure may have been the work of Mound-Builders, as the latter people often buried their dead in large numbers in the same mound. Of course, all positive knowledge on the subject will ever remain hidden, until all things shall be made plain. There is said to be a smaller mound not far from the one just described, but its location could not be found by the writer. At various places along the course of the Tuscarawas, there are meager evidences of the presence and work of a former people. Several mounds may be seen in the valley at different places, but there are no traditions regarding them, and, beyond reasonable doubt, they are natural formations. When the county was first settled, it was no uncommon thing to discover old Indian trails intersecting each other at various points in the county, and to find the crumbling remains of old villages, that once teemed with a large and thriving population. These have long since been removed by the destructive influences of time. There are many curious earth formations in the county, which, after extended examination, might disclose the fact that they were constructed by the earlier races. Others, no doubt, have been destroyed by the husbandman. From the fact that Stark County has a noticeable lack of ancient remains, it has been inferred that the county was a portion of the neutral land which separated two or more hostile nations or tribes of Mound-Builders. Large numbers of earth and stone works are found along the Cuyahoga River in Summit County, and also farther south on the Lower Tuscarawas, and on the Muskingum. This renders plausible the neutral view of Stark County. Perhaps, over these broad plains, long before the present growth of timber had started, the god of battles raged and thundered. In some portions of the county, large numbers of flint arrow and spear heads, and implements and utensils of various sorts, are discovered, some of which have been referred to the Mound-Builders, and some to the Indians. Quite a number of iron axes have been found in the county. These were manufactured in England, and shipped to this country to be used by the Indians during the bloody border wars of the last half of the last century. Many years ago, on the farm of Martin Bechtel, where his residence now stands, a number of flint arrow-heads, spear-heads and ornaments were found buried. At the same time, several Indian saddles were unearthed, all being considerably decayed. No evidences were seen that Indians had been buried there. Their saddles, however, had been, but certainly not for safe keeping. There is scarcely a portion of the county that has not a similar tradition.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Indian history of Stark County is extremely meager as regards prominent events, several interesting incidents are remembered, and will be narrated. Perhaps no other territory in the United States was the stage upon which were enacted so many thrilling border incidents as Ohio in early years. From 1750 until the war of 1812, there was a continued succession of Indian atrocities and alarms. Some of the Ohio tribes were, for short periods, at peace with the whites, but no permanent cessation of massacre and pillage could be anticipated. Other tribes, as the erratic Shawanese, constantly protested against the encroachment of the whites on the Indian lands, and steadily resisted almost every overture for peace. During all the wars in which the borderers were likely to be involved, an alliance with the Ohio Indians was earnestly sought, or at least great inducements were offered them to remain neutral. The British, on the Canada side, through the artifice or imposture of their emissaries, lost no opportunity of inciting the savages to butcher the white pioneers in Eastern Ohio and Western Pennsylvania, and to pillage and burn their homes. In 1750, the members of some ten or twelve tribes lived in what is now Ohio, among whom were the following: The Wyandots (called Hurons by the French), the Delawares and Shawanese (both members of the Algonquin group), the Miamis (also called Twigtwees), the Mingoes (a branch of the Iroquois or Six Nations), and the Ottawas and Chippewas. The Wyandots occupied the country in the vicinity of Sandusky River. The Delawares were established on the Muskingum and Tuscarawas Rivers, and at a few other points. The Shawanese were chiefly found on the Scioto and Mad Rivers. The Miamis were on the Great and Little Miami Rivers. The Mingoes were in great force at Mingo Bottom near Steubenville, and at several other points in Ohio. The Ottawas occupied the valleys of the Maumee and Sandusky Rivers; and the Chippewas, few in number, were mostly confined to the southern shore of Lake Erie. Only four of these tribes were present in such numbers as to merit a special sketch. These are the Wyandots, the Delawares, the Shawanese and the Ottawas.

The Wyandots, as indicated by the idioms and other characteristics of their language, were related to the Iroquois; but, about the middle of the seventeenth century, they embraced the religious faith of the Roman Catholics, and, for some reason unknown, severed their connection with their relatives, the Iroquois, and cast their lot with the powerful Algonquins.* Their original residence was in Canada, some authorities fixing their location on Georgian Bay, and others, as Mr. Schoolcraft, on Montreal Island. Their number is estimated to have been about 40,000 souls. Some time after this, they became involved in a war with the Iroquois, by whom they were nearly exterminated, after which they removed first to Charity Island, and finally to Quebec. They were found south of the great lakes in 1660, by some French traders, and, ten years later, having become involved in a war with the powerful Sioux, they removed to Michilimackinac, and were accompanied by Father Marquette. Afterward, they established themselves at Detroit, their hunting-grounds extending into Northern Ohio. In 1778, remnants of the tribe were yet in Canada, while the one at Detroit was estimated to comprise about one hundred and eighty warriors. In 1829, a small band of the tribe was located in Michigan. They numbered about forty, and were provided with annuities by the Government. Immediately after the war of 1812, the principal portion of the Wyandots, numbering about six hundred, were established on the Sandusky River, on a tract of land eighteen miles long east and west, and twelve miles wide. In 1835, the Wyandots decided to sell a strip of land five miles wide on the eastern border of their reservation, and the land was accordingly thrown into market. In 1843, they all were transferred to Kansas, where they have since resided, and the land of their reservation was annexed to the adjoining counties.

The Shawanese are an erratic tribe of the Algonquin family. A tradition of recent origin makes them one with the Kickapoo nation; but they moved eastward, and a part are said to have remained, in 1648, along the Fox River, while the main body was met south of Lake Erie by the Iroquois, and driven to the Cumberland River. Some passed thence to Florida, and some to Carolina. One band was in Pennsylvania at the close of the seventeenth century. Those in Florida lived at peace with the Spaniards, and afterward became known as Savannahs, or Yemassee. These retired to the Creeks, and finally joined the Northern Shawanese. The Iroquois claimed sovereignty over the Shawanese, and drove them west. In 1758, they aided the French; but, in 1781, sided with the English. They joined the conspiracy of Pontiac, and were active in war until subdued by Col. Bouquet. In 1774, enraged at the attacks of Col. Cressap, they roused most of the Western tribes, and, in October, defeated the Virginians at Pleasant Point, but sued for peace the following year. Col. Bowman, who marched against them in 1779, was twice defeated. They joined the peace treaty of 1786, but took part in the Miami war, in the campaigns against Harmar and St. Clair, but were reduced by Gen. Wayne, and then entered the peace treaty of 1795. The main body was at this time on the Scioto, but a few had gone to Missouri, and another band had gone South. During the war of 1812, urged by Tecumseh and his brother, the Prophet, they endeavored to unite the Western Indians against the Americans; but those in Ohio remained faithful. The Missouri band ceded their land to the Government in 1825, and the Ohio band in 1831. In 1854, the band of Shawanese proper, living in that part of the Indian Territory now included in Kansas, and consisting of 1,600,000 acres, numbered 900; but at this time, or soon afterward, the tribal relations were dissolved by treaty, and the lands divided in severalty. Besides these, there were, in 1872, ninety in the Quapau Agency, and 663 in the Sac and Fox Agency.

The Ottawas, when first known to the French explorers, were located on the Manitoulin Islands, and the northwest shore of the Michigan Peninsula. They believed in Michabou, "the great hare," a mythical personage who formed the earth and developed men from animals; in Mirabichi, god of the water; and in Missabizi, "the great tiger." Soon after 1649, they fled before the Iroquois to Green Bay, thence west beyond the Mississippi to the country of the Sioux, with whom they became involved in war, when they fell back to Chegoimegon before 1660, and finally to Mackinaw. The tribe became considerably divided here, one of the divisions settling near Detroit, and the other at Mackinaw, but finally passed over to Arbre Croche. The greater number of the Ottawas were in the last war with the French, and at its close, Pontiac, an Ottawa chief, and one of the ablest Indians of any tribe that ever lived, organized a vast conspiracy for the destruction of the English. They were under British influence during the Revolution, and at this time numbered about 1,500. They participated in the treaties of 1785, 1789 and 1795, and afterward, by other treaties, they acquired a tract of land on the Miami, thirty-four miles square. By the treaty of 1833, they ceded their land around Lake Michigan for land south of the Missouri River, and soon ceased to be a distinct band. A band of Ottawas at Maumee ceded 49,000 acres in 1836 to Ohio, and 200 emigrated to the Osage River, locating south of the Shawanese. Some 230 remained and became scattered in detached bands. In 1867, they became citizens, and, in 1870, were removed to a reservation of 24,960 acres in the Indian Territory. Several thousand are yet living in scattered bands in Michigan and Canada, and all are self-supporting. The Delawares are a tribe of the Algonquin family, and, when first known to the whites, were dwelling in detached bands, under separate sachems, on the Delaware River. They styled themselves Renappi, or, as now written, Lenape, or Leni Lenape. The Dutch began trading with them in 1616, and enjoyed friendly intercourse with them until 1632, when the settlement at Swanendael was utterly destroyed by a sudden attack, but trade was soon afterward resumed. The Swedes made efforts to Christianize them, and had Luther's Catechism printed in their language. The Delawares claim to have come from the West with the Mingoos, who soon afterward reduced them to a state of vassalage, and, when they were conquered by the Five Nations, they were termed women by the latter. The Delawares formed three families or clans—the Turkey, the Turtle and the Wolf. At the time of the "walking treaty," made by Penn., the Delawares complained that they had been defrauded in the interpretation of the treaty, and showed a reluctance to "walk," upon which the authorities called upon the Six Nations, who ordered the Delawares, as women, to retire. The Delawares were now thrown among warring people; and, though previously mild and peaceable, they now became energetic and savage, and conducted their wars with great ferocity and courage. In a war with the Cherokees, they reached the Ohio River, where a portion remained until 1773. They took up arms and fought with the French at Braddock's defeat, and elsewhere, but suffered so much from English attacks that they finally treated for peace, part of them in 1757, and the others after the fall of Fort Du Quesne. They then centered on the Susquehanna, and a small number soon afterward came West and settled on the Muskingum. They took up arms in the border war, but were badly defeated at Bushy Run, in August, 1763, by Bouquet. Their towns on the Susquehanna were pillaged and burned, many were killed and dispersed, and, in 1768, they emigrated as a body to Ohio. In 1774, they were again badly defeated at Pleasant Point, and a part were afterward engaged in the Revolution. In 1772, the Christian Delawares settled on the Muskingum (which, in early years, extended as far north as the mouth of Sandy Creek), but were hastily removed to Sandusky in 1781, by the British. Early in the following year, ninety-four who returned were murdered by a party of enraged borderers under Col. Daniel Williamson. By the treaty of 1785, the Delawares occupied the soil between the rivers Cuyahoga and Miami. At this time, there were many scattered bands of Delawares, several of which were Christian, and at peace with the whites. The main tribe at Grand Blaze, with 480 warriors, was hostile, and 400, under Buckongehelas, were at the defeat of St. Clair in 1791; but, four years later, they joined the peace treaty at Greenville. In 1808, there were 800 at Wapeminskink, a few at Sandusky, a few on the Muskingum (and Tuscarawas), and a large body at Fairfield, Canada. In 1818, the Delawares, 1,800 strong, ceded their lands to the United States, and emigrated to Missouri. In 1829, many went to Kansas, and some to south of the Red River. In 1853, they sold all their lands to the United States, except their reservation in Kansas. During the last war, out of 201 able-bodied warriors, 170 enlisted and served in the army. They sold their lands, in 1868, to the Missouri Railroad, and settled on the Verdigris and Cone Rivers. In 1866, they became citizens, though their clans—Turkey, Turtle and Wolf—still exist.

The Delawares who lived along the Tuscarawas and Muskingum Rivers were the principal tribe with which Stark County has to deal. The lands upon which they lived did not really belong to them, but had been granted them by the Wyandots, whose headquarters were at Sandusky, when they immigrated to Ohio. Portions of the Delaware tribes through all the bloody Indian wars of the last half of the last century, were steadfast friends to the white settlers, and did all they could to restrain their young men. Sometimes they were successful, but oftener the headstrong young warriors, through the influence of the savage Shawanese, or at the instigation of British agents, refused to remain at peace, and took up the hatchet, notwithstanding the protests and entreaties of those who were opposed to war. From the fact that the Moravian missionaries were not only established along the Tuscarawas further south, but also in Stark County, the Indians in this part of the State were no doubt often counseled not to take up the hatchet against the borderers. It may also be reasonably concluded that the Delawares were often restrained from indulging in war through the influence of the missionaries. However, the Moravians could not do much, as there were always prominent chiefs in the tribe who were bitter enemies of the white borderers, and lost no opportunity to slaughter and pillage. The following, from the pen of a local writer, was written in 1846: "In 1762, an Indian village of forty wigwams was standing across the river from the post settlement. The spot where the dwellings stood, and the streets between them, as well as the place of carousal, and where they used to play ball, were plainly visible. So was their burying-ground easily identified, as well as the havoc which some unprincipled fellows committed about twenty years ago, in digging after some silver trinkets, which the Indians used to bury with their dead. The graves were dug open, the silver taken out, and the bones scattered over the ground. Just across the river is the old missionary station. It is situated on the north side of the river, near its bank, about three-fourths of a mile above the bridge, on the road leading from Bolivar to Bethlehem, and just below a spur of the hill which approaches the river above it. The stones which had probably formed the back wall of the chimney form a heap of rubbish about two feet high. This is all there is left by which the site of the house can be identified. The place where their garden was differs from woods around it by the total want of heavy timber. This corresponds in all respects with the description given in Mr. Heckewelder's journal." It will be remembered that Frederick C. Post, the missionary who is reputed to have been the first permanent white settler in Ohio, built his cabin in southern Bethlehem Township, where he lived in constant communication with the Indians for many years. The following, taken from the sketches of a local writer, more fully explains Mr. Post's surroundings: "The old Indian crossing-place at the Delaware capital (called Tuscarawas), one mile north of Fort Laurens, is a prominent landmark in the early geographical division of Ohio, as well as the scene of the most important events that transpired in Stark County. Tuscarawas Town was located upon the bluff on the west side of the Tuscarawas River, at the mouth of Sandy, on land now (February, 1877) owned by Samuel Burns, and was on the main trail from Fort Pitt to Sandusky." The writer goes on to say that near the southeastern corner of Bethlehem Township was the cabin built in 1761 by Frederick C. Post as a mission among the Indians. It was located about a mile from the crossing, on the east bank of the Tuscarawas. The trading-house of Calhoun was on the west side of the river, about fifty rods above the iron bridge. In 1764, the military expedition of Col. Bouquet followed the Indian trail west from Fort Pitt into the heart of the Wyandot and Indian country, crossed the Muskingum (now Tuscarawas) at the above-mentioned crossing-place, and proceeded down the river to Goshegunk (Coshocton). Post's house was about a mile north-west of the Delaware capital. The Delawares were at first disposed to dispute the right of Post and Heckewelder to cut down the forest around their cabin, and sent them word to desist, and to appear at the council the following day to give an account of their conduct. At the head of this council was Tamaque (or Beaver), the chief of the Delawares, who said to Post that the latter, instead of devoting his time in instructing the Indian children, was cutting down the forests and taking possession of the land, as all the whites unlawfully did. Post replied that, while his real object in coming into the Indian country was to instruct the children, yet he must make arrangements to live. He must have corn and vegetables, and could not raise them unless he had the necessary land. Finally, after some further amicable discussion, it was agreed that Post should have a garden, fifty steps square, and this land was stepped off the next day by the afterward famous, or infamous, Capt. Pipe. There was at this time quite a large Indian village at Navarre, or near there. A mile down the river from Post's house was a trader named Calhoun, and farther down was the Delaware capital (Tuscarawas), containing some forty wigwams. Post owned a canoe, and was in the habit of rowing up the river until near Navarre, when he would land, cut a quantity of cedar wood, load it in his boat, and return down the river. The wood was used in making tubs, etc., for the Indians. The Indian capital about this time is supposed to have contained some 700 inhabitants. It is stated that the village was the capital of the Senecas, as well as the Delawares. No doubt but that, in the early border wars, white captives were held at this village, and very probably more than one white Indian slayer was tortured to death on this spot. Col. Bouquet, in his expedition into the Indian country passed through the southern part of the county. His object was to subdue the Indians, or awe them into submission, and his army comprised some 1,500 men, all well armed and prepared, if necessary, to chastise the Indians in a manner they would not soon forget. Seeing the danger they were in, the Indians came humbly forward and sued for peace. Col. Bouquet charged them with a wanton violation of their treaties, but the Indians, through their speakers, Turtle Heart, Custaloga and Beaver, vehemently asserted that they were unable to restrain their young men. Col. Bouquet demanded every white captive they had, and finally received some 300 of these unfortunates. "There were seen," says a writer in the Historical Record, "fathers and mothers recognizing and clasping their once captive little ones; husbands hung around their newly recovered wives; brothers and sisters met, after long separation, scarcely able to speak the same language, or to realize that they were children of the same parents. In those interviews, there were inexpressible joy and rapture, while, in some cases, feelings of a very different character were manifested by looks or language. Many were flying from place to place, making eager inquiries after relatives not found, trembling to receive answers to their questions, distracted with doubts, hopes and fears; distressed and grieved on obtaining no information of the friends they sought, and, in some cases, petrified into living monuments of horror and woe on learning their unhappy fate." It is also said that "in some cases, strong attachments had grown up between the savages and their captives, so that they were reluctantly surrendered, some even not without tears, accompanied with some token of remembrance."

The full force of all the sanguinary Indian wars during the last half of the eighteenth century fell upon the border settlements in Western Pennsylvania and Virginia, and Eastern Ohio. The savages were not slow in availing themselves of every opportunity to massacre the pioneers, destroy their homes, and drag large numbers of unfortunates into hopeless captivity. To retaliate, bands of daring borderers would invade the Indian country and slaughter many of the inhabitants. White men were bred to the one pursuit of slaying Indians. Great rivalry existed among them, in the frontier settlements, as to who could strike the severest blow the farthest into the heart of the Indian country, and return in safety to the settlements with satisfactory proof of their deeds. They were taught from the cradle to hate the Indian, and their boyish tongues soon learned to lisp maledictions against the hated race. Indians were not merely killed to avenge wrongs done by them to the whites. The borderers courted death and danger from love of excitement, or because they desired to boast of their exploits, or because they expected pecuniary gain. Horse-stealing was a favorite pastime, in which both races indulged without restraint, and many of the most exciting individual contests recorded in border history were the result of these unlawful incursions. The dreadful and desultory border warfare became, in a measure, systematic. Rangers and scouts were to be found all along the frontier, who constantly penetrated the Indian domain to watch the movements of the warriors, to warn settlers of impending attacks, and, if possible, to rescue white captives. These daring men were often captured and made to feel the weight of savage vengeance in agonizing deaths by fire and torture. John Glover, who was captured during Crawford's campaign against Sandusky, and who escaped death at the stake as by a miracle, states that, while he was at Wapitomic, twelve captive white men were brought in from Kentucky, all of whom were tortured to death by the savages. A captive was first stripped naked, and then, by means of charcoal and water, was painted black (a sure omen of an awful death). He was then forced to run the gantlet. Two lines of Indian men, women and children were formed, two or three hundred yards in length, and about twelve feet apart, the men being armed with tomahawks, knives, and guns loaded with powder, and the women and children with bows and arrows, clubs, knives, etc., the object being to inflict all but death upon the runner, without checking or impeding his progress by a front fire. As the captive dashed through the lines at full speed, his body was shot full of powder, and cut and hacked in a frightful manner. After this, the whole band pursued him round and round, beating, burning and torturing him in every conceivable manner, until death at last came to his relief. The body was then either cut in pieces and raised on poles, or given to the dogs! Thus ended the awful tragedy. Beyond question, the Delaware capital was the scene of incidents of this character. Perhaps the hills around Navarre have echoed with the frenzied death-cries of white men, and the dreadful yells of exulting savages. There is one conflict, between the Delawares and a small band of scouts from Pennsylvania (probably), the record of which may properly come within the limits of Stark County history. An account of this was written a number of years ago by Dr. Slusser, of Canton, and will be given in his words:

"On the occasion of this encounter, the party left the place of rendezvous for a scout, in April, 1793. It consisted of six men, five of whom were James Downing, Sr., John Cuppy, Isaac Miller, George Faulk and Thomas Dillon. They crossed the Ohio River at the mouth of Yellow Creek, followed up the north branch of that stream to near its source, then directed their course west to the head-waters of Sandy. After reconnoitering this section of the country for miles around without discovering any signs of Indians, they concluded there were none about. Up to this time, they had not discharged a gun for fear of being detected. The rations they had brought with them were nearly exhausted, and they concluded to kill some game for subsistence. Downing shot a deer, and another of the party a turkey. This was the morning of the fourth day out, between Little Sandy and Indian Run. As they had not yet taken breakfast, they concluded to prepare the meal. Miller was kindling a fire; Faulk was preparing the turkey for roasting; Downing was in the act of bending down a sapling, upon which he intended to hang his deer, that he might the more easily skin it; and Cuppy was sitting at the root of a tree, with his gun on his lap, examining the lock. A party of Indians, numbering eighteen or twenty, as was afterward ascertained, of the Delaware and Wyandot tribes, heard the firing, and thereby detected the locality of the scouts. They divided their force into two parties, with the view of approaching them from different points, and from the direction the scouts would be most likely to take in attempting to escape. One party of the Indians circled around and advanced from the northeast, the other from the southeast. While Cuppy was engaged with his gun, he happened to look up, when he saw at a distance an Indian peering through the underbrush. Instantly he sprang to his feet and gave the alarm. As soon as the Indian saw he was discovered, he turned and ran, and as he did so, Cuppy fired at him, but without effect. Miller and Faulk snatched up their guns and gave chase. The ground was sparsely timbered, and, as the two men continued the pursuit, Miller being in advance, Faulk called to him to halt, as he knew that just as soon as the Indian reached a more heavily timbered place, he would stop behind a tree and shoot Miller as he approached. Thereupon Miller turned about, and he and Faulk started back for the place they had left. Meanwhile, the other party of Indians, coming from the other direction, made their appearance in great numbers. Downing said to Cuppy and Dillon: 'Let us stand together and defend ourselves to the last.' Dillon hastily replied: 'Each one for himself,' and, suiting his action to the sentiment, broke and ran. Downing and Cuppy kept together, and moved along the higher ground toward the forks of Sandy. As the Indians pressed upon them, they would turn, raise their guns as though they intended to shoot, whereupon the Indians would jump about with the view of diverting their aim. By degrees they became bolder, and advanced closer, when Downing shot the nearest, which had the effect to keep the others at a greater distance. Soon after, Downing and Cuppy caught up with Dillon, who seemed much exhausted, and was staggering as though about to fall. Dillon begged for God's sake that they would help him, and, as Downing turned and saw his face, he was found to be choking on account of his neck-tie. Dillon, in his haste in trying to loosen it to improve his wind, pulled the wrong end and made it tighter instead. Downing cut the neckerchief with his knife, thereby relieving the panting Dillon, who immediately took a fresh start and was soon out of sight. Downing and Cuppy were both past middle age, and somewhat fleshy. They were nearly exhausted, and knew they could not hold out much longer. Downing at last said to Cuppy: 'I can't go any farther; I'll stand and fight under this thorn-bush if I die'—and stand he did. Cuppy at the same time got behind a tree, and both anxiously awaited the appearance of the savages, determined to make the best resistance they could. They had not long to wait, for soon the Indians were seen approaching. Downing reserved his fire until the foremost Indian came within close range, then, taking deliberate aim, fired and brought him down. The others returned a volley, which cut the bushes around the two men, but failed to strike either. Miller and Faulk, hearing the firing, hastened in the direction whence it came, and, ere they were aware, were among the Indians. Miller observed a large one with a silver half-moon on his breast in the act of loading his gun, and, just as the scout was drawing a bead on him, he gave a yell and sprang behind a tree. Miller soon discovered that the Indians had so surrounded him that it was impossible to protect himself behind a tree, whereupon he determined upon flight as the only means of preserving his scalp. Quick as thought he sprang from the upper bank, and ran across the bottom toward the north branch of the stream. The Indians left Downing and Cuppy, and all united in the pursuit after Miller. At one time, they were so near him that he recognized a tall warrior known among the whites as Tom Jilleway. After Miller crossed Little Sandy and came out in an open plain, he thought, as he afterward expressed it, 'Now, legs, for it,' and ran with all his might for about a mile and a half northwest, until he reached the highland, or ridge, when he stopped to look back and listen. He could neither see nor hear anything of the Indians. After resting awhile, he concluded to return to the place where they were first surprised, in the hope of meeting the balance of the company. Not finding them there, and the day being far advanced, he decided to make for the rendezvous of the company, on the east bank of the Ohio River. He continued to track as long as he could see, and passed the night on a ridge bordering Yellow Creek. He made a bed of chestnut leaves under a fallen tree that lay up from the ground, and slept soundly, amidst the howling of wolves and the screaming of wildcats. Next day, he crossed the Ohio at the mouth of Yellow Creek and reached the place of rendezvous, where he found Downing, Cuppy and Dillon safe and unhurt, save that Downing's face was much swollen, and his eyes bloodshot from over-exertion. In the evening of the next day, Faulk made his appearance, and reported that, when the Indians started after Miller, he hid himself in the brush. When they were out of sight, he crossed over a branch of Sandy (since called Indian Run, from this fight) and secreted himself on a hill, where he could overlook the plains south without being discovered. He could see the Indians in camp, and, from their performances, was satisfied, from a knowledge of their ceremonies, that two of their number had been killed. In talking over the matter, the company were of the unanimous opinion that they had the best of the fight, and had made a very lucky escape."

The above sketch was written a number of years ago, and was then published in the county papers. It has passed the ordeal of public criticism without serious injury, and is given in full as written. In conversing with various parties throughout the county, the writer has found some objections to many of the circumstances connected with the movements of the hostile parties, as narrated by the writer. It is stated by descendants of Mr. Downing that the site of the battle was farther south than as stated in the sketch. Others have suggested that some of the circumstances described are overdrawn, and that too much speculation was employed in the narration of minor details. In all histories, the writers, after becoming thoroughly familiar with the prominent events, and as many details as possible, are compelled to conjecture, from evidences known to be correct, many facts which they record. This is done by all historians, and curious mistakes often occur under the pen of the most careful writer. The high social standing of Dr. Slusser, his thorough knowledge of pioneer events, his reputation as a writer, and his eminent, recognized integrity, place his writings far above insignificant innuendoes and criticisms.

The following sketch was written a number of years ago, by Col. E. Ball, of Canton, and published, as given, in one of the county papers:

"A gentleman, whose name is not remembered, had been to Canton on business, and stopped on his way home (to Lake Township) at what was known as Everhart's Mill (in Plain Township), and there reported, in the presence of a number of farmers and their sons, that a band of Indians was passing through the settlements south of Canton, laying waste the country and spreading death and destruction as they went. He reported that they had just laid Rowland's Mill in ashes, and were about to lay siege to the village of Canton, and that it was their purpose to visit Cleveland and all intermediate settlements, and drive the palefaces out of the country. The settlers of Lake, Green and Plain Townships became terribly frightened. Neighbor was sent to sound the alarm to neighbor, and thus the sad intelligence spread with astonishing rapidity, until it reached the ears of hundreds. Men flew to their cabins, where each family held a council of war. Every latch-string was pulled in, the store of ammunition was examined, and, if bullets were lacking, new ones were cast. Axes, pitchforks, scythes and sickles were immediately hunted up and brought into the house, not only to prevent their being used in the hands of the expected savages, but for the purpose of being used as defensive weapons in the hands of the family. Many families carried their most valuable articles to the woods, and covered them with leaves and old rubbish, while others buried them in the ground. Many of those residing within a few miles of Greentown met at Squire Dickerhoof's, where they placed the wives and children in the garret of the cabin, while the men formed themselves into a company. Everybody armed, and all awaited the arrival of the savages. One man became so much alarmed that he loaded his family in a two-horse wagon, and, leaving his house and such goods as he could not carry, left the country. He did not stop until he found himself east of the Allegheny Mountains, where he had come from a short time before, and where he remained for the space of two years, when he returned, never to hear an end to the jeerings of his neighbors for this singular manifestation of backwoods bravery. My own father left his cabin, which was situated in the woods about a mile and a half west of Greentown, and, with his wife and children, walked to the residence of my grandfather, a distance of several miles. Such was the consternation in the neighborhood that finally a few young men volunteered to act as a scouting party. Accordingly, they mounted the best horses they could find, and, with their trusty rifles, moved down toward Canton. That village, consisting of about half a dozen houses, was found to be unharmed. Here the whole affair was found to be a complete fabrication. The boys returned and spread the glad tidings, and thus ended the last 'Indian war' in Stark County." Whether this Indian alarm occurred during the war of 1812 is not stated. During and prior to this war, the Indians were to be found in large numbers at the old Delaware capital, and in many temporary encampments throughout the county. They were peaceable, though it was well known that they might arise in fury at any moment. It was a common thing to hear them boast of their exploits on the border—of how many white men they had killed, or how many had suffered death by torture at their hands. Some of them proudly displayed dry tongues or scalps, stating that such had been taken from white captives. It is related that, on one occasion, when one of the Indians had displayed a string of dried human tongues, and had boasted of having killed the white men, he was followed by Mr. Harter, of Plain Township, and after that the Indian was never seen again. Mr. Harter is said to have stated significantly, afterward, "He will never show those scalps again." Mr. Bechtel had a similar experience with another, who is also said to have started, about that time, on a prolonged trip to the happy hunting grounds. Occasionally, troubles arose between them and the whites, mainly owing to the rascality of the latter. The Indians were notorious beggars, surpassing the tramp in artifice and expediency. They were very fond of sweet milk, and one of them could envelop a gallon of that delicious liquid with apparent ease. Cows were frequently found dry upon being driven home, but no one seemed to know what became of the milk. The Indians would secure wild honey, or venison, or furs, which would be traded for potatoes, pumpkins, melons, corn-meal, flour and other provisions. Sometimes, when they found the whites unwilling to give, they resorted to artifice. They would watch the cabin until the husband and father were absent, when they would quietly present themselves, enter without invitation, seat themselves, and ask for whisky, or whatever was wanted. If the settler's wife hesitated or demurred, a few hostile looks and gestures were sufficient to kindle into life her most lavish generosity. If whisky was given, the wife knew that she must immediately get rid of her tawny guests, or, when the liquor had gained control, she might suffer many indignities, and perhaps serious injury or death. "The northwest quarter of Section 20, in Green Township, formerly belonging to Stark County, but now to Summit, on land purchased by Cornelius Johnson of the United States in 1813, appeared to have been a favorite hunting-ground, or battle-ground, of the Indians, as arrow-heads, hatchets, skinning knives and other implements have been found there in great abundance. From the numerous flint chips found on that quarter of the section, it seems to have been a place for manufacturing their stone hatchets and arrow-heads. Where they obtained such large quantities of flint is unknown. The spot seems to have been selected on account of its being light-timbered, clear from underbrush, and elevated a little above the surrounding lands. Scattered over this elevated plateau were found piles of stones, varying in size from two to eight inches in diameter, and arranged in heaps of from four by six feet to a little larger or smaller. Tradition assigns to them the honor of holding the ashes of some warrior or chief, but, as no bones or human remains have ever been found in them, they are thought by some people to have been sacrificial altars, or monuments, erected to perpetuate the memory of some great events." The above is quoted from the writings of Josiah Q. Kern. Henry Bechtel, of Jackson Township, says that on one occasion a settler who was sawing logs in the woods was approached by an Indian, who, after viewing the operation with great interest for a time, left, and, some time afterward, when the settler was absent, the Indian returned, accompanied by two others, and, after pointing to the nicely sawed logs, took his ramrod and drew it back and forth at right angles across the log, to illustrate the manner in which the sawing had been performed. The ease and simplicity of the process were beyond the comprehension of the red men of the woods.

During the war of 1812, the settlers in the county were apprehensive that the Indians might turn against them, in which case a dreadful time of blood and death might be expected. At one time, news was received that 800 warriors had congregated in the bend of the river at Navarre, and were making preparations to attack the settlers. The news came from a reliable source, and was credited, and immediate preparations were made to receive them in a fitting manner. A company of militia at Canton, commanded by Col. Sloane, and another in Sandy Township, commanded by Capt. Downing, were hastily assembled to resist the expected attack. The few cabins then in Canton were barricaded, and rendered as strong as possible by levers and bars. Pickets were sent out a half-mile or more from the village, and all movements of the people were made subservient to the orders of the military commanders. All the settlers living on the outskirts of the settlement hurried to Canton, armed with pitchforks, sickles, clubs, scythes, axes, etc., prepared to sell their lives at a high premium (if the figure may be indulged in). Philip Dewalt's tavern became a sort of headquarters for the excited populace. Drums were improvised from old pails, and martial music soon fired the blood of the citizens to fever heat. No one slept that eventful night. All were watchful, and properly so. Indeed, the settlers did exactly right, for, if the report had been true, their promptness would have disconcerted the savages, to say the least. Some laughable incidents are related. John Shorb, during a portion of the night, was assigned picket duty on the advance line. While on his beat, on the alert for any suspicious sound, he was suddenly startled by the snapping of a twig, as if some person had incautiously stepped upon it. Mr. Shorb instantly cocked his rifle, and demanded, in stentorian tones, "Halt! who goes there?" A painful and ominous silence answered his words, and for a moment nothing could be heard but the rapid beating of his heart, and the soft sighing of the night wind through the dark forest. Suddenly the same noise was repeated, and again Mr. Shorb commanded a halt. Squatting upon the ground, he could see some dark object coming nearly toward him, and, raising his rifle, he took deliberate aim and fired. A heavy fall announced the success of the shot, and Mr. Shorb, after loading his rifle, stepped cautiously forward to view his fallen foe. He reached the spot, and, peering forward, saw the bloody corpse of a—cow. He afterward said, "That's what the cow got for not answering." He never boasted very much, however, of this exploit. When the morning dawned, the two companies moved forward to discover what had become of the Indians. The site of Navarre was reached, but no blood-thirsty savages were seen, and, after proceeding some farther and not finding an enemy, the companies returned to Canton. The vigilance and alarm did not subside immediately, but everything, including the militia companies, was kept in readiness to resist a possible attack. Extra precautions were taken when the news was received that the British were landing from Lake Erie, with the intention of attacking the settlements in Eastern Ohio. All apprehensions of danger from this source were removed by the appearance of a few of Hull's half-starved, half-clothed, paroled soldiers, who were the ones that had landed at the lake. The Indians continued in the county, and in all Eastern Ohio, until after the war. It is said that, just before the battle of Tippecanoe, the Indians were seen to be unusually active. War dances were frequently held, and the battle cries and scalp halloos could be heard above the boisterous confusion in the Indian village. The Indians would flourish their tomahawks and scalping-knives, and the settlers wondered if another outbreak was brewing. At last the news of the battle of Tippecanoe was received, and after that, the commotion in the Indian villages ceased, save an occasional war dance, indulged in in memory of olden times, and to prevent the time-honored customs of the tribe from dying out. The settlers were often present during the tribular ceremonies, and occasionally they took part in the dance. When it came to taking food or soup prepared on these occasions, the settlers, one and all, desired to be counted out. Wrestling matches were formed, and the "whites" and "reds" were arrayed against each other. Sometimes one succeeded, sometimes another. Shooting matches were formed, yet, notwithstanding the superior vision of the Indians, the white hunters usually secured the prizes. The greater portion of the Indians left immediately after the close of the war, though straggling bands remained and could be seen as late as 1825, or even later. The tale of the red man will soon be told as a romance of the past.

CHAPTER III.*

POST AND HECKEWELDER'S MISSION—EARLY SETTLEMENT BY THE WHITES—EARLY PUBLIC BUILDINGS—COURT HOUSE AND JAIL—DIVISION OF THE COUNTY—POOR HOUSE AND CHILDREN'S HOME.

STARK COUNTY can proudly boast of being the site of the earliest white settlement in the State of Ohio. In about the year 1740, large numbers of Moravians had established themselves in a beautiful section of country at Bethlehem, Penn. Here they quietly worshiped God and increased in numbers, and at last instituted an association, the object of which was the establishment of missions among the Indians, that these wild people might learn more of Jesus Christ, and their children be taught to read and write. Great influences were brought to bear by the Moravians, to induce grave and capable men to dare the dangers which would possibly result from constant communication with the Indians. This course, calculated, as it was, to bring to the front the courage, intellect and religious manhood of the Moravians, resulted in the creation of a vast system of pioneer missions, whose holy achievements have become embalmed forever in the history of this country. Under the influence and protection of the system, the sturdy ministers of this sect penetrated unmolested far into the wilderness, where no white foot had before pressed, and where the wild forms of nature were as yet untouched by the fashioning hand of man. Homes with the savages were not always secured without a struggle, as is evinced by the historical fact that many failed to secure the longed and prayed for results—some efforts, indeed, resulting in bloodshed, others in brief and unhappy periods of continuance, while a few were hopefully successful through a long, bright period of years. One of the chief designs of the Moravians was the creation of a friendly feeling between themselves and the Indians, that a basis might be formed by means of which the former might induce the latter to refrain from bloody wars upon the white pioneer settlements. This design was effectively accomplished in some instances; in others, it utterly failed.

Sometimes the Moravians sent their missionaries to the Indian villages; but the most noteworthy missions known in history were established by men who immured themselves amid the dangers of the wilderness from choice, and quite often in opposition to the wishes of the Directors of the Moravian Association. The early settlement in Stark County referred to above has been recorded in detail by many writers, all of whom seem capable of throwing some new light on the subject. One thing is certain: The results accomplished by the settlement have been greatly overdrawn. Rev. Christian Frederick Post, a regularly ordained minister of the United Brethren Church, of his own choice, and independent of the Moravian Association at Bethlehem, Penn., came to Stark County some time during the year 1761, and erected a log cabin, after which he immediately returned to Pennsylvania, to seek an associate who could teach the Indian children to read and write, while he preached to the adults. How long Mr. Post remained in Stark

*Contributed by W. A. Goodspeed.

County at the time the cabin was built is probably not known; yet it could not have been longer than about a month, and might have been but two weeks, as nothing of consequence was accomplished save the erection of the cabin. The cabin was located on the north bank of the Tuscarawas River, on Section 25, Bethlehem Township, and within a short distance of the confluence of the river and Sandy Creek. In early years, the stones which had probably formed the chimney, and a quantity of rubbish, marked the spot, although at present scarcely a trace of the old cabin is left remaining. The important point for the reader to note is, that, while Mr. Post's design was to establish a mission among the Indians, the plan was abandoned before that result was accomplished. It was an unsuccessful attempt to found a mission, as no mission was really founded, save an imperfect one, and that but for a few months. Almost directly south of Mr. Post's cabin, distant about two-thirds of a mile, was the Delaware village, Tuscaroratown, which comprised forty wigwams, and could place on the war path 180 warriors. On the opposite side of the river from Post's mission, and a few rods farther down, but above Tuscaroratown, was a rude cabin occupied by a white trader named Thomas Calhoun, a moral and religious man. Below the village, a few wigwams were scattered for a distance of several miles, while above it, and distant about seven miles, was another Indian village, the size of which is not known. These were the surroundings. Mr. Post, upon his return to Pennsylvania, was not long in discovering a suitable associate in the person of John Heckewelder, who, of his own choice, and independent of the association, signified his willingness to accompany Post into the wilderness to teach the Indian children. Heckewelder was but nineteen years old, and, for the purpose of accompanying Post, was released from an apprenticeship to a cedar cooper. Other accounts than the one above followed state that Heckewelder joined Post with and under the consent of the Association. This is probably true, for Heckewelder states as much in his memoirs, which were afterward published in Germany. According to the account given in these memoirs, Post and Heckewelder left Bethlehem, Penn., early in March, 1762, and, after a harassing journey of thirty-three days, through spring floods and snows, reached the log cabin in Stark County. They passed through Fort Pitt, and were warmly welcomed there by Col. Bouquet and Capt. Hutchins, then on duty at that point. It is said that two missionaries entered their log cabin singing a hymn. Immediately after their arrival, and early in April, Post and Heckewelder began clearing a small piece of ground for a garden, but were ordered to desist by the Indians, who were jealous of such acts without authority. A council was held, which resulted in Capt. Pipe's stepping off a small piece of land for the missionaries' garden. Here Post and Heckewelder remained until about August, at which time Post was required by the Governor of Pennsylvania to bring the principal Delaware Chiefs to the treaty that was to be held at Lancaster, Penn. Post did as required, and Heckewelder was left alone at the mission. Here he remained until October, when, fearing a border war, he returned to Pennsylvania, and neither he nor Post afterward returned to their mission. It appears, then, that Post remained at the mission about four months, and Heckewelder about six months. But little in respect to the object of the formation of the mission could possibly have been accomplished in that brief space of time. Post's mission receives its greatest credit from the fact that it opened the way to important missions which succeeded it. It was the beginning of a series of missions on the Tuscarawas that did a great deal to prevent the Delawares, at least, from engaging in the bloody border wars. Loskiel has this to say of the Post mission, in his "History of the Missions of the United Brethren among the Indians of North America:"

"On the Ohio River, where, since the last war, some of the Ohio Indians lived who had been baptized by the Brethren, nothing could be done up to this time. However, Brother Frederick Post lived, though of his own choice, about one hundred English miles west of Pittsburgh, at Tuscaroratown, with a view to commence a mission among the Indians. The Brethren wished the blessings of the Almighty upon his undertaking, and, when he asked for an assistant to help him in his outward concerns, and who might, during the same time, learn the language of the Delaware Indians, they (the Brethren) made it known to the congregation of Bethlehem, whereupon Brother John Heckewelder concluded, of his own choice, to assist him." And then, to explain the above somewhat, he goes on to say: "We know of Post that he was an active and zealous missionary, but had married an Indian squaw, contrary to the wishes and advice of the Directory that had the oversight of the Moravian missions; and this act had forfeited so much of his standing that he would not be acknowledged as one of our missionaries in any other manner than under the guidance of another missionary. Whenever he went further and acted of his own accord, he was not opposed, but had the good-will of the society of which he continued a member, and of its Directory, and even their assistance so far as to make known his wants to the congregation; and they threw no obstacles in the way of any person inclined of his own choice to assist him. But he was not then acknowledged as their missionary, nor entitled to any further or pecuniary assistance."

Rev. David Zeisberger, who afterward formed a permanent mission a few miles down the river, also refers to Post's mission. Maj. Robert Rogers, sent on an expedition to the Western country from Montreal, crossed the river at the fording place at Tuscaroratown in the year 1761, and afterward stated that there were at that time some 3,000 acres of land, cleared and under cultivation, at the Indian village. The chief of the Delawares at this time was Beaver, and their principal war chief was Shingess, who is supposed to have been the same as Buckongahelas. This noted warrior was living in 1804. In 1764, when Col. Bouquet marched to this village with his army of 1,500 men, it was found deserted. It will thus be seen that the only important result of the Post mission was the founding of a series of missions on the Tuscarawas. Did not Heckewelder do even more than Post to insure a continuance of the work founded by this mission? And yet Post led the way, even against the wishes of the Directory of the Association, and was in reality instrumental in laying the foundation of the succeeding missions.

It is not the design in this chapter to enter into the details of the first settlements made in the different townships in the county. That task falls upon the township writers. It is proper, however, at this point, to give a summary view of the general early settlement, for the purpose of giving a connected account of the growth of the county. The earliest settlers throughout Ohio, and, in general, throughout all new countries, were a courageous class of men, known as squatters, whose occupation was hunting and trapping, upon which they almost or quite wholly depended for subsistence. These men usually thought the country was becoming too thickly settled when a dozen families lived within as many miles, and, in such cases, ordinarily moved farther out into the unexplored wilderness. In their places came the advance guard of the grand army of settlement and progress. It is always the case that the enterprising, the energetic and ambitious are the ones who first brave the hardships of a new country, and who thereby write their names on the most prominent page of the history of their country. It is always the venturesome, the daring spirit, that swings off from the great army and strikes in a new and surprisingly effective manner at the object to be attained. Such men are not imitators; they are imitated. They do not follow; they lead. They do not wait like Micawber for something to turn up; they turn something up. They are the initiators of genuine progress. Stark County had its share of these men. Their faces are yet familiar to the old settlers, although their rifles and traps have been laid aside long ago. Every stream knew them; every hill and dale had felt the pressure of their feet; every grove had re-echoed with their shouts, and with the reports of their rifles. Their rude dug-out canoes swept silently across the lakes beneath the strength of their sturdy arms. All this is now gone. Waving fields of grain stand upon the hills and line the sloping dales; the stealthy foot-fall of the hunter is no more; the busy hum of human life has taken the place of silence and shadow. As nearly as can be ascertained, the townships were first settled as follows: Canton, March, 1805; Plain, summer, 1805; Nimishillen, autumn, 1805; Sandy, autumn, 1805; Osnaburg, autumn, 1805; Paris, autumn, 1805; Marlborough, autumn, 1805; Washington, autumn, 1805; Lexington, spring, 1806; Lake, summer, 1806; Perry, summer, 1806; Pike, summer, 1806; Jackson, 1807; Bethlehem, 1807; Tuscarawas, 1808; Lawrence, 1808; Sugar Creek, 1808. These dates are not far from correct. The settlers were largely from the Keystone State, though many were from the Old Dominion, and from the Empire State, and a few were Yankees. Perhaps four-fifths of the early population were of German descent. Localities in the county were colonized by Yankees and by French Catholics. Later years have served to reduce, greatly, the German characteristics. The English language is principally spoken, though there are places where the German prevails, or where the vivacious French may be heard. Settlers were careful to locate on the outskirts of the settlements, as in that case they could have choice of land, and could also be near schools, churches, stores, mills, etc. These were important items to be taken into consideration, as many a settler who disregarded them learned to his sorrow. It was important, also, to locate near some good highway. Milling was a fashionable and profitable employment. The extensive immigration prior to 1820 created an enormous demand for native lumber. Houses, barns and other buildings were erected by the thousands; but, as the demand for building lumber increased, the number of saw-mills to supply that demand increased. The early saw-mills were, of course, operated by water-power, and hence the selection of farms having excellent mill sites occupied the attention of many an early settler. Grist-mills sprang into existence to supply the demand for bread. Every township had one distillery or more. There was an enormous demand in early years for liquor. Whisky was upon every sideboard, and children and adults daily took a pull at the bottle. It was the custom, just before eating, to take a horn, as the liquor was thought not only to aid digestion, but to furnish a positive nourishment to the system. Workmen really thought they could not get along without it, and frequently left the field when it was not furnished. The best of whisky could be bought for from 12 cents to 30 cents per gallon. It is said that every house was a public house in early years. The latch-string hung out to all, and no one was turned away without a bed or a meal, such as they were. Little villages sprang up like mushrooms, from all quarters. Every owner hoped that his village would be favorably smiled upon by fortune. Some hopes were realized, some were blasted. Stores were opened with small stocks of goods, that were slowly increased as the patronage extended, or was auctioned off as the owner saw that his effort was abortive. People were without money, yet extensive commerce was carried on by means of exchanges, with some temporary measure of value. There arose two prices—the "trade price" and the "cash price." This state of things often wrought great hardships, but was finally outgrown. Schools and religious meetings were first held in the settlers' houses. Finally, the old log schoolhouse was erected. Here the meetings were also held, until at last log churches were built. These old schoolhouses and churches have been replaced by many others, each an improvement on the one preceding it. Thus settlements and improvements have multiplied, with their attendant blessings.

A few years after Columbiana County had been created, and after a number of the first settlers had located in what is now Stark County, the territory embraced within the limits of the latter county, and other territory of about the same extent, were included in the former county for election purposes. It must be understood that, when speaking of Stark County in early years, not only the present territory embraced within the county limits is meant, but also Franklin and Green Townships in Summit County, and Brown, Rose and Harrison Townships in Carroll County. These townships, at the early organization of Stark County, were a part of the latter. While under the jurisdiction of Columbiana County, the Stark County of early years was divided into two townships by a line passing east and west through the county, on the northern line of the present Canton Township. The territory north of this line was called Lake Township, and that south of the line, Canton Township. These two townships included the whole of Stark County. Soon after the Indians' title to the land west of the Tuscarawas was extinguished, the present Wayne County, and portions of the townships of Lawrence, Tuscarawas and Sugar Creek, lying west of the river, were attached to Lake and Canton for election and judicial purposes. As soon as the last two townships were created by Columbiana County, which was done in 1806, an election of the necessary township officers was ordered. Who these officers were is not now known; but Jacob Loutzenheiser was commissioned Justice of the Peace of Lake Township, and James F. Leonard the same of Sandy Township. No other important alterations were made until the county was created. The following is the full text of the creating act, passed by the Sixth General Assembly of the State of Ohio, begun and held in the town of Chillicothe, on the 7th of December, 1807:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the following tract of country be and the same is hereby erected into a separate county by the name of Stark, viz.: Beginning on the southern boundary of the Connecticut Reserve, at the northeast corner of township number nineteen in the sixth range; thence running south between the fifth and sixth ranges, to the southeast corner of the fifteenth township of said sixth range; thence west with the township line until it intersects the eastern boundary line of the United States Military District; thence with the said eastern boundary line north to the northeast corner of the tenth township, in the first range of said military district; thence west with the township lines until they intersect the Indian boundary line; thence with said Indian boundary line to the northwest corner of fractional township number ten of the tenth range, in the new purchase, south of the Connecticut Reserve; thence north, with the line running between the tenth and eleventh ranges, to the northwest corner of township number two of the tenth range; thence east with the southern boundary line of the Connecticut Reserve to the place of beginning.

SEC. 2. That the said county of Stark shall, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and nine, be and the same is hereby declared to be a separate and distinct county, and entitled to all the rights and privileges appertaining to the same: Provided, That all actions and suits which may be pending in the county of Columbiana on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and nine shall be prosecuted and carried on to final judgment and execution, and all taxes, fines and forfeitures, which shall be then due, shall be collected in the same manner as if this act had not passed.

SEC. 3. That all that tract of country lying west of the tenth range and east of the sixteenth range in the said new purchase, and south of the Connecticut Reserve, and north of the United States Military District, shall be a separate and distinct county by the name of Wayne; but, with the county of Stark, shall be attached to and made a part of Columbiana County, until the said county of Stark shall be organized, and shall thereafter be and remain a part of the said county of Stark until otherwise directed by law.

SEC. 4. That there shall be appointed by a joint resolution of both houses of the present General Assembly, three commissioners to fix the seat of justice in the said county of Stark, agreeable to the act establishing seats of justice, who shall make report of their proceedings to the Court of Common Pleas of Columbiana County, and who shall be governed by the provisions of the aforesaid act.

SEC. 5. That the commissioners aforesaid shall be paid for their services out of the treasury of Columbiana County.

This act shall take effect and be in force, from and after the passage thereof.

PHILEMON BEECHER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

THOMAS KIRKER,

February 13, 1808.

Speaker of the Senate.

The three Commissioners appointed by a joint resolution of both Houses of the Sixth General Assembly to locate the county seat of Stark County were Elijah Wadsworth, Eli Baldwin, and another, whose name does not appear upon the Columbiana County records. On the 14th of June, 1808, Daniel Harbaugh, Joseph Richardson and George Alterholt, Commissioners of Columbiana County, issued an order, in accordance with Section 5 of the above enactment, upon the Treasurer of that county, paying to each of the constituted Commissioners appointed to locate the county seat of Stark County the sum of $13 for his services. These Commissioners, after carefully considering the claims of the three villages, Canton, Osnaburg and Nimishilltown, for the location of the county seat, unanimously selected the former. An election of county officers was ordered, and, on the 16th day of March, 1809, the first Commissioners of Stark County met at Canton for the transaction of business. These men were John Bower, James Latimer and John Nichols. They met at the residence of James Campbell, and appointed William Reynolds Clerk of the Board. The first thing done was the division of the county into townships, or, as some then called them, "election districts." This was effected as follows:

Ordered by the Board, That the county of Stark be divided into townships or election districts as follows, to wit: Canton Township (election to be held at the residence of Samuel Coulton, in Canton) beginning at the southeast corner of the ninth township in the eighth range; thence north with the line between the seventh and eighth ranges to the northeast corner of the tenth township in the said eighth range; thence west with the township line to the west boundary of the county; thence south and east with the county line to the place of beginning. Plain Township (election to be held at the residence of George Harter), beginning at the northeast corner of the twelfth township in the eighth range; thence south to the southeast corner of the eleventh township in the eighth range; thence west with the township line to the west boundary of the county; thence north and east with the county line to the place of beginning. Nimishillen Township (election to be held at the residence of Henry Loutzenheiser), to include the eighteenth and nineteenth townships in the sixth range, and the nineteenth and twentieth townships in the seventh range. Osnaburg Township (election to be held at the residence of William Naylor), to include the seventeenth township in the sixth range and the eighteenth township in the seventh range. Sandy Township (election at the residence of Isaac Van Meter), to include the fifteenth and sixteenth townships in the sixth range, and the sixteenth and seventeenth townships in the seventh range. Further ordered, That the clerk do ascertain of the Associate Judges of Stark County, how many Justices of the Peace will be necessary in each of the townships in the county, and that he, having got the certificate of said Associate Judges, do proceed to advertise an election in each of the said townships, to be held on the first Monday in April next (1809), for the election of the number of Justices agreed on by the Associate Judges, and for all other necessary township officers.

In accordance with Section 3 of the above creating enactment, attaching the county of Wayne to the county of Stark, the Commissioners, on the 10th day of April, 1809, ordered that the county of Wayne be considered attached to Canton Township, and that the residents of that county vote at the usual place where the citizens of Canton Township do. The Commissioners soon saw that they must levy a tax to secure a revenue for carrying on the expenses of the county. Not a road, with perhaps one or two exceptions, had been laid out in the county; and, as the settlers began to come in very rapidly at this time, repeated demands were made for bridges and for better roads. It is said that, during the winter of 1805-6, there were not to exceed twelve families in the entire county. The next winter, there were about three times as many, and at the time the county was organized, in 1809, some localities were quite well settled. To meet the current expenses of the county in the construction of roads and bridges, and the payment of county officers, the Commissioners, on the 10th day of April, 1809, ordered the following assessments: Taverns in Canton, a license of \$9 per annum; in all other parts of the county, \$5 per annum. Ferry-men on the Tuscarawas River, \$6 per annum; and the same on all other streams of the county. Ferry-men were allowed to charge as follows: On footmen, $6\frac{1}{4}$ cents each; man and horse, $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents; team and loaded wagon, 50 cents; all other vehicles, $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents; team and empty cart, sled or sleigh, $8\frac{3}{4}$ cents; cattle and horses, each, $6\frac{1}{4}$ cents; sheep and hogs, each, 2 cents. The following additional assessments were made by the Commissioners in June, 1809: On all ordinary horses, 25 cents annually; on horses of the masculine persuasion, the season price per annum; cattle, 10 cents; on all other taxable property, a levy of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. For the scalps of wolves and panthers, a bounty of 50 cents was offered, provided the animals were under six months old; if over that age, \$1. The following year, this bounty was doubled. At the April session of the board, James Campbell was appointed County Treasurer, whereupon he gave bond for \$3,000, with George Bair and Philip Slusser, bondsmen. At the June session, Joseph McGuigan was appointed Sheriff. His bond of \$4,000 was signed by Thomas Giason, Hugh Cunningham, Samuel Coulter, Andrew Suckey and James Williams. In September, 1809, the Commissioners ordered the county of Wayne to be detached from Canton Township, and to be organized as an independent township by the name of "Kilbuck." The citizens of that county were directed to assemble at the residence of Benjamin Miller, in Wooster, to elect the necessary township officers, which was accordingly done. This order of the Commissioners was issued in accordance with the prayer of the citizens of Wayne County, who had petitioned for a separate organization. The first road ordered viewed was a branch of the Steubenville, & Bethlehem road, and was to extend from Jacob Oswalt's to the town of Canton, thence toward the portage of the Tuscarawas River. The second road was to extend from the northeast corner of the county to Lexington, thence to Raleigh Day's Mills, thence to Canton. An application was made for a road extending from Canton to the confluence of Sandy Creek and Tuscarawas River. This was at first refused, but in December the application was granted. In December, 1809, the first Court of Common Pleas was convened by Judge Calvin Pease. More of this court will be learned in the chapter on the county bar. In the autumn of 1809, Samuel Coulter took the place of John Bower as one of the Commissioners, the latter probably having left the county. It was decided by ballot that James Latimer's term of office should be one year, Samuel Coulter's two years, and John Nichols' three years. The Court of Common Pleas met in the upper story of S. W. Coulter's building, and, as ordered by the Commissioners, the Judge "will be entitled to receive \$3 for each court." The following are the dates at which subsequent townships of Stark County were created: Tuscarawas, 1810; Green, 1811; Perry, 1813; Brown, 1815; Jackson, 1815; Pike, 1815; Lawrence, 1815; Lexington, 1816, and again in 1821; Sugar Creek, 1816; Lake, 1816; Franklin, 1816; Bethlehem, 1816; Harrison, 1817; Paris, 1818; Rose, 1818; Washington, 1818; Marlborough, 1821. During the year 1810, the Township Collectors reported and paid into the county treasury about \$200. Of this, John Campbell, Treasurer, turned over to his successor \$48.55. In 1811, James Drennan was appointed by the board to "keep the county measure." It was about this time that the first land tax was collected, Thomas C. Shields being the County Collector. In December, 1811, the board came to the conclusion that the old court room in Samuel Coulter's house should be abandoned, and a better one entered in the second story of George Stidger's new brick. The contract between the board and Mr. Stidger was as follows: "Stidger is to give for the use of the county the south half of the upper story of said house, and to devote the same to the uses of a court room. The Commissioners engage to put up in said house such accommodations as they think proper for the court, and to do it with as little injury as possible to the house, and to pay the said Stidger the sum of \$3 for each and every court that may sit in said house, except called courts for transacting administrative business." The board also, at this time, rented the upper story of the house owned by Daniel Faron, the same to be used as a jail, and Mr. Faron to be paid \$1 per month for the use of such story. Mr. Stidger's house was used as a court room under the above contract until 1814, when the contract was altered so that the owner was paid \$40 per year, and the court continued to sit there as before. In 1814, the tax on personal property was raised somewhat, but that on real estate remained at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. James Williams, County Collector for 1813, turned over to the Treasurer \$739.45, less his commission, etc. Soon after this the tax on real estate was raised to 1 per cent. This was rendered necessary on account of the enormous pressure brought to bear upon the Commissioners for building bridges, viewing and constructing roads, and the general expenses of the county. The following is the report in full of John Harris, County Collector, for 1814:

COLLECTOR'S REPORT.	Cr.	Dr.

The Collector for 1812 reported $265.80, and the one for 1815, $1,256.23. In 1815, the propriety of building a court house was discussed; but the matter did not take shape until the summer session of 1816, when proposals for the erection of a brick court house were received. On the 23d of July, 1816, the Commissioners entered into a contract with Thomas A. Drayton and John D. Henley for the erection of a brick court house, the same to cost $6,250, "exclusive of the bell, bell-frame, spire, ball and lightning rod." This building, with some modifications of details and price, was completed in 1817, and was immediately occupied by the county officers. This court house, with various alterations and additions, was used until the present one was built. In December, 1829, the Commissioners authorized the Auditor to give notice that sealed proposals for the erection of a county jail would be received; and, at a special session in February, 1830, they caused to be recorded: "After a careful examination of the several proposals laid in for the erection of a new jail, it is ordered that the contract be assigned to Calvin Hobart, he having agreed to furnish materials and complete the work for the whole building for the sum of $3,600; and it is further ordered that the said contractor enter into bond with sufficient security for the faithful performance of the work." This building was completed in January, 1831, and a settlement made with the contractor. In August, 1833, the Commissioners considered the advisability of altering and remodeling the court house; whereupon, it was "ordered that Dwight Jarvis, Esq., be authorized to employ W. W. Knapp, of Massillon, or some other competent mechanic, to go to Ravenna and take a plan of the court room at that place, and ascertain whether the court room at Canton can be so altered as to correspond with that, and to estimate the cost of such alteration." Nothing further seems to have been done regarding this order, for, in March, 1834, Eli Sowers was authorized to repair it in accordance with a plan he had prepared, for which he was paid $844.81. In January, 1836, the Commissioners called for proposals for the erection of a new court house, to accord with a plan they had at their office; but, for some unknown reason, nothing further was done in this particular. In June, 1842, it was decided to build a large structure for the county offices. The contract was awarded Francis Warthorst in September, the cost to be $4,475. The work was fairly begun in March, 1843, when the Commissioners were petitioned as follows: "Your petitioners, citizens of Stark County, respectfully solicit your honorable body to suspend the building of the county offices until after the expression of the will of the tax-paying citizens of this county, to be determined at the election to be held in the spring. Your petitioners, in making this request, would respectfully represent that they are desirous of ascertaining whether the tax-paying community of this county feel themselves in a situation, taking into consideration the present depressed state of monetary affairs of this State, to see built, at an additional tax of from $6,000 to $8,000, the said county offices; and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray." After carefully considering the petition, it was "ordered that, in consequence of the advanced state of the work of the contractor, and also the fact that the additional tax will be necessary to complete the building, the Commissioners deem it inexpedient to comply with the prayer of the petitioners." The buildings were accordingly completed. In December, 1843, the following curious preamble and order was adopted by the Commissioners:

WHEREAS, Great complaint has been made in various portions of the county, that the public offices, erected for the security of the public records and the convenience of the public, have been converted into gaming rooms, inducing idleness and immoral habits; therefore, it is ordered by the undersigned Commissioners of Stark County, that, from and after this date, every species of gaming, whether for amusement or for wager, is strictly forbidden and prohibited in the public buildings. And it is further ordered, that the Clerk of the board furnish a copy of the foregoing preamble and order for each room of the public buildings.

JOHN BRETZ, }
 GEORGE HOWNSTINE, } County
 WILLIAM DILLON, } Commissioners.

December 8, 1843.

On the 16th of May, 1849, the Commissioners, in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of Ohio, subscribed 1,500 shares, or $75,000, in the capital stock of the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the same to be paid in cash, or in the bonds of Stark County at par, at the option of the Commissioners. It was nearly twenty years before the last of these bonds were paid. The old brick court house erected in 1817, the jail erected in 1830, and the county offices erected in 1843, served the purposes of the county until 1867, when it was decided to construct new and better buildings. At this time, the laws of the State did not authorize County Commissioners to levy a tax to exceed $15,000 for the purpose of building court houses. It was therefore found necessary to secure a special enactment for that purpose. This was done as follows:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the commissioners of Stark County be, and they are hereby authorized, to build a new court house, with public offices, at the county seat of said county, on the lot now occupied by the old court house and public offices, at a cost not exceeding $100,000. The material in the old court house and public offices may, in the discretion of said commissioners, be used in erecting the new court house, or sold and the proceeds or any part thereof appropriated to the building or furnishing of said new court house.

SEC. 2. To enable the commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of this act, they are hereby authorized to transfer to the building fund and use for the purposes of this act any surplus of other funds now in the county treasury, or which may hereafter accumulate, not needed for the specific purposes for which said surplus was raised; and also raise by taxation on the property of the county whatever sum may be needed for said purpose, not exceeding in all the aforesaid aggregate amount of $100,000; but the taxes so levied shall not in any one year exceed $20,000. In anticipation of the collection of said taxes, the said commissioners shall have power to issue the bonds of said county in such sums and upon such terms, bearing legal rates of interest, and redeemable at the pleasure of said commissioners, which bonds shall not be sold for less than par value.

SEC. 3. Before determining upon a plan of said building, said commissioners may personally examine similar structures anywhere in the State; and they shall call to their assistance a competent architect or engineer to prepare drafts and specifications of the plan determined upon; and the work of the building of said structure may be done either under their own supervision or that of a superintendent, to be appointed by them and subject to their control, in accordance with the plan determined on by them, or any modifications thereof they may make.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

ED A. PARROTT,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ANDREW G. MCBURNEY,

March 14, 1867.

Speaker of the Senate.

Immediately after the passage of this bill, the Commissioners issued an order to the effect that, if the city of Canton would furnish $25,000 toward the general expense of completing the court house, an order would be issued for the erection of the same. This occurred on the 9th of April, 1867; and, on the 7th of May, the City Council of Canton notified the Commissioners that the above proviso was agreed to, and $25,000 would be donated for the purpose stated. The Commissioners advertised for plans and specifications, and, on the 12th of October, considered the following:

H. E. Meyer, brick building, stone wing.....	$ 93,000 00
J. C. Hoxie, brick building, stone wing, completed.....	100,000 00
George P. Smith, first floor stone, others brick.....	110,000 00
George P. Smith, brick building.....	87,000 00
George P. Smith, brick building, modifications.....	80,000 00
W. H. Frazer, stone building without furnace.....	100,000 00

On the 18th of October, the Commissioners decided to accept the plan proposed by J. C. Hoxie, and issued orders for sealed proposals for the erection of the building according to this plan. The following proposals were received and considered:

J. and G. Hickliffer.....	$ 95,000 00
Rob Greenlee.....	91,038 70

After due consideration, the board were unanimously in favor of accepting the proposal of Payser & Campbell. Henry E. Meyer, of Cleveland, architect and engineer, was employed, at a salary of $4,814, to superintend the erection of the building. Soon after this, Hoxie's plan, for definite reasons, was abandoned, and one prepared by H. E. Meyer was substituted in its place, the building to cost $98,000. This alteration of Hoxie's plan was used as an amendment to such plan. The contract as amended was signed by Commissioners and contractors March 11, 1868. The work on the building was commenced; court house bonds, bearing legal rates of interest, were ordered sold at par, as money was needed to meet the estimates of the architect; loans at reasonable rates were effected; and a tax, in pursuance of the above act, was levied. The work progressed rapidly, and, early in 1870, the building was completed and ready for occupancy. Soon afterward, the following settlement was made with Payser & Campbell:

The 22d of February, 1870 (Washington's birthday), was selected for the twofold purpose of celebrating the day in memory of Washington, and of dedicating the new court house. A large assemblage gathered in the court room on that day, where appropriate ceremonies were held in honor of the occasion. Eloquent and extended remarks were made by Dr. Tonner, John McSweeney, Esq., and others, the addresses of the former two being spread, by order of the Commissioners, upon the county records. The following explains itself:

At a Court of Common Pleas, begun and held at the court house in the city of Canton, within and for the county of Stark, and State of Ohio, at 10 o'clock A. M., on Monday, the 28th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and being the first term in the new court house.

Present—

HON. JOSEPH FREASE, Judge.
A. W. HELDENBRAND, Clerk.

R. A. DUNBAR, Sheriff.

In the record and proceedings of said Court then and there held, are the following, to wit: "Now comes Col. S. Meyer, and presents to the Court the proceedings and resolutions adopted at a meeting of the bar and officers of the Court, held at the court house on the morning of the 28th of February, previous to the opening of Court, and moved the Court that the same be entered on the journal, which was accordingly ordered done." The proceedings and resolutions are as follows, to wit:

"At a meeting of the members of the bar and officers of the Court, held at the new court house on the 28th day of February, 1870, to celebrate the completion of the same and its first occupation for public business, on motion of Col. S. Meyer, Hon. Joseph Frease was appointed Chairman, and A. W. Heldenbrand, Secretary. And, on further motion, a committee consisting of Col. S. Meyer, Alexander Bierce, Robert H. Folger, John McSweeney and Harvey Laughlin was appointed to draft resolutions suitable to the occasion. The following was offered by the committee: The committee appointed at a meeting of the bench and bar and other officers of the Court, to report a preamble and resolutions appropriate to the occasion of opening the new court house to the purposes of justice, beg leave to report as follows:

"WHEREAS, On taking possession of this stately edifice for the purposes contemplated by its builders, the people of the county of Stark, who have cheerfully borne great sacrifices to secure its construction, it is meet and proper that the bench and bar, with the various officers of the Court, who are called upon to exercise their respective functions and discharge their respective duties within its sacred precincts, now appropriately and solemnly dedicate the same to the administration of justice, therefore,

"Resolved, That his Honor, Judge Frease, on behalf of the bench and bar, and various offices of the Court, formally dedicate the same as a Temple of Justice, where a ready redress may ever be found for every wrong, and where the cherished rights of personal liberty, security and right of property will ever be sacredly enforced and secured, while now formally throwing open its portals for the administration of even-handed justice.

"Resolved, That the Court be prayed to cause the proceedings of this meeting, followed by the respective names of the members of the bench and bar and officers of the Court, to be spread on the journal and records of the Court as a perpetual memorial of the dedication of the new court house.

"By the Committee, S. MEYER, Chairman."
Names of the members of the bench.—Hon. Joseph Frease, Hon. George M. Tuttle, Hon. Norman L. Chaffee, Hon. Philo B. Conant.

Names of the members of the bar.—S. Meyer, Alexander Bierce, George E. Baldwin, J. J. Parker, James Amerman, A. L. Jones, Anson Pease, A. L. Baldwin, Robert H. Folger, Harvey Laughlin, William McKinley, Jr., John Lahm, William A. Lynch, W. B. Higby, Ed S. Meyer, Ed F. Schneider, W. C. Pippitt, James J. Clark, W. W. Clark, Louis Schaefer, John C. Stallcup, George W. Raff, John W. McCord.

R. A. Dunbar, Sheriff; A. W. Heldenbrand, Clerk.
On the motion to adopt the foregoing resolutions, stirring and effective remarks were made by Col. S. Meyer, Robert H. Folger, Alexander Bierce and John McSweeney, after which the resolutions were unanimously adopted, and, on motion, the meeting adjourned sine die.

Whereupon His Honor, Judge Frease, in some appropriate remarks, formally dedicated the new court room to the transaction of public business; and, to further signalize the occasion of the first occupation of said court-room, Court adjourned until 8.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

JOSEPH FREASE, Judge.

Since the erection of the court house, the county has gone to the expense of building a large, strong jail. The county buildings and the lots upon which they stand have cost the citizens in the neighborhood of $250,000. But few counties in the State have better court buildings than Stark. They are situated in the business center of the city, and their location and size render them conspicuous to all who catch a glimpse of Canton. When the court house was built, the citizens of Canton Township, through their representatives, agreed to give $1,000 toward the building of the court-house, provided they might have permanent use of a room in the basement for township purposes. The Commissioners agreed to this, adding, as a proviso, that the citizens would be expected to pay more toward the room, if necessary.

By special enactment of the Ohio Legislature, on the 25th of December, 1832, Carroll County was created, by which act Stark County was robbed of the townships of Brown (except the northern tier of sections), Harrison, Rose, and two tiers of sections on the western side of Sandy. This bill was stoutly opposed by the Stark County Representatives in the Legislature, and in general by the citizens throughout the county. Those who had chosen the above townships as their homes dreaded the thought of being separated from their love, "Mollie Stark," to whom they had become strongly attached. Notwithstanding the opposition, however, the division was made, and the citizens soon became reconciled to the situation. On the 16th of December, 1833, the Commissioners of Stark County, James Hazlett, James Downing and Nicholas Stump, and two of the Commissioners of Carroll County, John Shober and John W. Russell, met at Canton to divide the county funds, in accordance with the change that had been made in the territory of the county. This division of funds was calculated in the following manner: The total valuation of taxable property in Stark County in 1832 was $1,981,691. The valuation of that in Harrison Township for the same year was $58,814. That of Rose, $45,811. That of Brown, $52,958. That of the two tiers of sections on the east of Sandy, $13,056. That of one tier on the north of Brown, $5,188. Brown, Harrison, Rose and Sandy, added, give $170,639. Northern Brown deducted from this leaves $165,451. Then, as $1,981,691 is to the amount in the county treasury, $1,170.05, so is the valuation of the territory remaining in Stark County, $1,816,240, to the portion of the funds the county has a right to retain. This sum is found to be $1,072.35, which, deducted from the funds in the treasury; gives what was paid Carroll County, the amount being $97.70. On the 17th of February, 1834, the surveyors appointed by the two counties met at the residence of John Whitacre, in Paris, to locate the boundary dividing the counties. It may be truthfully said that those townships were better situated as part of the new county than as part of Stark. Time has not changed the condition.

In 1840, another bill, which was passed by the Legislature, robbed Stark County of two more townships. These were Franklin and Green. This bill, which was for the creation of Summit County, met with the bitterest opposition from Representatives and Senators whose counties were clipped to form the new. The bill was introduced in the House on the 17th of December, 1839, by the Chairman of the Committee on New Counties, and, from that time forward until its passage, on the 6th day of February, 1840, was fought inch by inch by Hons. John Smith and James Welsh, Stark County Representatives, but without avail, for, at the latter date, it slipped through the House by a majority of but three. In January, 1840, the bill was taken up by the Senate, but every possible effort was made to defeat it by Mr. Hostetter, of Stark, and others. The struggle was long and severe, but the friends of the measure were too strong, and at last the bill passed the Senate by a majority of four. It became a law on the 3d of March, 1840. On the 15th of May, George Kreighbaum, John Bretz and Peter Stemmel, Commissioners of Stark County, and John Hay, Jonathan Starr and Augustus E. Foote, Commissioners of the new county of Summit, met at Canton to make an apportionment of the county funds. The valuation of taxable property in Stark in 1839, was $2,698,773. The valuation of that in Green Township was $106,219, and that in Franklin was $96,940. The last two sums, added, give $203,159. There was in the county treasury at that time $4,158.19. By computation similar to that above, it was found that Summit County was entitled to $313, which sum was accordingly paid. No other notable alterations have been made in the original limits of the county. The following table shows the population of the county at different periods:

For a number of years prior to 1867, there was considerable talk in the county regarding the erection of a hospital for contagious diseases. The idea met the approval of many, and at last the Representatives in the Legislature were instructed to secure the passage of a bill authorizing the Commissioners of Stark County to appropriate from certain funds sufficient to meet such expense. The following is the bill:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the Commissioners of Stark County are hereby authorized to secure, by lease, donation or purchase, a suitable lot, lots or piece of land, in or near the incorporated village of Alliance in said county, and to erect thereon a building to be used mainly as a hospital for contagious diseases. They may also furnish the same in such manner as to secure the comfort and proper treatment of those who may become its inmates.

SEC. 2. To enable the Commissioners to execute the provisions of this act, they are hereby authorized to appropriate from the poor fund of said county an amount sufficient for the purposes named in the foregoing section, not exceeding the sum of $3,000.

SEC. 3. The Infirmary Directors of said county shall have the general management of said hospital when completed, and the same shall be subject to such lawful rules and regulations as they may prescribe. They shall provide for the reception and care therein of paupers chargeable to said county, who may be afflicted with contagious diseases. They may also provide for the admission of other persons suffering from disease, upon such terms and under such conditions as they may deem proper. They may also place such hospital temporarily under the immediate supervision and control of the Trustees of Lexington Township in said county.

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect on its passage.

ED A. PARROTT,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ANDREW G. MCBURNEY,

Speaker of the Senate.

April 13, 1867.

This bill was passed at the same session as the one providing for the erection of the court house, and but a month later. But the people of the county found that they had upon their hands a burden as great as they cared to bear when they began the building of the court house, and the hospital for the care of those afflicted with contagious diseases was dropped then and there, without ceremony, and has not been touched since. The hard times and the heavy taxation immediately succeeding the war were sufficiently oppressive without undertaking any additional expense other than that required to erect the court house. Although the erection of such a building has not since been seriously considered by the citizens of the county, yet one having a similar charitable object in view has been completed in the county, and is now occupied. Reference is made to the "Children's Home," near Alliance. The following is a portion of the law providing for the erection of such building:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That for the purpose of establishing a children's home in accordance with the provisions and regulations of the above recited act, so far as they may be applicable, the Commissioners of any two or more adjoining counties in this State, not to exceed four in number, may, and they are hereby authorized, when in their opinion the public good demands it, to form themselves into a joint board, and proceed to organize their respective counties into a district for the establishment and support of a children's home, and to provide for the purchase of a suitable site, and the erection of necessary buildings thereon, for the purposes contemplated and specified in the act to which this is supplementary.

SEC. 2. That said children's home shall be for the use, protection and benefit of such persons resident of the district wherein located, and of similar persons resident of other counties, who may be admitted under the provisions, requirements and regulations of the act to which this is supplementary.

SEC. 3. Provides for the appointment of Trustees.

SEC. 4. Specifies the powers of Trustees.

SEC. 5. The first cost of the home, and the cost of all betterments and additions thereto, shall be paid by the counties composing the district in proportion to the taxable property of each county, as shown by their respective duplicates, and the current expense of maintaining the home and the cost of ordinary repairs thereto shall be paid by the counties comprising the district, in proportion to the number of children from each county maintained in the home during the year.

SEC. 6. Provides for the expense of the Commissioners.

SEC. 7. Not to conflict with previous law.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

GEORGE L. CONVERSE,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ALPHONSO HART,

March 30, 1874.

Speaker of the Senate.

In accordance with the provisions of the above enactment, the Commissioners of the counties of Stark, Carroll, Jefferson, Columbiana and Mahoning met at Salem, Ohio, on the 26th of June, 1874, to consult in reference to the establishment of a children's home. It was here decided that the counties of Stark, Columbiana, Portage and Mahoning "would make a compact and suitably located district, generally easy and convenient of access." It was further decided that such home should not cost more than about $40,000, and that Alliance, or near there, would be a suitable place for its location. After the adoption of these considerations, the President of the meeting declared the four last-named counties formed into a district as provided in the enactment. At subsequent joint meetings of the Commissioners, dissatisfaction arose, and, after extensive discussion and maneuver, Portage and Mahoning Counties asked the privilege of withdrawing from the compact. This was granted, and the next meeting was held at Canton, by the Commissioners of Stark and Columbiana Counties. The meeting was made public, and was addressed by many prominent men in both counties, all of whom were in favor of the immediate erection of the home. About this time, an effort was made by a few men to withdraw Stark from the compact, but without avail. The following Trustees were appointed: C. K. Greiner, five years; James Davis, four years; Joshua Lee, three years; Joseph Oberlin, two years; and William Barber, one year. Two Commissioners and two Trustees were appointed to purchase a tract of land near Alliance. A farm of 153 acres, owned by Thomas Rakestraw, and located about three miles north of Alliance, was purchased for $13,770, and, on motion, was styled "Fairmount Children's Home." Plans for the building to be erected were considered, and, in July, 1875, the following proposals were received:

Augustus Vort.....	32,000 00

The erection of the building was awarded J. H. Morrison & Co. J. F. Buck, of Lancaster, was employed as Superintendent, at a salary of $1,000 per year. John Shirtzer was hired for $400 to work a year on the farm. Contracts were made to provide the building with gas and steam-heating apparatus. The entire cost of constructing the buildings was $53,094.02, and the expense of conducting the home for the first year was $9,025.75. The building was formally opened for the reception of children during the spring of 1877. The following is the report for the six months ending November 1, 1877:

Total children from Stark County.....	87
At the Home from Stark, Nov. 1.....	63
Total from Columbiana Co.....	57
At the Home from Columbiana, Nov. 1.....	41

Leaving in Home Nov. 1, 1877.....	104

In pursuance of Section 5 of the above enactment, it was found that Stark should pay three-fifths of the cost of constructing the building, and Columbiana two-fifths. The expense of each county in conducting the home is ascertained from the percentage of children from such county during the year. The number of children receiving the care of the institution has slowly increased. The erection of the home and its subsequent management have met with considerable opposition and discouragement, yet the institution, at present, is certainly doing good work, and reflects great credit on the eleemosynary spirit of Stark County.

It may be an item of some interest to our readers to know the names of the different post offices in the county, when established, etc. We give below a list of them, as furnished by the Post Office Department at Washington to Dr. Slusser, who has kindly placed them at our disposal. As early as December, 1834, the County Commissioners directed the Auditor to cause to be published in all the newspapers in the county a notice to the effect that the Commissioners would "pay \$10 for the best plan for a poor house, or the plan which may be adopted by the board, to be submitted on the 2d of February, 1835." The 2d came, but only two of the Commissioners were present, and the matter was postponed until the next regular session. It seems, however, that this was not the first move in this direction, as on the 17th of December, 1833, it was decided that the county must have a home for the poor. At this time, they bought of John Shorb and John Saxton a farm of about 150 acres, being a part of the northwest quarter of Section 33, Township 11, Range 8, paying for the same \$2,000. Beyond a doubt, the subject had been broached and discussed at earlier meetings of the board, but this was the first decided movement toward the carrying-out of the plan. In June, 1835, John Shank was employed to dig a well on the farm, which he did at the rate of \$1.50 per foot. At this time, a tax of $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mill was levied on the taxable property of the county, for the purpose of paying for the poor farm and erecting the necessary public buildings. In August, 1836, the board borrowed \$1,000 of the Canton Bank, the same to be used toward the erection of the poor house. After examining several proposals, Abraham Lind was finally employed to construct the building, and, on the 14th of July, 1837, it was taken, completed, from his control. The writer of this chapter could not learn the contract price of constructing the building. There was some misunderstanding regarding the cost of the building, as, in July, 1837, the board ordered an extra allowance of \$2,000 given to Mr. Lind; but, in September, this order was rescinded, and the whole subject of settlement between the contractor and the board was left to the following committee of arbitrators: Lot Goodspeed, Jacob Bahney, Benjamin Blier, John Gruble and Peter Troxell. The terms agreed upon are not recorded. Since this early day, various improvements and additions have been made to the farm and building, until at present the institution has quite an imposing appearance. The following is taken from a late number of the Canton Repository:

The infirmary is situated about two miles north of the city, the buildings being several hundred yards back from the road. They are reached by a neatly kept lane, bounded on each side by white-washed fences, and the visitor is first impressed by the air of neatness and order that everywhere prevails. The grass along the roadside and the lawn before the building is smoothly cut, and free from any signs of rubbish. The main portion of the building extends from north to south, with a wing at each extremity running backward. The main portion is 100 feet long, the north wing 112 and the south wing 100. It is two stories high, with a large double verandah running along the north and south sides. It was erected in 1837, and at the time of its completion must have been sufficiently ample in all respects for the use to which it was adopted, as well as a work of merit, from an architectural point of view; but such a length of time has elapsed since then, and the increasing demand for room growing proportionately with the increase in population, now makes it confined and inadequate to the demands upon it. The noticeable feature, remarked by all who visit it, is the superior manner in which it is governed and everything relative to it conducted.

The main portion of the building on the first floor is devoted to the private use of the Superintendent and his family, dining rooms in several departments, public rooms, as the office and room for the reception of visitors, rooms for household work and to other uses. In the basement of the main portion, which is on a level with the ground, are kitchens, storerooms and various other departments. The second floor is devoted to sleeping apartments. The north wing is reserved for the insane, corridors running the entire length of it on both floors, lined on each side by the various rooms.

On the first floor are the dining rooms, sitting rooms and some sleeping apartments. The wing is not entirely devoted to the insane, the large number of inmates necessitating a portion of the space being given to the other inmates. It is divided into male and female departments, communicating with each other by an iron door, generally locked, but during the day in warm weather open, to create as much draft as possible. The south wing is for the better class of inmates, and corresponds in general to that of the north.

The grounds comprise 230 acres of as good land as can be found. It is kept in the best condition and yields abundantly. In addition to the various smaller buildings devoted to their several uses, there is a large, handsome barn, completed last summer, and being 115x56 feet in size. As an idea of the quantity produced by the farm, the following yield of last year is given: 1,950 bushels of wheat, 3,000 bushels of corn, 1,700 bushels of oats, 1,500 bushels of potatoes and 110 tons of hay.

Throughout the entire building all is neatness and order, the walls and ceilings being nicely white-washed, and the wood work showing frequent applications of sponge and water. Those who are able among the inmates are assigned work suitable for them; the men being employed on the farm and out-door work generally, while the females are supplied with duties about the house. The aged and infirm, and those in any manner disqualified for labor, are to be seen sitting around in various places, on the many seats conveniently provided, or slowly walking from place to place. There are now 172 inmates in the infirmary, while the building contains eighty rooms. The first inmate was Samuel Miller, aged twenty-five, from Massillon, who died in November 1875; the last entered, Mrs. Preast, from Canton. The oldest inmate is Tim Simmons, aged one hundred and three, who came from Alliance about two years ago. Mr. Samuel Cromer, the Superintendent, has occupied that position for the past ten years.

At the March session of the Board in 1835, an order was issued appropriating $125 to aid in defraying the expense of transporting a fire-engine from Philadelphia to Canton, for use in the latter town. From the fact that the uses of steam at that day were comparatively unknown, and steam engines at best were but rude affairs compared with those at present, this movement of the citizens was not only a noteworthy one, but it must have been as much of an experiment as anything else. What the sequel was cannot be learned.

CHAPTER IV.*

—RAILROADS AND CANALS—THEIR EARLY CONSTRUCTION—PERFECT RAIL-ROAD SYSTEM OF THE COUNTY—PROJECTED ROADS.

FOR the first ten or twenty years after settlements began in what is now Stark County, society was but little divided by sectional lines. In church, politics and social matters, neighborhoods for miles about were closely allied by the necessities of the situation, and the people in the spirit of true democracy inquired only into the moral worth of the newcomer. The majority of the adults among the early settlers of the county had been members of some one of the Christian churches of their native States or countries, and at the first opportunity arrangements of more or less permanent character were made for Christian worship. Sectarian feelings, under the exigencies of the occasion, were lost sight of, or kept strictly in abeyance, and the different religious sects and denominations united to establish and continue religious worship on the Sabbath. Exercises were held in the cabins of the settlers, new and unoccupied buildings, barns, or in any place suited to the convenience of the time. Services commenced with the "singing of a hymn, in which all took part, and were able to keep time and sing in unison without the aid of organ or musical instrument," as we were informed by an aged pioneer. After the singing, a prayer was offered, when a sermon would be read by some one, and exhortations made, after which another hymn was sung, and the congregation dismissed. Says our informant: "Many of those who witnessed these religious exercises in the then wilderness cannot have forgotten the zeal, the good feeling, the solemnity, that was apparent. God smiled graciously on the first settlers and conferred upon them many and rich blessings while employed in rearing homes in these wilds. At the Sabbath prayer-meetings there was a marked reverence, and not a few can date back to those times and places their first and lasting religious impressions."

The churches of Stark County have passed through great changes since the days of their early organization. Many have died out, some have, as an organization, changed their creed, and others have sprung up and supplanted the older established ones. Religion itself, we almost fear sometimes, is like everything else we have at the present day—slightly adulterated, and wholly unlike the old genuine article proclaimed in the sermon upon the Mount. It may be, however, that we entertain some old foggy ideas on the subject, now obsolete, and not in keeping with the age in which we live. We will, therefore, leave criticism to those who are more dissatisfied with church management than we are, and will devote our attention to the organization of churches and church societies in this county.

The early settlers of the county were morally inclined, and religious meetings were held almost as soon as actual settlements were made. Just when and upon what precise spot the first church society was organized, we are unable to say. In Plain Township we have an account of religious meetings by Rev. Mr. Stough as early as 1806, and of the erection of a church there in 1809. A church was built in Jackson Township in 1814, by all religious denominations at that time represented in the township. It was of hewed logs and called "Zion's Church." The first preaching in Osna-burg Township, of which we have reliable information, was by Rev. William Mitchell, a Methodist circuit-rider. He was also the first preacher in Sugar Creek Township. Rev. Edward Otis was one of the pioneer Baptist preachers of the county. The first church in Sandy Township was built by the Presbyterians and Lutherans, of which denominations Rev. Joshua Beer (Presbyterian) and Rev. Mr. Wagenholtz (Lutheran) were the first preachers in this section. St. John's Catholic Church was organized in Canton in 1818, and the Presbyterian Church in 1821. A Methodist Church was organized in Lexington Township in 1819, and a church built in 1827. Revs. Weir and Faust, Lutheran and German Reformed ministers, were pioneers in Stark County. The Dunkards were the first religious sect in Nimishillen Township. The Quakers built the first church in Marlborough Township, and Rev. Richard S. Goe, a Swedenborgian, was the first preacher in Bethlehem.

Thus the different sections of the county were brought under religious influence, by the organization of churches, and the erection of temples of worship, until at the present writing, there are in the county over 130 church buildings, costing from $1,500 to $80,000 and upward each. This showing is pretty good evidence that the people have not retrograded from their early religious training.

Educational.—Nothing is more characteristic of the settlement of Ohio than the prominence which educational effort early attained in its social development. The settlements were sparse, and money or other means to secure teachers were obtained with great difficulty, but parents and children alike seemed to appreciate the great advantage which knowledge bestowed, and made endless sacrifices to gain this coveted gift. In many cases in Stark County, schools were begun and carried on without much hope of reward, and principally as a labor of love. Houses were built for school purposes, before there were children enough in the neighborhood to form a very full school.

These early schoolhouses were rude in construction, and partook much of the same general plan. Logs were cut sixteen, eighteen or twenty feet, according to the population of the district, and of these logs the walls were composed. When raised, "shakes" or clapboards covered the building. A rude fire-place, clap-board door, puncheon floor, the cracks filled with chinks, and daubed over with mud, completed the primitive schoolhouse of the pioneer period. The window, if any, was made by cutting out a log the full length of the building, and over the opening in winter was placed a well greased paper, that served to keep out the storm and admit the light. Just under this window, two or three strong pins were driven into the log in a slanting direction, and on these pins, a long puncheon was fastened, thus forming the desk upon which the writing was done. For seats, they used benches made from small trees, cut in lengths of ten or twelve feet, split open, and, in the round side, two large holes were bored at each end, which received the supporting legs, and house and furniture was complete. The books used by the pupils were as primitive as the house. The most popular reader was the New Testament, when it could be obtained, though occasionally a copy of the old "English Reader" was found, and very rarely, the "Columbian Orator" was in the family; Pike's and Smiley's Arithmetics; "Webster's Speller" was first used, and after awhile the "Elementary Speller" came in. Grammar was seldom taught; when it was, the text books were Murray's or Kirkham's grammars. The primitive schoolhouses were in keeping with the homes of the pupils. They were warm, if nothing more, as it was only necessary to make a bee and re-mud the spaces between the logs each fall before cold weather came on. Children who were bare-footed till the school commenced, and sometimes till the snows covered the hills and ice the streams, were not so sensitive to cold as pupils of these latter days. "I have often," said an old gentleman to us, "seen boys sliding down hill, and upon the ice with bare feet till mid-winter."

It was easier to build the houses and warm them, however, than to obtain money to pay teachers, small as the wages were—often but $1 a week for women, and $2 or $3 for men, and board with the pupils. Books cost money, and money was a commodity that was scarce in the country, so the books were not easy to obtain. There was no changing of readers then every session, as some gassy representative of a publishing house got the "weather-gauge" of a school board, and convinced them that the old readers in use were already obsolete, as at the present day. The instructors of those early times would make a poor show beside our present highly accomplished teachers, so far as knowledge of text books is concerned. It is no slander to say that teachers who could not master square-root, or who had not seen the inside of a grammar, were more numerous than those who dared to make pretensions to such qualifications. There was first no public fund available, and in a later period the fund for the payment of teachers was quite small, and what was lacking was made up by assessment pro rata on those who attended the school; hence the teacher was often compelled to wait for a part of the small sum promised him, till it could be collected. But let it not be supposed that there was no good work done in these schools. The reading, the spelling, the writing and the ciphering, so far as the teacher could go, need not have been ashamed to stand beside that of these days of high culture and extended literary attainment. The seeds sown broadcast in the forests have germinated and grown during these many years, and now we behold the magnificent harvest.

"Culture's hand
Has scatter'd verdure o'er the land;
And smiles and fragrance rule serene,
Where barren wild usurp'd the scene."

Prominent among the teachers of an early day in the common schools—and they were very common schools in those days—may be mentioned the following persons, viz., William Lee, Andrew Murray, John Laughlin, Andrew Johnson, Alpheus Brown, Lewis Probst, a Mr. Stevens, James Grounds, Cyrus Spink, Thomas Carmichael, Dr. B. Michener, David Lawson and others, whose names are forgotten. The first schoolhouse in the county is supposed to have been built in Sandy Township, about the year 1807, and the first built in Canton Township in the fall of 1808. Another schoolhouse known as the "Cameron Schoolhouse" was built in Sandy Township in 1815. The first school taught in Nimishillen Township was taught in 1814, in a schoolhouse built upon the land of Ulrich Spenley. Lexington Township had a school in 1820; Marlborough's first schoolhouse was built in 1825. A German school was taught in Canton in a log barn in 1809, and in Plain Township, we are told that a Mr. Stevens taught a school in the fall of 1808, and about the same year Bethlehem Township had its first school. The first select school in Perry Township was taught by the late Gen. Cyrus Spink. A log schoolhouse was built in Jackson Township very early and was occupied by a school, taught by Thomas Carmichael. Dr. Michener was the next teacher in Jackson, and is still remembered on account of his love for pure English. The first school in Sugar Creek Township was taught on the McFerren farm, and the first in Tuscarawas was taught in the winter of 1812-13, and was a night-school. Its first day school was taught some time later. These early schools were all "subscription schools;" that is, each family subscribed so many scholars, for which they paid so much per scholar for the session, as there were no public funds then. In contrast to that period, we give the following statistics from the last report of the State Commissioner of Public Schools:

In addition to the common and graded schools of the county, there is no lack of instruction of a higher order. Academies, seminaries and colleges within the county limits, afford to the student ample means of a complete, or even classical education. These institutions of learning will be fully written up in other chapters of this work. Mount Union College, the Charity School of Massillon, Canton Academy, and the defunct Alliance College will receive appropriate mention in their respective chapters. It is our aim, in this chapter, to take but the merest glance at the church and educational history, but to notice briefly the organization of schools and churches, leaving their progress and advancement for other departments of this work. With these words of explanation, we will turn to another subject.

The Press.—There is no more important feature in the history of the county's social development, or one which more accurately measures it, than the newspaper. A public servant in the truest sense, it lives only by the voluntary support of the people, and as a matter of necessity, in the main, reflects the average sentiment, enterprise and moral development of the community in which it appears. The people who settled Stark County, though an intelligent people, were not so great readers or close students as their neighbors, the Yankees of the "Reserve," but they, at an early day, showed their appreciation of the local press in a substantial manner which led to the establishment of the Canton Repository in the early part of 1815. This was the first newspaper issued in the present boundary of Stark County. Hitherto the people had been dependent for news on papers published elsewhere, but now, they had a paper of their own, which gave them quite a metropolitan air, and almost intoxicated them with their own importance. The files of the Repository have been bound and carefully preserved, and from them we may learn, not only much of the history of the county, but of the country at large. In the first volume one may read of Napoleon at Waterloo, and nearly sixty years later of the misfortune of another Napoleon at Sedan. It was established by John Saxton, and is still owned by the Saxtons, and is Republican in its political views. The Stark County Democrat was started in 1833 by John Bernard. It is now owned by A. McGregor & Son, and is the leading Democratic journal in this section of the State.

The press of the county can only receive a general mention in the present chapter, as it is fully written up elsewhere in this work. As one of the chief matters of interest and importance in each city and town, the press will be noticed with due attention in the history of those places. For general reference, however, we give the following list of the papers published in the county at the present time: Canton: Canton Repository; Stark County Democrat; Canton Republican; Ohio Volks Zeitung; Canton Courier. Massillon: American; Independent. Alliance: Review; Standard. Canal Fulton: Fulton Signal. Minerva: Monitor. There have been a number of papers established in the county, which flourished for a brief season—swept over the scene "like untamed meteors, flashed, darted and fizzled," and then went out. Their obituaries will appear in the history of the towns where they lived and died.

Roads and Highways.—Among the great forces that develop the moral growth of a community are the thoroughfares that connect it with the outside world. They are the arteries which carry the elements of the growth and vigor from the centers of church and school influence, and of commercial activity, to remote points; and the great hindrance to the rapid growth, both moral and material, in frontier communities in that early day, was this lack of easy communication with the rest of the world. Information of all sorts was meager and generally inaccurate, and a place ten miles away was less known to the pioneers for the first fifteen or twenty years than Europe is to us to-day. The papers were almost universally taken up too much with State and national affairs to mention local matters, and there was nothing to incite the community to a generous rivalry, or to awaken an enterprising enthusiasm.

One of the first roads in Stark County was known as the "Wooster Road," and passed through the county east and west. It was on this road that "Buckwheat Bridge" was built, one of the first, if not the first bridge in the county. The road passed through a large swamp near Canton, and into this swamp large quantities of buckwheat straw were thrown, and covered with sand and gravel, from which fact it received the name of Buckwheat Bridge. This was the commencement of public roads, and other important highways followed in rapid succession. For several years after settlements were made, the establishment of roads was unsettled. Each settler undertook to make a road to suit his own convenience. This, together with the uneven and hilly nature of the ground, has been the means of roads running in almost any direction, except to the cardinal points of the compass. It is proverbial that the roads of Stark County are about as zigzag as they very well can be made, unless there were more hills to go around. Notwithstanding their crookedness, however, they are about as good as are to be found in any community where there are no pikes. Bridges span the streams, and the steepest of the hills are graded down, thus making the roads as nearly level as circumstances will allow.

The next public thoroughfares to the wagon-roads were the canals. These artificial water highways antedate the Christian era, and were employed as a means of irrigation and communication by the Assyrians, Egyptians and Hindoos, and also by the Chinese, whose works of this kind are unrivaled in extent. These canals, however, were uniformly level, and it was not until the fifteenth century that locks were invented, showing thus how canals might be advantageously used for inland navigation. It was not until little more than half a century ago, that canals received much attention in the United States. The Ohio Canal was finished from Cleveland to Akron in 1827, and through to Portsmouth, on the Ohio River, in 1830.

The project, with estimates of its cost, was brought to the notice of the Legislature in 1824, and commissioners appointed. An act was passed in 1825, for interior improvement by a system of canals. The Ohio Canal was chartered, and work begun on it between Akron, in Summit County, and Cleveland. In December, 1825, the line was located between Akron and Massillon, and the contract for its construction let in January, 1826. So rapidly was the work pushed forward that the canal was completed, and, as we have said, opened through to Portsmouth in 1830. This highway of communication was the inauguration of a new era. It revived all branches of business, and, for the first time since the settlement of the county, merchants paid cash for wheat. Indeed its effects were felt throughout the entire country.

The old Sandy & Beaver Canal, which touches the southeast corner of the county, was built many years ago, and was intended as a kind of feeder, both in water supply and commerce, to the Ohio Canal. It extended from Glasgow, on the Ohio River, to Bolivar in Tuscarawas County, on the Ohio Canal. From some cause, it was abandoned more than thirty years ago. It still remains, as a means of irrigation and drainage to the district through which it passes. Its history, however, has little to do with the history of Stark County, touching, as it does, a very small corner of the county. But a measure, growing out of its construction, interested and excited the people of the city of Canton, and of the county, considerably at one time, viz., the "Nimishillen & Sandy Slackwater Navigation Company." "What's in a name?" said Shakespeare, and really there seemed in this case to be very little in this tremendous name, for the enterprise finally failed. It was the design of this company to build a canal by way of the Nimishillen and Sandy Creeks to the Sandy & Beaver Canal, some miles north of its junction with the Ohio Canal. It was to pass through Canton, thus giving it water communication with the world, and hence all of her business men of that day took an active interest in the project. Ground was broken on Walnut street with the most imposing ceremonies. A plow, drawn by ten yoke of oxen, and large enough almost to make a canal at one furrow, was used to make the commencement on this new internal improvement. The Sandy & Beaver Canal, in the meantime, dragged slowly along, and this enterprise was contingent, in some measure, upon the completion of that; funds, too, became scarce, and railroads were beginning to attract notice throughout the country, all of which, taken together, finally caused the abandonment of the Nimishillen & Sandy Slack-water Navigation project. But the railroad has destroyed to a great extent the value of canals, as a means of travel and transportation, except so far as carrying heavy freights, which are in no hurry to reach their destination.

The railroads now claim our attention, and as public highways constitute perhaps the most interesting chapter in the history of our country. The origin, progress and perfection of the railroad system are modern wonders that must ever command our earnest admiration. Wholly unknown to the commercial world three-fourths of a century ago, the railway has become the greatest single factor in the development of the material and social progress of not only of the United States and other civilized nations of the earth, but its inestimable blessings are being rapidly extended into the hitherto semi-civilized and barbarous portions of the globe. Though some rude tramways had previously been used in the mining regions of England, the first attempt at railroad building in the United States was in 1807. It was but a few hundred yards in length, and was built for the transporting of gravel from the top of Beacon Hill down into Charles street, in the city of Boston, the rails being entirely of wood, and the propelling power, the momentum of the loaded cars, which, in descending, by means of a rope attachment, pulled the empty cars up, a double track, of course, being necessary to the proper working of the road. As late as 1827, the then longest railroad in the United States was from the Mauch Chunk Coal Mines to the Lehigh River, in Pennsylvania, a distance of nine miles. The loaded cars were run from the mines to the river by their own gravity, and, on being emptied, were drawn back to the mines by mules.

The American people, from this time forward, became deeply interested in railroad enterprises, and from 1827 to 1830, several short lines, run by horse-power, were constructed. The first locomotive propelled by steam, to turn a wheel upon the American continent, being a clumsy, uncouth importation from England, called the

"Stourbridge Lion," landed in New York in 1829. So slow, however, was the development, that the railroad running from Charleston, S. C., to Augusta, Ga., a distance of 130 miles, and then the longest railroad in the world, was, in 1833, operated by steam power for only the first 100 miles, the last thirty being by negro-power. This was owing to a sharp incline that the modern engine-driver would laugh at, but which it was then supposed only a stationary engine, with the proper hoisting apparatus, could overcome. But this was before such achievements in the railroad era as bridging the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers and the crossing of the Rocky Mountains with trains. The first locomotive ever built in America, called the "Best Friend," was used upon this road during its construction. It was built at the "West Point Foundry Shops," in New York, and forwarded to Charleston by the ship Niagara, in October, 1830. The first trial trip was made on a small portion of the road out of Charleston, November 2, 1830, running, according to the report of the excursion in the Charleston Courier, as "on the wings of the wind, at the rapid speed of fifteen to twenty miles an hour; annihilating time and space, and, like the renowned John Gilpin, 'leaving all the world behind.'" The "Best Friend" was daily in service, transporting workmen and materials used in the construction of the road, until the 17th day of June, 1831, when it became disabled by a singular accident, and the road was without a locomotive for several months. Of this disaster to the "Best Friend," the Charleston Courier of June 18, 1831, gave the following account: "The locomotive, 'Best Friend,' started yesterday morning to meet the lumber cars at the forks of the road, and while turning on the revolving platform, the steam was suffered to accumulate by the negligence of the fireman, a negro, who, pressing on the safety-valve, prevented the surplus steam from escaping, by which means the boiler burst at the bottom, was forced inward, and injured Mr. Darrell, the engineer, and two negroes. The one had his thigh broken, and the other received a severe cut in the face, and a slight one in the fleshy part of the breast. Mr. Darrell was scalded from the shoulder-blade down his back. The boiler was thrown to the distance of twenty-five feet. * * * * * The accident occurred in consequence of the negro holding down the safety-valve while Mr. Darrell was assisting to arrange the lumber cars."

It will seem strange to the trained railroad operator of the present day that such an accident from such a cause could have been possible; but it must be remembered that the engineer, himself almost wholly unskilled in locomotive driving, had to perform all the functions of conductor, brakeman, etc., in addition to his own proper duties, his only help being such as above indicated, common, unskilled laborers, unable to distinguish between the lever of a safety-valve and the crank of a grindstone. But without further tracing the growth of the railroad system of the United States, now forming a perfect net-work of iron and steel in every portion of the country, which daily and nightly and continuously run thousands of locomotives and tens of thousands of freight and passenger cars loaded with thousands of tons of the products of the country, with valuable merchandise from any and every part of the world, and with tens of thousands of precious human beings, dashing with lightning speed from city to city, and from State to State, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Lakes to the Gulf, we will, with a few statistics of some interest, turn our attention to the sketching of the different railroads in Stark County. In January, 1832, it was reported that there were nineteen railroads, either completed or in course of construction in the United States, and that their aggregate length was nearly 1,400 miles. Though Congress afforded no material aid in this new era of internal improvements, yet this same year it exempted from duty the iron imported for railways and inclined planes, and actually used for their construction. In 1840, it has been estimated that our yearly average of railroad construction was about 500 miles. In 1850, this average had increased to 1,500 miles. In 1860, it was nearly 10,000 miles, and in 1871 it was stated that enterprises requiring an expenditure of $800,000,000 and involving the construction of 20,000 miles of railroad were in actual process of accomplishment. In 1872, the aggregate capital of the railroads of the United States, which were estimated to embrace one-half the railroads of the world, was stated to amount to the enormous sum of $3,159,423,057, their gross revenue being $473,241,055. At the present time their estimated capital is over

The first railroad touching Stark County, and which was carried to a successful termination, was the present Cleveland & Pittsburgh Railroad. Prior to this, however, railroad enterprises had been strongly agitated in the county. In 1830-31, a road was chartered to run from Pittsburgh to some eligible point on the Ohio Canal. Another early survey was for a road on the present line of the Valley Railroad. The people of Stark County took considerable interest in these projected roads, and for a time there seemed to be a strong probability of the county getting a railroad. But the time had not yet come, and the projects were abandoned, on account, it is said, of the supposed impracticability of the routes. It was not until nearly twenty years later that a road was built from Pittsburgh through Stark County, upon a less advantageous route as to heavy grades. The Cleveland & Pittsburgh Railroad which, as we have said, was the first road in the county, passing through a corner of Lexington Township and the town of Alliance, gives Stark but a few miles of track. A charter was granted for this road by the Legislature of Ohio on the 14th day of March, 1836. Work upon the road not being commenced within the three years designated in the law, the charter became dormant, and remained so for six years, when, by an act passed March 11, 1845—just nine years after the granting of the original charter—the project was revived and the charter amended. The promoters of the enterprise, though the times were hard and money scarce, prosecuted the work as rapidly as similar enterprises were then built, though very slowly in comparison with more modern railroad operations, the road not being completed on the Cleveland end as far as Hudson, in Summit County, until the latter part of the winter of 1851-52. From the beginning the Cleveland & Pittsburgh has been under an able and efficient management, and has never experienced any of those reverses and drawbacks so common to railroad corporations in their earlier days, and so disastrous and unprofitable to the original stockholders and builders. So small a part, however, of this road is in this county, that an extended notice of it can be of no great interest to our readers. It was duly finished, and it gave to Stark County two stations, Alliance and Limaville, which was better than no railroad.

The Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway was the next railroad built through the county. From the most reliable facts to be obtained, the history of this road may be thus briefly given: In February, 1848, the Legislature of Ohio passed an act incorporating the "Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad Company." On the 11th of April following, the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed a similar act, making the company a corporation of that State. The act of incorporation of the Ohio Legislature gave the company power to construct a railroad from Mansfield, in Richland County, eastward by way of Wooster, Massillon and Canton, to some point on the east line of the State, within the county of Columbiana, and thence to the city of Pittsburgh; and from Mansfield westwardly to the west line of the State. The work on this road was commenced in July, 1849, and the entire track was laid and the road was opened for travel from Pittsburgh to Crestline on the 11th of April, 1853. The Board of Directors had determined, in 1850, to make Crestline the terminus of the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad. This made further action necessary by the people west of this place, and the subject was warmly discussed for some time by the counties through which it must pass, west of Crestline—efforts that were eventually successful.

On the 20th of March, 1851, the Ohio Legislature granted a charter to the "Ohio & Indiana Railroad Company," for the purpose of building a road from some point on the Cleveland & Columbus Railroad, through Bucyrus and Upper Sandusky to the west line of the State, and thence to Fort Wayne, in Indiana. The organization of the company was completed at Bucyrus on the 4th of July, and officers elected. On the 10th of the same month J. R. Straughn was elected Chief Engineer, and work at once commenced in making surveys for the road. In September following, the Directors fixed the eastern terminus of the road at Crestline, to connect with the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad. In January, 1852, the contract was let for the entire distance between Crestline and Fort Wayne, and prosecuted with so much vigor that on the 1st of November, 1854, it was ready for the passage of trains. The people in the counties between Fort Wayne and Chicago, determined to make a strong effort to build the last link in the chain between Philadelphia and Chicago. A convention was called at Warsaw, Ind., in September, 1852, for devising ways and means for accomplishing the object. This meeting was largely attended, and the object in view was finally accomplished. In 1856, the work was so nearly completed on this new line, that by using a portion of the Cincinnati, Pennsylvania & Chicago Railroad, a continuous line was opened on the 10th of November, 1856, from Pittsburgh to Chicago. On the 1st of August, 1856, the three corporations—the "Ohio & Pennsylvania," the "Ohio & Indiana," and the "Fort Wayne & Chicago"—were consolidated under the name and title of the "Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway," by which name it has ever since been known. Stark County took stock in the original Ohio & Pennsylvania road to the amount of $105,000. This was increased up to 1854, by the issue of stock dividends, to $127,000. When the consolidation of the three companies took place, the Ohio & Pennsylvania stock was considered more valuable than that of the other companies, and in the new issue of stock certificates, the amount held by Stark County became, in round numbers, $172,000, which was subsequently sold by the commissioners to pay off the bonds issued by the county for the payment of the original stock. Such is a synopsis of the facts pertaining to the building of this, one of the best railroads in the United States, and the first to lay its lines through the full length or width of Stark County.

The Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway belongs to the Pennsylvania system, and is the direct source of its communication with the great West. Says a local writer, dilating upon the subject: "Where was once an isolated wilderness is now a thriving garden, connected with all parts of the continent. Less than a generation ago, the necessary supplies of life could be secured only by tedious journeys through almost trackless forests; now we take the cars and speed away to the best market in the world in less time than the pioneers went forty miles to mill on horseback, with a bushel of grain divided between the two ends of the sack."

A railroad operated at present by the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, or rather by the Pennsylvania Company, known as the "Massillon & Cleveland Railroad," deserves some mention in this connection, as a part of the Stark County system. The Massillon & Cleveland Railroad (commonly called the Massillon Branch) was built by the Massillon & Cleveland Railroad Company, and runs from Clinton, in Summit County, to Massillon, in this county, a distance of some eight or ten miles, only. This road was leased to the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway Company June 22, 1869; lease assigned by that company to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company July 1, 1869; and by that company and the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway Company lease assigned to the Pittsburgh, Mount Vernon, Columbus & London Railway Company (now Cleveland, Mount Vernon & Delaware Railroad Company), November 4, 1869. The road is owned by the Massillon & Cleveland Railroad Company, and is now (1881) operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company operating the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway.

The Cleveland, Tuscarawas Valley & Wheeling Railway is the next road claiming our attention. It enters Stark County at the northwest corner, passes through Canal Fulton, Massillon, bearing southwest through Sugar Creek Township, and leaving the county near the southwest corner. It was originally chartered as the "Cleveland, Medina & Tuscarawas Railroad," and work begun on the northern end of it as early as 1852, and a considerable amount of grading done between Grafton and Seville. The main interest in this road centered in Medina County, which at that time was without railroad communication. Bonds were issued, stock subscribed, and great energy displayed by the people of that county. But the enterprise met with many reverses and misfortunes. The bonds which had been issued and placed in the hands of a broker in New York for negotiation, were squandered by him and ultimately lost to the company. This misadventure prostrated the whole enterprise, and work on the road stopped at once, leaving large liabilities to be borne by those who had taken an active part in the project. Though greatly disappointed, the people of the sections to be most benefited by it, were by no means discouraged or dispirited by the unfortunate termination of their enterprise, and ways and means of reviving the Tuscarawas road were constantly discussed. Many propositions were made, and routes suggested, when, on the 31st of March, 1871, the Lake Shore & Tuscarawas Valley Railroad Company was organized. The company went to work, solicited subscriptions along the route, Massillon responding with $25,000 and Navarre $17,000. Under the new organization work was begun on the southern end of the road at Grafton on the 3d of November, 1873, much of the old road-bed being used. The title was finally changed to the "Elyria & Black River Railroad Company," and under this organization completed. The subsequent history of this road has not been completely satisfactory, though quite in keeping with the general history of railroads. Becoming involved, a receiver was appointed in 1874, and on the 26th of January, 1875, it was sold, and the name and title again changed, this time to the "Cleveland, Tuscarawas Valley & Wheeling Railway" (which title it still bears) and a new company formed to operate it. In 1879, the road was extended from Urichsville to Wheeling by the way of Flushing. It has twenty-three and eighty-seven hundredths miles of main track in Stark County, with sidings at Massillon and Canal Fulton, and is of considerable value to the county.

The Valley Railway, extending from Cleveland to Canton, is another railroad that is of material benefit to Stark County, and at the same time, of the utmost advantage to Canton, as giving it more direct communication with Cleveland. As early as 1869, a charter was obtained for the Akron & Canton Railway, which afterward developed into the larger and more important enterprise, the Valley Railway, duly incorporated on the 21st of August, 1871. The authorized capital stock of the company was $3,000,000, the road to run from Cleveland, in Cuyahoga County, via Akron, in Summit County, Canton, in Stark County, through Tuscarawas and Carroll Counties to Bowerston, in Harrison County, on the Pan Handle Railroad. The first great movement for the promotion of the enterprise was made at a meeting held at the Academy of Music, in Akron, on the 4th day of January, 1872. Representatives from Cleveland, Canton, Wheeling and intermediate points on the contemplated route were in attendance. The meeting was presided over by James A. Saxton, Esq., of Canton, with Mr. H. Cochran, of Wheeling, as Secretary, and Hon. Stephen H. Pitkin, of Akron, as Assistant Secretary. David L. King, Esq., of Akron, briefly stated the objects of the meeting, saying that the project of a road down the valley of the Cuyahoga, from Akron to Cleveland, and south from Akron to Canton and Wheeling, was no new project. Such a road, Mr. King said, would develop large quantities of coal and other minerals south of Akron, and a locomotive, after drawing an ordinary train to Akron, could by reason of continuous down grade, draw as many loaded cars from Akron, as the same locomotive could draw empty cars back. The importance and feasibility of the road was conceded by all, the discussion being mainly over the question of gauge, estimates being presented showing the comparative cost of both the standard, four feet eight and one-half inches, and the narrow, three feet tracks. At the conclusion of the discussion, the following resolution was unanimously adopted :

Resolved, That it be the sense of this meeting that all our efforts be devoted to raising stock for the ordinary four-foot eight and one-half inch gauge.

Subscription books were opened at Cleveland, Akron, Canton, and intermediate points on the 15th day of January, 1872, and a vigorous campaign opened "all along the line," for raising the necessary funds to build the road. Cleveland parties were pledged to raise $500,000, the quota assigned to Akron and Canton being $150,000 each, with such additional amounts as could be raised at intermediate points in the several counties interested. Meetings were held, speeches were made and subscriptions were obtained with commendable celerity. Canton was the first to announce that her full share was raised, Akron coming in soon afterward with a similar good report. Cleveland, however, was backward, trusting to the plan of raising the requisite amount, under the Boessel law, by a tax upon the city. The proposition, however, was voted down, though the amount pledged was subsequently raised by voluntary subscriptions to the capital stock of the company through the vigorous efforts of her soliciting committees. Other localities subscribed more or less liberally, so that the total amount subscribed in each of the three counties was as follows: Cuyahoga, $508,250; Summit, $191,700; Stark, $149,750. The first stockholder's meeting was held April 24, 1872, at which James Farmer, Ambrose B. Stone, and

Nathan B. Payne, of Cleveland; David L. King and John F. Sieberling, of Akron, and James A. Saxton and George Cook, of Canton, were elected Directors. At a subsequent meeting of the Directors the same day, James Farmer was elected President; David L. King, Vice President, and Warwick Price, Secretary and Treasurer. At a meeting of the Directors held May 10, 1872, Plymouth H. Dudley, of Akron, was appointed chief engineer for the road. The route was finally agreed upon, and the contract for building the entire line from Cleveland to Bowerston was awarded to Nicholas E. Vansickle and Arthur L. Conger, of Akron, on the 3d day of February, 1873. The work was commenced at once, and a report made to the Board of Directors on the 5th of August, 1873, stated that nearly two thirds of the distance from Cleveland to Canton were graded, and that with favorable weather the remainder could be completed and ready for track-laying by the 1st of October. These anticipations, however, were not realized, and a difference of opinion having arisen between the Directors and contractors, Messrs. Vansickle and Conger, the contract was canceled, and the work suspended on the 16th of May, 1874. Reuben Hitchcock was elected President of the company, April 24, 1874, but on account of failing health, a few months later, was compelled to tender his resignation, and David L. King was elected in his place, on the 25th of September, with James Farmer as Vice President. The general stagnation of business, and especially of all new railroad enterprises, following the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., rendered the immediate resumption of work impossible. The Directors, as a condition precedent to Mr. King's acceptance of the Presidency, individually assumed the entire liabilities of the company, which, owing to inability to collect stock subscriptions, amounted to over $150,000—a burden from which the Directors were not relieved until April, 1879. But, by the self-sacrificing assumption of this responsibility, the life of the company was saved through the long period of financial distress the country was then experiencing. Failing, through the stringency of the times, to secure aid in this country to complete the road, at the earnest solicitation of the board, Mr. King sailed for England, on the 6th day of February, 1875, to present the advantages of the investment to the capitalists of London. After weeks of patient effort, struggle and disappointment, he finally succeeded in securing a proposition for the sale of the company's bonds on highly advantageous terms, and a time was fixed for the execution of the contract. On the morning of the day agreed upon for closing the matter up, the publication, in the London papers, of the report of a committee of the House of Commons, discrediting the value of American securities in general, and railroad securities in particular, together with a cable dispatch received from New York, published in the same papers, that the Toledo, Wabash & Western Railroad (a very large amount of the bonds of this road being held in London) had passed into the hands of a Receiver. By the advice of the parties with whom he had been in negotiation, Mr. King returned home without having accomplished the object of his mission, to "await the logic of events," as it was considered damaging to future sales, on the return of prosperity at home, to urge the bonds of the company further upon the attention of English capitalists at that time. The merits of the line were, from time to time, brought by President King before the capitalists of Cleveland and the East, and a succession of struggles to keep the enterprise alive were continued for three years longer, happily resulting in placing the bonds on highly favorable terms at home with Cleveland and New York capitalists, the capital stock having in the meantime (April 13, 1876) been increased from $3,000,000 to $6,500,000. On the 7th day of August, 1878, the work on the line between Cleveland and Canton was resumed by the new contractors, Messrs. Walsh and Moynahan, the first rail upon the line being laid and the first spike driven by President King, at Akron, at a point near the "Old Forge," at 12 o'clock M., on the 26th day of October, 1878, track-laying being immediately proceeded with from this point both ways, and also commenced in Cleveland a few days thereafter. The operations of the new contractors not proving satisfactory to the company, the contract with them was annulled, on the 25th day of January, 1879, and the work again temporarily suspended. Subsequently, a new contract was made with Messrs. Strong and Cary, and work resumed on the 3d day of June, 1879. The road was finally completed through from Cleveland to Canton, in the winter of 1879-80. The first continuous train from

Cleveland to Canton, with the officers, Directors, and other friends and promoters of the road on board, started from Cleveland at 9:30 A. M., January 28, 1880. Making short stops at the several stations on the route, the train arrived at Canton about 1 o'clock P. M. Starting from Canton on the return trip at 3 o'clock P. M., the run from Canton to Akron, twenty-two miles, was made in thirty-eight minutes, the entire trip from Canton to Cleveland, fifty-nine miles, being made in two hours—a remarkable run, considering the newness of the road, and evincing a very excellent degree of work in the laying of the track and the ballasting of the road-bed. The first regular trains commenced running February 2, 1880, and have continued uninterruptedly to the present time, with constantly increasing freight and passenger traffic, and though, by reason of the partial occupation of the ground by other similar enterprises and prospective connections, the extension of the road beyond Canton has been indefinitely postponed, the Valley Railway may well be considered a successful venture for its promoters, and a very valuable acquisition to the travel and transportation facilities of the people all along the line.

The Tuscarawas Branch of the Cleveland & Pittsburgh Railroad touches a corner of two townships in Stark County, passing through Minerva, in Paris Township, and Waynesburg, in Sandy Township. It, however, has but a limited space in the railroad history of the county. It was built a good many years ago, and extends from Bayard to New Philadelphia. Its completion at a time when Stark had few railroads, gave it some importance, but at present, when her system is well nigh perfect, it is of no material benefit, except to the two towns through which it passes.

The latest accession to the railroad system of Stark County is the Connotton Valley Railway. It is a narrow-gauge road (three feet) and though intended more especially for the transportation of coal, its complement of rolling-stock embraces an adequate supply of box freight cars, and elegantly finished and furnished passenger coaches. The southern terminus of the road is at Bowerston, on the Pan Handle road in Harrison County, and its northern terminus Fairport, on Lake Erie, with a branch to the city of Cleveland. The line passes through Carroll, Stark, Summit, Portage and Cuyahoga Counties ; the capital stock is $3,000,000, the funds being furnished mainly by Boston capitalists, though a majority of the Directors are the proverbial "Ohio men." The Connotton project grew out of the old Ohio & Toledo road, running from Carrollton to Minerva. This road was bought in 1878-79 by N. A. Smith, C. G. Patterson and others, who extended it to Dell Roy. Some time in 1879 Mr. Patterson conceived the idea and made it public, of running the road from Oneida, the original northern terminus of the Ohio & Toledo road, to Canton. He succeeded in interesting other parties both at home and abroad, resulting in the final organization of the Connotton Valley Railway Company. No aid or donations or bonds were asked, only a free right of way. Work was begun and pushed forward so vigorously that the road was completed to Canton early in May, 1880, and appropriately celebrated by an excursion of its friends from the south-east to Canton, where they were dined and wined to their hearts' content. Its completion to Osnaburg Village a short time previous, was duly celebrated in that suburban burg.

Upon the completion of the road to Canton, it was decided to extend it on north to Fairport, on Lake Erie, two miles north of Painesville, with a branch to Cleveland. An effort was made to sell the Alliance & Lake Erie road to the company, but this offer was declined, the company preferring to build a new road, if a free right of way could be obtained, rather than undertake the organization of any more railroad wrecks, as the Ohio & Toledo had been rather expensive in this respect. Work was begun on the northern extension under the most favorable auspices, and at the present writing it is being rapidly pushed forward. The entire length of the road is 118, sixty-two miles of which is now (May, 1881) in running order, being completed as far north as Mogadore, in Summit County, and as far south as Dell Roy, in Carroll County, and it is expected that cars will be running over the entire line by July of the present year. This road passes through from sixteen to twenty miles of valuable coal fields, fine beds of iron ore, potters' clay, building-stone, etc., besides having on its line some of the most enterprising manufacturing cities and villages in Northern Ohio.

The present officers of the road are as follows : William J. Rotch, of New Bedford, Mass.,

President ; Samuel Allen, of Dell Roy, Carroll County, Vice President ; A. B. Proval, of Canton, Stark County, Secretary and Treasurer ; W. N. Moffat, formerly of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, Superintendent, and Robert Leamouth, formerly of the Pan Handle road, Roadmaster. The machine and repair shops, and the general offices of the company, are located at Canton. The Depot buildings are among the finest in the country, and an ornament to the city. The main building is 230 feet long and extends from Tuscarawas street to Fifth street, and is 40 feet wide, exclusive of porches which run along the entire building on each side. The structure is built of pressed brick, laid in black mortar, and with white sand-stone trimmings, giving it a very handsome appearance. It has a tower on Tuscarawas street, 96 feet high, containing an elegant clock which tells off the passing moments by Columbus time. The first floor is devoted to waiting rooms, toilette rooms, ticket and telegraph offices, baggage room, etc. Upon the second floor, which is reached by both a front and back stairway, are eleven rooms, used as follows : General manager's office, general business office, Secretary and Treasurer's office ; Auditor's office ; general freight office ; general ticket agent's office ; Conductor's room ; Superintendent's office ; train dispatcher's office ; roadmaster's room ; Chief Engineer's office, and Engineer Corps' room, all of which are finished off in the best style, and are well, and even elegantly, furnished.

In addition to the railroads of the county now in active operation, or in process of actual construction, there are quite a number, that as yet have only been constructed on paper. The Steubenville, Canton & Lake Erie is one of the latter kind. It is the object of the company advocating this line to run a road up Wills Creek, and tap the Island Creek road, a few miles from Steubenville. Thence to Salineville where it will tap the Cleveland & Pittsburgh, and also a new road coming down from New Lisbon. Thence it is to go to Minerva and Canton, connecting at the latter place with the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago road. From Canton it will have direct communication with Cleveland. It is in the hands of practical and energetic men, and no doubt but it will sooner or later be built. It will be a valuable accession to the Stark County system when completed.

The Cleveland, Canton, Coshocton & Straitsville Railroad, is an enterprise that was organized some years ago, and at one time seemed likely to develop into a reality. A company was formed, a charter granted for a standard gauge, to connect with the Valley Railway at Canton, considerable stock subscribed, and work actually begun on the line of road, and a good deal of grading was done. But from some cause it languished and work finally ceased. Recently (May, 1881) it was purchased by the Connotton Valley Railway, and will be finished immediately as a narrow-gauge road. It is to be extended 105 miles in a southwesterly direction from Canton, passing through Massillon, Coshocton, Straitsville and the Hocking Valley coal district, reaching many important towns, notably Zanesville and Coshocton, and terminating at a central point in the Hocking Valley coal-field. It will be a valuable feeder to the Connotton Valley system, and of the greatest advantage to Canton, in bringing immense quantities of coal and other freight to its doors for transfer and re-shipment.

The property acquired by the Connotton in this purchase, involves the right of way through the central part of Ohio for 50 miles, and an amount of grading, upon which was expended some $400,000. Work was begun on this extension under the auspices of the new management, and it is believed that much of it will be finished during the present summer.

The Baltimore, Pittsburgh & Chicago Railway, which we believe is also a narrow gauge, is another paper railroad, at least so far. From the agitation of the project, however, it is altogether possible to build such a road, especially if it is sufficiently pushed forward in the present great railroad boom now passing over the entire country. The surveyors of this projected road have just surveyed a route through Minerva, in this county, and down the Sandy Valley, and of this route they speak in high favor.

The Canton & Canal Dover Railroad is another of the prospective roads of Stark County. It has been incorporated and a company formed with a capital of $750,000. It will be 23 miles in length and will connect the Valley Railway with the Pittsburgh roads, and will also form the connecting link between Marietta on the Ohio River and Cleveland. This road, though short, will be an important one to Canton and to the county at large.

How many more railroad irons Stark County has in the fire it is impossible to say, but doubtless there are a number of projected roads that have not yet come to the surface. We have noticed all the roads of the county that have been completed, as well as those contemplated, so far as we have been able to obtain facts regarding them. If any have been omitted it is an oversight and occurred through the multiplicity of roads to be looked after and written up. The railroads form an important part of county's history, but space allows but a brief sketch of them in a work of this character, and we leave the subject without further remark.

CHAPTER V.*

WAR HISTORY—THE REVOLUTION—CAPT. STIDGER'S COMPANY OF 1812—STARK COUNTY DURING THE MEXICAN WAR—OPENING SCENES OF THE GREAT REBELLION—SKETCHES OF THE REGIMENTS—THE DRAFT—AID AND OTHER SOCIETIES—GREAT RE-UNION OF 1880—OBSERVANCE OF DECORATION DAY.

When the long years have rolled slowly away,
E'en to the dawn of earth's funeral day;
When at the Archangel's trumpet and tread,
Rise up the faces and forms of the dead;

* * * * *
Then the glad ears of each war-martyred son
Proudly shall hear the glad tidings "well done."
Blessings for garlands shall cover them over,
Parent and husband and brother and lover,
God will reward those dead heroes of ours,
And cover them over with beautiful flowers.

—Carleton.

DIFFERENCES of opinion have been adjusted from time immemorial by the arbitrament of war. Individuals, dissatisfied with existing relations, have invoked the god of battles, and turned the red hand of slaughter against their brethren. Others, instigated by passion, ambition or caprice, have, by the powers of will or genius, strewn the earth with human clay, and filled the heavens with woful lamentations. Nations, delighting in conquest, and, seemingly, in slaughter, have shaken the earth with their elephantine tread, and scattered the hard-earned products of civilization with infinite disregard. Others have united in hideous schemes to deluge the world with blood, until the name of civilization has seemed a synonym for unlimited reproach. Enlightened man converts into an art the barbarous plans of human destruction, and establishes institutions of learning wherein are taught the most gigantic and expeditious modes of terminating life. The world witnesses a strange paradox when man, after thousands of years of moral and intellectual advancement, still resorts to his physical nature to secure subservience to his desires. Might, not right, still rules the world with despotic sway. War, as a result of dissimilar views, necessarily follows from conflicting enlightenment in all departments of human thought. So long as minds refuse to see alike, conflicts will occur, storms of war will trouble the earth, and the reign of peace will be clouded. The first war with which Stark County had any connection was the Revolution. Although at that time no white men lived within the present limits of the county, except, perhaps, a few missionaries, whose object was peace, yet so many of the settlers who afterward came to the county were in the struggle for independence, that reference, though brief, must be made to that war. The causes of the Revolution and the terms by which the colonies became free and independent, are too familiar to be detailed here. It is thought that the hardest times the country has ever seen immediately succeeded the establishment of peace. The colonies were no less than bankrupt, and privations and hardships in the most direful degree were willingly borne when victory and peace were secured. The paper money, by means of which the war was carried on, was worthless, and the harvests, of necessity, had been so nearly neglected that starvation stared the colonies in the face. Time alone, and at last, retrieved the havoc of war. When the country had in a measure recovered from the stroke, enterprising men and women began to push Westward. The Government offered extra inducements to settlers, and finally the rush for the West became so great that the settlers began to unlawfully invade the territory of the Western Indians. This brought down upon them numerous and bloody wars with the savages. Soon after Ohio, as a State, was created, settlers began to boldly appear, regardless of the rights of their red neighbors. It has been estimated that 10 per cent of the white men who located in the county prior to 1815 had been engaged in the war for independence. The names of many of them will be found in

At last another war with Great Britain cast its dark shadow over the land. When it became known in the West that war was inevitable, and had really been declared, the settlements were filled with distrustful forebodings. A coalition between the British and the Indians was anticipated, and, as soon as it became certain that this dreaded alliance had been effected, the pioneers throughout Eastern Ohio made hasty preparations for defense. Block-houses were erected in the more exposed localities, and in all places the militia mustered and equipped themselves with the implements of war. In almost every settlement in the eastern part of the State, companies were organized for a determined resistance against any foe that might appear. A large block-house, about eighty feet square, was built at Wooster, but Canton, being an older settlement, in a less-exposed situation, and well supplied with brave men, concluded to forego the luxury of such a building. As nearly as can be ascertained, Canton, at that time, was the headquarters of the Third Regiment of the Second Brigade of the Fourth Division of Ohio Militia. Several companies belonging to this regiment had been accustomed, for a number of years, to muster in different portions of the county, principally at the county seat. At last a call for troops was issued, and a movement was instituted to effect the organization of a company at Canton from the militia. George Stidger, who had seen active service in former years in the Eastern States, and who, it is said, had been honored with a General's commission, was elected, or appointed, Captain. The company was yet incomplete, when a draft was ordered, and enough men were secured to form a respectable company of about seventy. Several men were drafted, who, from the fact that they had families dependent upon them for support, found it extremely inconvenient to leave home, and substitutes were called for. One hundred dollars became the prevailing price for a substitute, and a sufficient number to meet the demand were secured at this figure. The following is a complete list of the members of this company, secured after a great deal of trouble, from the Third Auditor of the United States Treasury, where the rosters of the Ohio volunteers of the war of 1812 are on file: George Stidger, Captain; Robert Cameron, Lieutenant; Daniel McClure, Ensign; John Miller, John Shorb, William V. Chamberlain, Christian Flickinger, Sergeants; George Cribbs, Jacob Essig, John Rowland, Moses Andrews, Corporals; Thomas Neily, Bugler; and the following privates: Ezekiel Alexander, William Andrews, James Andrews, Thomas Alexander, William Brouse, James Black, Phillip Brouse, John Brouse, John Cutshall (perhaps Gotshall), John Clinger, George Crasimore, John Carper, Benjamin Croninger, Garret Cruson, Alexander Cameron, Samuel Duck, George Dewalt, Adam Essig, John Elder, Daniel Farber, James Gaff, Robert Gaff, Thomas Hoffard, John Kroft, John Koontz, George Kirkpatrick, Henry Livingston, Samuel McClellin, George Monroe, Jacob Myers, James Moore, John Potts, Samuel Patton, John Rogers, Abraham Rose, James Riddle, John Rise, Jacob Swigert, John Slusser, William Smith, Daniel Stephens, Thomas Shields, John Shineberger, Jacob Slusser, Robert Sorrels and Bezaleel Thompson. It is not known whether this is the roster at the time of muster in or muster out. It is probable that others than those mentioned above served in this company, in which case their names would appear on the roll, as made out by the officers of the company at the time such men served. Such rolls are probably long ago destroyed. It is probable that the company was ordered into the service of the Government during the summer of 1812. The period of enlistment was six months. The British and the Indians were congregating at or near Detroit, and to hold them in check, several companies, organized in the eastern part of the State, and in Pennsylvania and Virginia, were ordered to the Maumee River, where they were to mass and unite on a means of attack or defense. Capt. Stidger's company was first ordered to Wooster, where the troops remained a month or more, doing guard duty and enjoying themselves in a multitude of ways. Their base of supplies was at Canton, where beef, corn-meal, flour and other provisions were prepared and forwarded by wagon. Scouts were dispatched to inspect the neighboring Indian villages, and to notify the troops and the set-lements of impending danger. Finally, the company received orders to proceed westward to Perrysburg, on the Maumee River, and to report there to the commanding General. The Stark County boys remained in this vicinity, enjoying themselves in every manner except encountering the enemy, until a short time before their period of enlistment had expired, when they were discharged and sent home. They had seen no active service, much to their declared disappointment. After this, although they were not in the service, yet, knowing that the war was not over, and that attacks from Indians might be expected at any moment, they did not disband, but mustered regularly one or more times a week, to be in readiness for a possible attack, or for another call from the Government. However, they were not called out again.

During the early stages of the war, a regiment of soldiers from Pennsylvania, passing through Canton with some thirty pieces of ordnance, stopped for the night. It is related by Daniel Dewalt, whose father kept a tavern, that one of the men in charge of a cannon traded both his horses, which were good ones, but used up by the journey, for one horse belonging to the former, giving at the same time $80 to boot. "As I sold one of the horses soon afterward for $100, that," says Mr. Dewalt, "was the best horse trade I ever made." Many interesting incidents are related of circumstances growing out of the war. On one occasion, it was reported by several men who had just arrived from the North, that the British were coming, that they had been seen disembarking from vessels on the lake, and that their appearance might be expected at any moment. This was sufficient to rouse the citizens to the utmost, and immediate preparations were made to receive the enemy in a fitting manner. Dwellings were barricaded, scouts were sent out to reconnoiter, and, amidst great excitement, an informal organization of militia was effected. Finally, a few ragged, half-clothed men appeared, who announced that they and their comrades were the parties that had landed at the lake. They were a portion of Gen. Hull's paroled soldiers. The citizens slowly relaxed their vigilance, though they continued to guard all points against an unexpected attack. While an attack from the British was possible, it was not regarded as probable, and the settlers in Stark County were not apprehensive on that score; but the Indians were looked upon in a different light. Large numbers were not far distant during the war, and reports were often in swift circulation that they meditated an attack on the whites. Two companies of militia were mustered in the county, one under Capt. Downing and the other under Capt. Sloane. While these companies were not in the service of the Government, they mustered regularly, and were kept in readiness to be called out at any moment, for the protection of the neighboring settlements, in case of an attack from the redskins. Comparatively nothing is remembered of these militia companies. It is quite certain that they took one or more excursions with a view of holding bands of Indians in check, who were thought to be contemplating an attack.

Stark County took a prominent part in the war with Mexico. All are familiar with the circumstances resulting in this war. Briefly, the causes grew out of the admission of Texas into the Union. The "Lone Star State" had been a province of Mexico, but, a few years previous to its annexation to the United States, had thrown off the burdensome Spanish yoke, and organized an independent government. War followed between Texas and Mexico, and, at the battle of San Jacinto, which occurred in 1836, the Texans captured Santa Anna, Dictator of Mexico, together with a large part of his army, and succeeded in compelling him to acknowledge their independence, which he did very much after the fashion of the man referred to in Butler's Hudibras:

"He that complies against his will,
Is of his own opinion still."

The succeeding treaty was wholly disregarded by the Mexicans, who continued their former policy toward the hostile province. From this time onward, petitions were frequently presented to the United States by the Texans, praying for admission into the Union. There was a strong political element in the country opposed to this; and, to strengthen the feeling, and prevent, if possible, the United States from complying with the prayer, Mexico declared that the admission of Texas would be regarded as sufficient cause for a declaration of war with the States. In the Presidential canvass of 1844, the annexation of Texas was one of the leading issues before the people, and Mr. Polk, whose party favored the admission of Texas, being elected, this was taken as a public declaration on the subject. After this, Congress had no hesitancy in granting the petition of Texas, and, on the 1st of March, 1845, formally received her into the sisterhood of States. Mexico at once broke off all diplomatic relations with the United States, recalling her Minister and making immediate preparations for war. In May, 1846, Congress passed an act authorizing the President to accept the services of 50,000 volunteers, and appropriating $10,000,000 for the prosecution of the war. Immediately following this was a requisition by the President on the Governor of Ohio for 2,400 volunteers, in three regiments, and the Secretary of War urged all possible expedition in their enlistment. The call was for infantry, or riflemen, who were to organize and report at Camp Washington, Cincinnati.

At this time, the old militia law was in force throughout the State, requiring the enrollment of all able-bodied men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, for military duty. Massillon was the headquarters of the Sixth Division of the Ohio Militia, the division commander being Maj. Gen. Dwight Jarvis, of that city. On the 25th of May, 1846, he issued an order to the several commandants of brigades in the Sixth Division, requiring them to muster their commands, to ascertain how many men could be got in readiness for war. Canton was the headquarters of the Second Brigade of the Sixth Division, the brigade commander being Brig. Gen. Samuel Lahm, who immediately ordered the organized militia of Stark County to muster as follows: The First Battalion of Light Infantry, at Canton, on the 5th of June; the First Regiment of Infantry, at Osnaburg, on the 6th of June; the Second Regiment of Infantry, at Bethlehem, on the 8th of June; and the Third Regiment of Infantry, at New Berlin, on the 9th of June. This order was followed by others to the same effect, from the various regimental commanders, and from Lieut. Col. Daniel Gotshall, of the First Battalion. On Friday, the 5th of June, the First Battalion, consisting of one company from Canal Fulton, one from Bethlehem, one from Greentown, one from Louisville, one from Osnaburg and one from Canton—in all, six companies, of about 400 fine-looking men—mustered at Canton, and, as a body, offered their services for the war. A few weeks prior to this event, Capt. James Allen, who had commanded a company in Texas in 1836, opened an enlistment office at Canton and issued a call for volunteers. Men came promptly forward, and, by the 5th of June, the company was nearly half completed. The 5th was an animating day, for bands of martial music paraded the streets to fire the dormant spirits of the citizens with the glory of war. Thrilling speeches were made, and many were added to the company of Capt. Allen. In the afternoon, the splendid ceremony of forming a hollow square was executed by the militia, and a fine sword was presented to Capt. Allen, amidst the rattle of musketry and the roll of drums. The partially formed company were in full uniform, and kindled the admiration of all as they marched, with wonderful regularity and precision, through the crowded streets of the county seat. It required but a short time after this memorable day to complete the enrollment of the necessary number of men, and Capt. Allen notified his superiors that his company was ready for marching orders. The call of the Governor for 2,400 volunteers was so promptly filled that, on the 8th day of June, he announced that many more than the required number had enlisted, a portion of whom could not be accepted. It is said that, when the militia throughout the State were called upon to muster and ascertain how many could be got in readiness for the war, 30 volunteered at Xenia; 36 in Warren County; 26 in Muskingum; 20 in Fairfield; 6 in Lorain; 63 in Ross; 9 in Darke; over 40 in Portage; 208 in Clermont; 49 in Seneca; 30 in Sandusky; 41 in Licking; and nearly 400 in Stark. Massillon was made a secondary depot, where companies raised and supplies obtained in this portion of the State were ordered to report for the inspection of Gen. Jarvis. Capt. Allen's company was accepted by the Governor before the 10th of June.

and, on the 13th, received orders to report at Camp Washington, Cincinnati. Before starting, the company received from the citizens of Massillon money and supplies to the value of about $200. The ladies of that city prepared a fine flag, which was presented in their names to the company, in a fine speech by Gen. Jarvis, to which Capt. Allen responded in the following glowing and eloquent words:

"For the distinguished mark of respect and confidence just extended us by the ladies whom you represent, I would, in my own behalf, and in behalf of the company with whose command I have been honored, endeavor to thank you, were I gifted with fitting language to express our common gratitude. This beautiful flag, an offering of generous and holy hearts, shall be to us a hallowed treasure. The gift of pure and lovely women, we shall look upon it as a consecrated emblem, and our hearts draw inspiration of goodness from its contemplation. It is bequeathed to us from bosoms as pure and true as the unstained azure of its field, and from affections as bright as the stars in its mimic galaxy; and it shall be our pride and duty to love and honor and protect it while life throbs in our pulses and strength lingers in our arms. Present our adieux to the ladies who have thus so highly honored us, and say to them that we have sworn never to prove unworthy of their confidence—never to disgrace this flag."

The company "sailed" for Cincinnati on the 13th of June, followed by the tears and loving farewells of friends, and the well-wishes of all. Soon after reaching Camp Washington, the "Stark Rangers," as they were called, were assigned to the Third Regiment, which comprised ten companies, as follows: Allen's, of Stark County; Woodruff's, of Norwalk; Ford's, of Mansfield; Patterson's, of St. Clairsville; Nole's, of Zanesville; Moore's, of Wooster; McLaughlin's, of Mansfield; McCook's, of Steubenville; Meredith's, of Coshocton; and Chapman's, of Seneca County. The organization and equipment of this regiment were soon effected, and, on the 3d of June, 1846, it was ordered, first to New Orleans, and thence across the gulf to Point Isabel, Texas. Capt. Allen's company consisted of eighty-four fine-looking men, as follows: James Allen, Captain; Samuel Beatty, First Lieutenant; Jacob G. Frick, Second Lieutenant; Abijah W. Baker, First Sergeant; William Hilbert, Second Sergeant; William S. Hartman, Third Sergeant; Louis E. Clement, Fourth Sergeant; Ralph S. Courtney, First Corporal; William McCurdy, Second Corporal; Robert Clayton, Third Corporal; Alonzo Waters, Fourth Corporal; and the following privates: Theodore Gibbons, James R. Stall, Findley McGrew, John L. Cross, W. C. Torrence, John Shannou, Isaac Doxey, Philip Martin, William Yawkey, Louis Heminger, Charles Bradley, Myron Monroe, John Link, John Dickas, Jereboam Creighton, Frederic Kisner, Jacob W. Rex, John Ulam, Charles H. Coombs, Andrew P. Gallaher, Ferdinand W. Haack, Thomas Thompson, Jacob Sebold, Jacob Eversole, Mathias Fox, John W. Wagner, John Matson, John R. Walter, George Stitzel, Joel B. Martin, Ambrose Essner, Samuel Stall, Jacob Fontainheim, Peter Kroft, Michael Matter, John Stephens, John Mungrew, Martin Bohrer, Mathias Hoover, Jacob Reed, George M. Bolinger, John B. Collins, Robert M. Shilling, George A. Klingel, John Cotwinkle, John Garret, Wm. Dobson, Abraham Metz, John Fitzsimmons, Patrick Fitzpatrick, Isaiah Keltner, George Toffler, John Ankeney, Frederic Souter, Frederic Hobel, William H. Christmas, James Elliott, Charles Floom, Dewitt C. Whiting, William W. Hastings, Augustus Overtel, John Schlink, Frederic Marsh, Ambrose Meeks, John C. Meloney, Frederic Vogelgesong, Alexander Shirer, John Brisch, Peter Finney, Thomas Barnd, Samuel C. Fry, Christian Ledig and John Cox. This company, as given, left Massillon, but all did not return. Some of the poor boys fell under the stroke of the deadly diseases of the South, and their graves, like the tomb of Moses, are unknown. The company was designated K, and its position was on the extreme left wing of the Third Regiment. It was about ten days in going from Cincinnati by boat to New Orleans. After remaining encamped about ten days at Camp Jackson, near New Orleans, and on the site of Gen. Jackson's celebrated battle-field, the right wing of the regiment was ordered on board a schooner, and directed to report at Point Isabel, Texas. The left wing, of which the "Stark Rangers" formed a part, embarked on board a brig, commanded by Capt. Thompson, and, after a short, stormy passage, landed at Brazos Island. After a few weeks, the regiment was ordered to the mouth of the Rio Grande, and soon afterward to Bereta, thence to Brownsville, and finally to Matamoras, arriving at that point about the 1st of August, 1846. After remaining encamped for a short time, the regiment was divided, and the companies sent to different towns along the Rio Grande, to guard Government stores and repel sundry attacks from Mexican guerrillas. Company K was ordered into winter quarters at Fort Perides, where it remained until the 2d of January, 1847, when marching orders were received to proceed to Camargo, where the troops arrived three days later. Some time afterward, they were ordered to Monterey, and, when on the way, learned of the battle of Buena Vista. They were met by Gen. Taylor when within about twenty-five miles of Monterey, who ordered a portion of the regiment in pursuit of a fragment of the defeated Mexican army. After a harassing though bloodless pursuit of three or four days, the troops returned and proceeded to Monterey, and encamped opposite Black Fort, but soon afterward were ordered to Saltillo. Here the small-pox broke out among the citizens, and, to avoid the contagion, the troops were ordered to pitch their tents on the battle-field of Buena Vista. The "Stark Rangers" remained in this vicinity until some time in May, 1847, when they were ordered to the Rio Grande, thence by boat to Brazos Island, and finally to New Orleans, where, on the 24th of June, 1847, their term of enlistment having expired, they were mustered out of service, and the boys, those remaining, with light hearts, turned their faces toward their homes in Ohio. The "Stark Rangers" had participated in no engagement during the campaign, except perhaps a few shots with Mexican guerrillas. It is related by Mr. F. W. Haack, one of the company yet living at Canton, that the boys at times received rough usage from their commanding officers. He states that, when the company were being conveyed on board the brig across the gulf from the mouth of the Mississippi to Brazos Island, the provisions were brought out and scattered along on deck, just as the farmer scatters the corn for his swine. They were subjected to the severest military discipline while encamped at different points along the Rio Grande, and when one of their number died—Martin Bohrer—he was not given a decent burial, although he left abundant means which could be used for that purpose. Mr. Haack says that the boys were strictly forbidden to forage, but that they often disobeyed orders in this respect. One day, when on the march, he had charge of one of the wagons in the commissary train, and, seeing a number of fine fowls at one of the Mexican farms, he caught quite a number and secured them in his wagon. When he reached the next encampment and was unloading his live freight, he was suddenly approached by old "Rough and Ready," who was sitting sideways, in a dirty and dilapidated suit of clothing, on a bony old horse. The General noticed the fowls, and instantly inquired, in a loud tone: "Where in h—l did you get those chickens?" Mr. Haack, with some misgivings, informed him, whereupon the General, after a pause, said, in a low tone, reflectively: "Y-e-e-s; well, you may cook one of them for me, and I'll be around shortly." Mr. Haack did as ordered, preparing it in his best style, with an abundance of rich and excellent gravy. The General appeared promptly, sat down to the meal, and continued to eat and eat, until Mr. Haack thought he would never get enough. Finally, when all had disappeared, he arose from the camp-stool, and, walking up to Mr. Haack, said, quietly: "Look here, you prepare another of those chickens the same way, and I'll send around" (naming a favorite subordinate officer). Mr. Haack did so, whereupon the officer came forward and dispatched the fowl with even greater celerity than had the General. When nothing was left, he departed, with heart filled with glowing panegyrics for the skill of the cook.

Great hardships were endured by the boys, on account of the extremely hot weather and the inferior quality and quantity of their rations. They were often compelled to drink water from ponds covered with a filthy green scum, and it is no wonder that their robust physical development often succumbed to the deadly Mexican miasma. Capt. Allen, in a letter to some friend in Massillon, dated at Camargo, February 22, 1847, reports the following regarding his company: "John Brischdt died August 8, 1846; William H. Christmas died August 12, 1846; O. C. Billings died August 17, 1846; John Ankeny died October 20, 1846; William Hilbert died November 24, 1846; Martin Bohrer accidentally drowned in the Rio Grande December 27, 1846; George Stitzel died December 29, 1846; Frederick Habel died January 8, 1847. All these deaths occurred at Matamoras, and were mostly caused by raging fevers. In the meantime, the following were discharged for various reasons: Robert Clayton, who died at Cincinnati on his return home; Joel B. Martin; Abijah W. Baker; George Toffler; William Dobson; Mathias Hoover; Alexander Scheirer; Frederick Marsh; John Hendershot, who died at Springfield, Ohio, on his return; Samuel C. Fry; Mathias Fox; and Peter Kroft, who died at Cincinnati on his way home, and was buried in the potter's field. One of the company, Ralph S. Courtney, had deserted, and joined, it is supposed, one of the Indiana companies. The Captain also reported that his company had received recruits until it mustered about seventy men. Early in July, 1847, the company reached home, and, on the evening of the 17th of July, 1847, they were given a splendid reception and supper at the residence of Christian Cramer. Although the company had been discharged, the war was not over, and Capt. Taneyhill was authorized to enlist a company in Stark County, and, by the 17th of July, 1847, he had secured about sixteen volunteers, but the company was never completed. When the Third Regiment was mustered out of service, Col. Curtis volunteered again for the war, and was soon afterward appointed Governor of Saltillo. Many years have passed away since the Mexican war, and many of the "Stark Rangers" are laid at rest in the grave. The brave Mexican soldiers must not be forgotten amidst the glories and grand achievements of the last great war. So far as known, all of Capt. Allen's company are dead except the following: Samuel Beatty, living in Stark County; Jacob G. Frick, William S. Hartman, Louis E. Clement, in California; Theodore Gibbons, in California; John L.

Cross, in Ohio; John Shannon, in Indiana; Isaac Doxey, near Massillon; Jereboam Creighton, in Summit County; John Ulam, in Indiana; Andrew P. Gallagher, in Stark County; Ferdinand W. Haack, near Canton; Thomas Thompson, at Akron; Jacob Sebold, in Stark County; Jacob Eversole, in Canton; John W. Wagner, in California; John R. Walter, in Stark County; Ambrose Essner, in Canton; Samuel Stall, in Indiana; Jacob Fountainheim, in Wayne County; George M. Bollinger, in Massillon; John Fitzsimmons, in Illinois; Isaiah Kiltner, in Ohio; Charles Floom, in Stark County; Dewitt C. Whiting, in Tuscarawas County; and Frederick Vogelgesong, in Canton. Thus ends the brief record of the part borne by Stark County in the war with Mexico. It may be said that several of the boys who had served with Capt. Allen in Mexico also enlisted and served in the last great war between the States.

It is unnecessary to give a lengthy summary of the causes which led to the war of the rebellion. Occurring as it did but twenty years ago, its weary marches, dreadful sufferings from disease, and daring achievements on the field of battle, are yet green in the recollection of maimed and honored participants. Continued and extensive preparations for war were made in the South long before the North ceased to believe that the differences which bitterly divided the two factions of the Government might be amicably adjusted. Armed and hostile bands of the rebellious citizens of the South seized, at every opportunity, large quantities of military stores, and took forcible possession of important strategic points; but still the North was hopeful that peace would prevail. President Lincoln, with that kind forbearance—that magnanimous philanthropy or charity which ever distinguished him, and which enrolls his name on the brightest page of moral and intellectual greatness—wisely hesitated to begin the contest, in hope that the South would accede to the demands of the Government and lay down the weapons of war. Hot-blooded Abolitionists in the North urged him repeatedly to strangle the hydra of secession in its infancy, but still he hesitated. He knew well the desolation that would deluge the country, for he had seen practical evidences of the fiery spirit which characterized the Southern people. Statesmen in the North viewed with reluctance or contempt the steady and aggressive movements for war in the South, and declared that the people in rebellion would not have the temerity or courage to continue the war longer than ninety days. Finally, the blow fell like a knell upon Sumter, and instantly kindled a flame of fiery indignation throughout the North. People of all parties forgot everything, save that the country given them by their ancestors was in imminent peril. Business was almost wholly suspended, and the citizens gathered in neighboring villages to face the situation and encourage one another with hopeful words. Intense excitement everywhere prevailed. Scores of militia regiments tendered their services to the Government, and when, at last, President Lincoln called for 75,000 men to put down the rebellion, a wave of relief swept throughout the North. Ohio alone offered over 80,000 men, the greater portion of whom were rejected.

Massillon was the first place in Stark County to give public expression of the feeling on the subject of the war. Notices were circulated on the 16th of April, 1861, for a mass meeting of the citizens at Madison Hall on the same evening; and the room was packed with excited men of all parties. Gen. Jarvis called the meeting to order, and R. H. Folger, Esq., who was appointed Chairman, announced that the object of the meeting was to consider what the "exigencies of the hour demanded." He reviewed the situation in loyal and eloquent words, and stated that the call of the President for troops must be promptly and abundantly met. At the conclusion of his speech, three times three cheers were given, and immediately thereafter a committee of three was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting. The members of the committee were Gen. Dwight Jarvis, John McClymond and Hon. J. S. Kelley. The following resolutions were prepared, and adopted with a ringing and unanimous vote:

WHEREAS, The Government being in imminent danger from formidable and organized bands of lawless men, bound together for the purpose of resisting the execution of the laws; and believing as we do, that it is indispensable that the laws should at all times be kept inviolate and the integrity of the Union preserved, therefore,

Resolved, That we will not stop to inquire who is President of the United States in times of danger; but that it is the duty of every good citizen to sustain the Government with alacrity and with a will.

Resolved, That, at such times, we will bury all party feelings, and unite as a band of brothers to strengthen the constituted authorities of our country.

Resolved, That the call of the Governor is well-timed and patriotic, and will meet with a prompt response.

Resolved, That we cannot afford to have rebels and traitors in our midst, for "He that is not for our country, is against it."

Resolved, That we have yet a country and a constitution, which we have inherited from our fathers—a banner under which their blood was shed.

Rousing and patriotic speeches were made by many of the prominent citizens, and finally the meeting was adjourned, to meet again on the following Monday night. The Repository of the following week, in speaking of this meeting, said: "The meeting throughout was the grandest exhibition of genuine patriotism we have ever witnessed; and was fully indicative that there is a national party ready to vindicate the honor and integrity of the Government against all traitors, wherever dispersed." At Massillon, the names of 100 young men were enrolled on Thursday and Friday, April 18 and 19. This was the company of which Albert F. Beach was Captain. It was fully organized and ready to march to the field on Monday, the 22d of April, 1861. Immediately after the meeting at Massillon, others were held at almost every town in the county, and in every instance movements were effected to enlist companies for the war. A rousing meeting was held at Alliance, and many signified their willingness to enlist, and their names were enrolled. Canton was somewhat slow in holding a mass meeting of the citizens. Small assemblages of men convened to listen to loyal words, but no general meeting was held until the 9th of May, when almost the entire county met at Canton to listen to the following speakers: John McSweeney, Esq., Hon. B. F. Leiter, Mr. Upham, H. M. McAbee, Seraphim Meyer, R. H. Folger and others. This was one of the largest and most enthusiastic meetings ever held in Stark County. It is stated that, about this time, at least one thousand men in the county signified their willingness to serve the Government. A company had been organized at Canton a number of years before, and was known as the "Canton Zouaves," James Wallace being Captain. Another company, called the "Canton Light Guards," had also been organized under the State militia law. This was commanded by Capt. Samuel Beatty. The headquarters of these two companies were at Canton. A company at Alliance, known as the "Alliance Guards," under Capt. James McGarr, offered its services for the war. The company at Massillon under Capt. Beach was called the "Massillon Light Guards." These four companies, after being re-organized and recruited, left the county early in May, and, by the middle of June, all were on duty in Western Virginia. "Williams' Battery," commanded by Capt. W. S. Williams, went from Canton to Columbus, and finally into Virginia, about the same time. In the meantime and thereafter, the rapid enlistment of Stark County men went on. Every effort was made by prominent men at this time, and afterward, to fill the quota of troops called for, but at last the county was compelled to resort to the draft. A military committee was appointed, and a local bounty was offered for volunteers, and the draft was postponed; but at last it came, on the 1st of October, 1862, at which time 571 men were drafted, about 500 of whom were sent into the field. During the progress of the war, and especially at its early stages, there were a number of men in the county, some of them being prominent citizens, who conscientiously thought that the Government had no right to coerce the seceding States. Some of these men were outspoken in their opinions, resisted the progress of the enlistment and the draft, and got into serious difficulty for so doing. On several occasions, open riots of a mild nature resulted from the clashing of public sentiment on the questions growing out of the war. Several arrests were made, and at last open or public opposition to the war was avoided. About the 7th of November, 1861, the military committee reported that 854 volunteers had enlisted from Stark. The following is a list of the number of volunteers in the field from the county at the time of the annual assessment in 1862:

This list embraces only those enlisted for three years or during the war. Two or more camps were established in the county—Camp Massillon at that town, and Camp Ford at Alliance. The fair grounds at Canton were used as a military camp. The first calls for sanitary aid came from Western Virginia during the fall of 1861. On the 15th of October, the ladies of Canton met at the residence of J. F. Reynolds to organize a Ladies' Aid Society. The following officers were elected: Mrs. J. G. Lester, President; Mrs. E. Buckingham, Secretary; and Mrs. J. A. Saxton, Treasurer. The following committees were appointed: To draft a constitution, Mrs. Isaac Harter, Mrs. Dr. Wallace, Mrs. J. G. Lester and Mrs. E. Buckingham; General soliciting—First Ward, Mrs. Pierong, Mrs. Lewis Miller, Mrs. E. C. Patterson, Mrs. George Reynolds; Second Ward, Mrs. C. Aultman, Mrs. T. W. Saxton, Mrs. W. K. Miller, Miss Henrietta Buckius; Third Ward, Mrs. Dr. Whiting, Mrs. S. Meyer, Mrs. Thomas Patton, Mrs. M. Wikidal; Fourth Ward, Mrs. G. Prince, Mrs. Dr. Slusser, Mrs. Shock, Mrs. O. P. Stidger; in the vicinity, Miss M. Harry, Mrs. William Reynolds, Mrs. H. Reynolds, Mrs. William Williams, Mrs. Simon Miller, Mrs. Cassilly, Miss Medill. Almost every township in the county organized a similar society, and, in truth, it may be said that the entire county resolved itself into a committee of the whole to see that the families of volunteers did not suffer, and to solicit money, provisions and supplies of clothing to be sent into the field. Thousands of dollars worth of hospital and camp supplies were sent from the county during the war. The citizens of the county subscribed over $30,000 to the Government loan of treasury notes prior to November, 1861. Two regiments were organized at Camp Massillon during the early autumn of 1862. On the 30th of August, when one of these was mustered into the service, Gov. Tod was present, and spoke to a vast assemblage that had gathered to witness the military review of the two newly formed regiments. The county sent a company of men on the bloodless squirrel campaign to Cincinnati. The company was commanded by Capt. Dougherty, of Greentown, and about forty of the men belonged to the "Lake Rifles." Massillon furnished eighteen colored volunteers for the Fifth United States Infantry, while, so far as known, no other portion of the county furnished a colored man, at least at that time.

It is the design, in the following pages, to give a brief though exact sketch of every regiment which served the Government during the last war, and which contained a company or more of Stark County men. While, in the main, the record given by Whitelaw Reid has been followed, yet, in almost every instance, departures have been made from his text, as the writer, after careful inquiry, has discovered his errors. The alterations will be observed in reading the sketches. In numerous instances, dates have been corrected; and infrequently serious mis-statements of fact have been discovered by having Mr. Reid's accounts carefully read by soldiers who served in the regiments. A great many regiments, sketches of which are not given, contained men from Stark County. As complete a list of these as can be given will be found below. The following regiments contained men from Stark County: One Hundred and Fifteenth, Seventy-sixth, Sixty-fourth, Eleventh, Eighteenth United States, One Hundred and Fourth, One Hundred and Seventh, Nineteenth, Fifty-first, Sixty-first, One Hundred and Second, Ninth, One Hundred and Seventy-ninth, Twenty-sixth Battery (some fifteen men), Forty-fifth N. G., Third Battery, Thirteenth, Twenty-sixth, Second Michigan, One Hundred and Sixty-third, Tenth Cavalry, Sixth Cavalry, Second Cavalry, Fifteenth Illinois, Sixty-fifth, One Hundred and Sixty-second, Seventeenth Tennessee, Seventy-eighth, One Hundred and Twentieth, Forty-third, Third, Fifty-fifth, Sixth Michigan, One Hundred and Sixty-fourth, Sixteenth, Fourth, Sixty-third, One Hundred and Seventy-eighth, Second, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth, Thirty-second, Fifty-eighth, Fortieth, First, Seventeenth Tennessee, Seventy-first, Fiftieth, One Hundred and Twenty-second, Forty-first, Forty-second, One Hundred and Tenth, One Hundred and Sixty-fourth, Tenth, Ninety-ninth Pennsylvania, Forty-fifth, Forty-eighth Indiana, Eighteenth, Sixth Battery, One Hundred and Sixty-third, Eighty-sixth, One Hundred and Fifteenth, One Hundred and Eighty-eighth, and Third Cavalry.

The Fourth Ohio Regiment was organized at Camp Jackson, Columbus, April 25, 1861, and contained one company from Stark County, under the following officers: James Wallace, Captain; Percy S. Sowers, First Lieutenant; George F. Lair, Second Lieutenant. The company, known as the "Canton Zouaves," had been organized before, under the militia law of the State, and as soon as the war broke out it was immediately re-organized and filled up, and hastily left for Columbus to secure a place in one of the first thirteen regiments. It was assigned to the Fourth Regiment, commanded by Lorin Andrews, Colonel; James Cantwell, Lieutenant Colonel; James H. Godman, Major. These were the officers during the three-months enlistment. On the 2d of May, the regiment moved to Camp Dennison, and, on the 4th of the same month, was mustered into the three-months service by Capt. Gordon Granger. On the 5th of June, a majority of the regiment signified their willingness to enter the three-years service, and were accordingly mustered in, their enlistment dating from that day. The regiment moved to Grafton, W. Va., reaching that point on the 23d of June. It moved through Clarksburg and Buckhannon, and arrived at Rich Mountain on the 9th of July, but did not participate in the battle, being held as a reserve. In July, it was brigaded with the Ninth Ohio and How's Battery, Fourth United States Artillery, Col. Robert McCook commanding, the brigade being Gen. McClellan's advance guard during his West Virginia campaign. After a variety of movements, during which the regiment pursued the enemy's forces and guarded several hundred prisoners until they were paroled, occupying, in the meantime, Beverly, Huttonsville and New Creek, it marched to Pendleton, Va., reaching that section the 7th of August. On the 7th of September, Companies A, F and K, under Maj. Godman, skirmished the rebels at Petersburg, capturing a large quantity of provisions, animals and some prisoners. Col. Cantwell, with six companies, moved on Romney on the 24th of September, and, after a brisk fight, drove the rebels out, losing thirty-two men wounded. Col. Andrews having died at his home in Ohio of camp fever, his successor, John S. Mason, was appointed on the 4th of October, and, ten days later, assumed command. On the 25th, the regiment marched to New Creek, and the next day, with Gen. Kelley's command, moved on Romney, driving the enemy from that place, and capturing all his baggage, two pieces of artillery, and a number of prisoners. Romney was occupied until January 7, 1862, when the regiment attacked the rebels at Blue Gap, surprised and drove them from a fortified position, capturing all the camp equipage and two field pieces. During January, 1862, a new brigade was formed, consisting of the Fourth and the Eighth Ohio, Clark's United States Battery, Damm's First Virginia Battery, Robinson's and Huntington's First Ohio Batteries, known as the Artillery Brigade of Lander's Division, commanded by Col. Mason. On the 10th of January, the regiment moved to Patterson's Creek, and, on the 4th of February, to Paw Paw Tunnel. It occupied Winchester and Martinsburg, making the former place a base of supplies, whence detachments were sent out in different directions until the 24th of March, when it started in pursuit of "Stonewall" Jackson, who had been defeated at Kernstown the day previous. It moved as far as Strasburg, and, on the 30th, to Edenburg. On the 17th of April, it skirmished on the way to New Market, and afterward occupied Moore's farm, and finally returned to New Market. It joined McDowell on the 22d of May, marching through Luray, Front Royal, Chester's Gap, Warrenton, Catlett's Station, and finally reached Fredericksburg, Va. The next day it moved back to the valley, and, on the 30th, reached Front Royal, driving the enemy from that place and capturing a large quantity of ammunition, supplies, and a number of prisoners. After remaining in this vicinity until the 29th of June, the regiment was transferred to the Peninsula, arriving at Harrison's Landing on the 1st of July. About the middle of August, it marched to Newport News. It occupied Alexandria, Centerville, Fairfax Court House, Fort Gaines, D. C., Harper's Ferry, Leesburg, Halltown, Gregory's Gap, Rector-town, Piedmont, Salem, Warrenton, reaching Falmouth some time in November. Here it remained in camp until the 12th of December, when, under the command of Col. Mason, it crossed the Rapidan into Fredericksburg, and was thrown to the front as skirmishers, holding that position until the next day, when the desperate charge was made through the streets of the city. The regiment received the first fire of the rebel artillery on the right of the national line, and lost, during the engagement, five officers and forty-three enlisted men, out of 115 engaged. It suffered terribly, and Col. Mason was made a Brigadier General for his conduct during the battle. The Fourth returned to Falmouth, where it remained until the 28th of April, 1863, and then participated in Hooker's remarkable movement on Chancellorsville. On the 3d of May, the battalion engaged the enemy, and captured one stand of colors and over one hundred prisoners, among whom were nine commissioned officers. It lost in killed and wounded seventy-eight men. On the 6th of May, the regiment moved back to Falmouth. On the 14th of June, it marched north to assist in the movement to check Gen. Lee, who had invaded Pennsylvania. Gettysburg was reached on the 1st of July, and the regiment took part in that great battle. It was one of the three regiments that drove the rebels from Cemetery Hill, and received the highest commendations from Gens. Hancock, Howard and Gibbon. It lost thirty-seven men killed and wounded. After occupying numerous positions in Virginia and Maryland—at one time being ordered to New York City to quell the riots there, and at other times marching in a circuit through Virginia, skirmishing with the rebels at Bristo Station, and at Robinson's Cross Roads on the 27th of October, losing at the latter place twenty-eight men killed and wounded—the regiment finally, on the 1st of December, went into winter quarters near Stephensburg, Va. On the 6th of February, it advanced to Morton's Ford, crossed the river and had a skirmish with the enemy, losing seventeen men wounded. It recrossed the river on the 7th and encamped near Stephensburg, where it remained until the bloody battles of the Wilderness occurred. In all this arduous and bloody campaign, the Fourth participated. It lost, during the twenty-seven days, ending early in June, as follows: On the 5th of May, 34; on the 10th, at Spottsylvania, 35; on the 12th, at second Spottsylvania, 34; on the 13th, near the same place, 4; on the 18th, in crossing North Anna River, 11; on the 23d, at Hanover Junction, 3; on the 24th, near the same place, 3; June 3, at Cold Harbor, 20; June 5, at same place 2; making a total of 146 lost, out of 335 men who began the campaign with the gallant regiment. Those figures speak volumes, and cover the noble Fourth with the bright flowers of undying honor. At the close of the campaign, the term of service having expired, the regiment was mustered out. Those who had re-enlisted as veterans were retained, and organized into a battalion called the Fourth Ohio Battalion, and placed on duty in and around Washington City, where they remained until the final muster out during the closing scenes of the war. The Fourth Ohio Infantry marched 1,975 miles, and traveled, by railroad and transport, 2,279 miles, making an aggregate of 4,254 miles traveled. It was one of the best regiments sent from Ohio.

The Thirteenth Regiment had about two companies from Stark County. Company A was enlisted at Massillon, and was officered as follows: A. F. Beach, Captain; Dwight Jarvis, First Lieutenant; Phillip Wendling, Second Lieutenant. At the re-organization for the three-years enlistment, James Whittaker became Second Lieutenant, the other officers remaining the same. Company B (?) was enlisted in the county, and its Captain was Joseph T. Snider. The regiment was organized at Camp Jackson about the 20th of April, 1861, with the following officers in command: W. S. Smith, Colonel; C. B. Mason, Lieutenant Colonel; J. G. Hawkins, Major. On the 9th of May, it was transferred to Camp Denison, and on the 30th of June, it started for Western Virginia to re-enforce the command of Gen. McClellan. It reached Parkersburg on the 1st of July, and, during the next two months, made frequent scouts into the surrounding country, going to Greenland Gap, Oakland, Clarksburg, Sutton, making Oakland its headquarters; but nothing of note transpired. The Thirteenth participated in the battle of Carnifex Ferry on the 10th of September, and, from that date until the 6th of November, encamped at Gauley Bridge, having frequent skirmishes with the enemy. Benham's Brigade was composed of the Tenth, Twelfth and Thirteenth Ohio Regiments, and on the 12th, with other troops, started in pursuit of Gen. Floyd, with Company A of the Thirteenth deployed as skirmishers. The regiment lost one killed and two wounded at Cotton Hill, and soon afterward was transferred to near Louisville, Ky. After moving to Elizabethtown, Bacon Creek, Bowling Green and other points, the regiment, on the 22d of January, advanced with Buell's army toward Nashville, which was reached on the 26th, and encamped two miles beyond. After a variety of movements, during which the Thirteenth was often divided, it started, on the 2d of April (except Companies A and G), to re-enforce Gen. Grant, who was anticipating an attack from the rebels at Pittsburg Landing. After a terrible march, it reached the battle-field on the morning of the 6th, and was immediately ordered to the front on the right of Nelson's command. It swept upon the enemy about 8 o'clock A. M., and was confronted by the famous Washington Battery (rebel), of New Orleans. After a desperate struggle, the Thirteenth captured this entire battery, but, as the rebels swept the Union army back toward the river, it was recaptured by them, and the Thirteenth was compelled to fall back. At 1 o'clock, when the Federal troops made their last advance, the gallant Thirteenth again captured the Washington Battery. The regiment lost heavily during the two-days battle. The enemy retreated, and soon afterward the regiment participated in the movement toward Corinth, reaching that point about the 1st of May. Early in June, it, with other troops, advanced toward Chattanooga, and, when there, performed guard duty, but soon afterward encamped at Battle Creek. On the 20th, it received orders to move north to intercept Gen. Bragg, who contemplated an attack on Ohio and Indiana. For thirty-six terrible days, the regiment and its army patiently toiled through the hot sun, suffering intensely from the dust, thirst and half rations, and finally reached Louisville, having passed the rebel army on the way. The regiment took an inactive part in the attack on Perryville on the 8th of October. Soon after this, Gen. Rosecrans assumed command of the Army of the Ohio, which was immediately pushed forward toward Nashville. The regiment indulged in several skirmishes, losing, near Laverne, two men killed, several wounded, and Lieutenant Bates, of Company B, captured. The Thirteenth was in Crittenden's Division, on the left wing. Thomas' Division was in the center, and McCook's on the right. The whole army moved forward in this form, skirmishing with the enemy, driving him back, and reaching Stone River on the evening of the 29th of December. McCook's column did not arrive until the next day. On the morning of December 31, the Thirteenth, under Col. Hawkins, was ordered in from outpost duty, and took position with its brigade (the Fourteenth) under Col. Fyffe. The regiment and its wing were ordered to attack the enemy across the river, but, while being executed, the order was countermanded, and the division fell back to stem the tide of defeat that had fallen upon McCook on the right. The Thirteenth fell back to the Murfreesboro Pike, and was formed in battle array on the left of the second line, covering the Thirty-ninth Ohio. An advance was ordered, and, after desperate fighting, the Thirty-ninth was forced back, but was immediately relieved by the Thirteenth, which checked the enemy until it in turn was outflanked. At this time, Col. Hawkins was shot, and the command devolved upon Maj. Dwight Jarvis. The regiment fought on until flanked on both sides by the enemy, when it slowly fell back, becoming somewhat disordered in the movement by a rebel battery which played upon the rear. It halted when the line of reserves was reached, and assisted in checking the enemy's advance. In one hour's duration, the Thirteenth lost 142 officers and men in killed, wounded and missing. It participated in other movements at this point during the next few days, and lost, during the series of engagements, 185 men killed, wounded and missing. The regiment moved southward with the army late in June, 1863, passing through McMinnville and Chattanooga, encamping at Rossville on the 9th of September. On the 19th and 20th of September, it was actively engaged at the bloody battle of Chickamauga, and preserved its brilliant record unsullied. Lieut. Col. Mast was killed, and many others shared the same fate. On the 22d, it had a severe skirmish with the enemy at Mission Ridge. During the latter part of November, it was with that grand movement which swept the rebels from Missionary Ridge, and, it is claimed, was the first regiment to plant its colors on the enemy's works, Sergeant Daniel Ritter, of Company A, being the first to scale the fortifications. The regiment lost severely in this affair. It participated in the movement against Longstreet, but, aside from severe marches and sufferings, and a lively skirmish at Dandridge, nothing of note transpired. About this time, leave of absence was given to visit home. Those who did not re-enlist were transferred to the Fifty-ninth Ohio. On the 5th of January, 1864, three-fourths of the members of the Thirteenth re-enlisted for another three-years service, the muster being delayed until the 10th of February, Col. Dwight Jarvis being in command. Late in February, the veterans returned home, enjoyed their furlough of thirty days, at the end of which time they returned to Chattanooga. The regiment was attached to the Third Brigade, Third Division, Fourth Army Corps, of Gen. Thomas' command. It moved south on the Atlanta campaign, skirmishing at several points. Brisk skirmishing occurred during the 10th, 11th and 12th of May, near Resaca, when the enemy fell back toward Dalton. During the numerous skirmishes around this point, the Thirteenth lost severely. For several days after the 15th, it skirmished heavily near and south of Calhoun. On the 27th of May, the Third Division, instead of falling upon the enemy's flank at Lost Mountain, attacked, by mistake, its center. The Thirteenth formed the second line of the advance, and, as the first line went down under a fearful fire from the enemy, the second line charged the works with a cheer, on the double-quick, and the battle became close and hot. From 4 P. M. until 9, all efforts to capture the works were unavailing, and at last the gallant regiment was withdrawn. Its ammunition was gone, and dozens of its men lay killed and wounded on the bloody field. The non-veterans were mustered out of service about the 21st of June, and soon afterward the remainder of the regiment was consolidated into four companies, known as the Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry Battalion, commanded by Maj. J. T. Snider. The entire battalion numbered 200 men, of whom eighty were sick or on special duty. On the 10th of June, the Thirteenth Battalion moved southward, and participated in the charge up Kenesaw Mountain, losing six men killed and wounded. While throwing up intrenchments around Atlanta, several men were injured, one being killed. On the night of the 29th of August, the battalion, as skirmishers, kept up a heavy fire to conceal the withdrawal of a brigade. The battalion moved in pursuit of Hood to Jonesboro and Lovejoy Station, participating in the severe battle at the latter place on the 2d of September, and losing several men, killed and wounded. After a rest in camp near Atlanta, which was greatly enjoyed by the battalion, it finally, on the 4th of October, started north with Thomas, in pursuit of Hood. The race to Nashville was won by the Union army, but not without a bloody engagement at Franklin. The Thirteenth reached Nashville on the 3d of December, and here the Union troops were besieged until the middle of the month. The Thirteenth was not engaged on the 15th, but, on the following day, charged the enemy's works, mowing down his men, and losing many in return. The Thirteenth moved in pursuit, and finally went into camp at Huntsville, Ala., where it remained until the 1st of March, 1865, when it was ordered to East Tennessee. Here the news of Lee's surrender was received, and the battalion was ordered to Nashville, where it arrived on the 9th of June. On the 16th, the Fourth Corps was ordered to Texas. The Thirteenth reached New Orleans on the 27th, and left July 7, for Indianola, Texas, arriving on the 10th. It marched to Green Lake, where it afterward suffered terribly from malarial diseases; but, on the 4th of September, moved to San Antonio, which was found to be a much better place in a sanitary point of view. Here it remained until December 5, 1865, when it was mustered out of the United States service. Columbus, Ohio, was reached on the 17th of January, 1866, and here the brave boys were paid, discharged and sent home. Thus ended the long service of this gallant and faithful old regiment. It also was among the best regiments from Ohio.

The Nineteenth was one of the regiments which grew out of the excitement occasioned by the surrender of Fort Sumter. It had but one company from Stark County during the three-months enlistment. The regimental officers for this period were: Samuel Beatty, of Canton, Colonel; E. W. Hollingsworth, Lieutenant Colonel; Lewis P. Buckley, Major; B. B. Brashear, Surgeon. Company A, known as the "Canton Light Guards," was in partial organization under the old State militia law, and, as soon as the blow fell upon Sumter, the company immediately tendered their services to the Governor. Samuel Beatty, who had served in the war with Mexico, had been elected Captain of the company, and, when he was selected Colonel of the regiment to which Company A belonged, Charles F. Manderson succeeded him as Captain. The company, under Capt. Beatty, encamped on the fair-ground at Canton, to await orders from the Governor, and to perfect itself in field movements. From the fact that the three-months term of service expired on the 23d of July, Company A, at least, must have been mustered into the service about the 23d day of April, 1861. This was probably done while the company was yet encamped at Canton. The company was ordered to report at Camp Taylor, near Cleveland, about the middle of May, 1861, and, on the 27th of the same month, was conveyed, with the remainder of the Nineteenth, to Camp Jackson, Columbus. Companies A and B were armed and equipped at the State Arsenal, and sent to Bellair, while the other eight companies were ordered to Camp Goddard, Zanesville, to perfect themselves in the drill. Companies A and B did guard duty at Bellair until June

3, and after that date, and until the 20th, at Glover's Gap and Mannington. The companies of the regiment were then re-united at Bellair, and, on the 21st of June, were conveyed on steamers to Parkersburg, and, while at this point, the Nineteenth was organized, with three others, into a brigade, under the command of Gen. W. S. Rosecrans. On the 25th of June, the troops moved by rail to Clarksburg. On June 29, the Nineteenth marched to Buchanan, reaching that point on the 2d of July, and five days later arrived at Roaring Creek, and encamped in front of the fortified rebel position on Rich Mountain. Of the battle which followed, Gen. Rosecrans said: "Seven companies of the Nineteenth deployed into line, and delivered two splendid volleys, when the enemy broke." And later: "The Nineteenth distinguished itself for the cool and handsome manner in which it held its post against a flank attack, and for the manner in which it came into line and delivered its fire near the close of the action." Three of the men were slightly wounded in this engagement. On the 23d of July, its term of service having expired, it moved first to Webster, and thence to Columbus, Ohio, where it arrived on the 27th of July. By the 5th of August, the boys were all at home, recounting their valorous deeds to eager listeners.

The regiment was much more fully represented by Stark County men during the three-years enrollment. A number of the officers, at the close of the three-months term of service, busied themselves in recruiting the regiment for the three-years service, and, by the 26th of September, nine companies reported, and were mustered into the service. Among these were Company A, under Capt. C. F. Manderson; Company F, under Capt. W. H. Allen; about two-thirds of Company I, under Capt. William Rakestraw; and about twenty men of Company D, making a total of about three companies from Stark County. By the 7th of November, 1861, the Nineteenth, under the command of Col. Samuel Beatty, was fully armed and equipped at Camp Dennison. Nine days later, it removed to Cincinnati, thence by steamer to Louisville, Ky., and was the first regiment to enter Camp Jenkins, five miles from the city. Here it remained, under Gen.

Mitchell, until December 6, when it proceeded to Lebanon, Ky.; thence it marched forty miles to Columbus, reaching that point on the 10th of December, and was soon afterward brigaded with the Fifty-ninth Ohio, Second and Ninth Kentucky Infantry, and Haggard's regiment of cavalry, constituting the Eleventh Brigade, Gen. J. T. Boyle commanding. While at Columbia, the regiment received a fine silk flag from the ladies of Canton. On the 17th of December, Capt. Rakestraw died of diphtheria. The regiment marched to Renick's Creek, on the Cumberland, on the 17th of January, 1862, and soon afterward moved up the Cumberland to Jamestown, where it was joined by the Sixth Ohio Battery. Position was taken at the mouth of Greasy Creek, to prevent Zollicoffer from joining the enemy at Nashville. While lying at Columbia, the regiment suffered terribly from measles and typhoid fever. Within a few days, over two hundred men were in the hospital, and several died of these diseases. About the middle of February, 1862, the regiment moved back to Columbia. After marching to Glasgow and Bowling Green, the regiment was finally ordered to Nashville, which place was reached on the 10th of March. The regiment encamped on the Murfreesboro Turnpike, five miles from the city. The march from Bowling Green had been 170 miles, during a portion of which the men were little better than bare-footed. On the 18th of March, the regiment started for Savannah, on the Tennessee, and, by April 6, was within fourteen miles of that place. It was Sunday, and here the distant boom of cannon was plainly heard, firing the troops with new life and urging them to the double-quick in hopes of reaching the field to assist in deciding the conflict. At dark, the regiment embarked for Pittsburg Landing. On its arrival, a sorry scene was presented. The Union troops had been thrown back in wild disorder by the exultant rebels, and thousands of stragglers and wounded men, with woe-begone faces, lined the river's bank. The Nineteenth disembarked and went into line of battle in the darkness and rain, on the field, to be in readiness for the coming conflict on the morrow. At daylight, the enemy, flushed with his success of the previous day, opened the carnival of death with the rattle of musketry, and soon both armies were hurled together like gigantic locomotives. The Union troops, smarting with their shameful defeat of the previous day, met the swarming legions of rebellion with reckless determination, and soon the tables of Sunday were partly turned. The Nineteenth deposited their knapsacks, and stripped off all useless weight for the coming fight. Gen. Boyle said of the Nineteenth: "The Colonel (Beatty) and Capt. Manderson (Acting Major) held their men steady, and deported themselves, as did their officers and men, with coolness and courage, until the Colonel ordered them back to a position from under the fire of the enemy's battery. This position was held until the guns of the enemy were silenced by the well-directed fire of Capt. Bartlett's Battery. Maj. Edwards (Acting Lieutenant Colonel) was shot dead from his horse, and a number of privates were killed and wounded." The regiment spent ten days without tents or camp equipage, in the mud and rain and the dreadful stench of the battle-field. After this, it participated in the advance on Corinth, and the siege of the same. Near Farmingham, on the 22d of May, the regiment had six men wounded in a picket skirmish, two of whom died of their wounds. It entered Corinth on the 29th, and, on the 3d of June, went as far as Brownsboro in pursuit of the enemy. It then returned to Iuka, joined Gen. Buell's column, and marched with it to Florence, Ala., and to Battle Creek, where it arrived July 14. On the 21st of August, it marched to Nashville, and, with the army of Buell, made that arduous march to Louisville, Ky.

The Nineteenth marched to near Perryville, starting October 1, and reaching that point on the 8th, too late to participate in the battle there. It joined in the pursuit of the enemy, and near Crab Orchard had a running skirmish, capturing a cannon, with its accoutrements. It marched through Somerset and Glasgow to Gallatin, doing provost duty for two weeks, and finally joined its division at Hermitage, passing through Nashville, and encamping near the State Lunatic Asylum. About this time, Col. Beatty was appointed Brigadier General, and, on the 26th of December, the regiment, commanded by Maj. C.

F. Manderson, moved toward Murfreesboro. It was thrown across Stone River on the 31st, but was compelled to withdraw, and, re-crossing the river, it aided in checking the advance of the rebels on the right. Under the personal lead of Gen. Rosecrans, Beatty's brigade charged the enemy, drove him about three-fourths of a mile, and held the position until relieved. The regiment, with other troops, crossed Stone River January 2, 1863, and received the charge of the rebel column under Breckinridge, but was forced back until the massed artillery could play upon the advancing enemy, when the latter was driven across the river with great slaughter. It was one of the two to cross Stone River first, and, with the assistance of men of other regiments, captured four pieces of artillery from the famous Washington (Louisiana) Battery. A mile of ground was gained, and when the battle ended with darkness, the regiment, which had entered with 449 men, came out with but 237, having lost nearly half in killed, wounded and missing. Maj. C. F. Manderson was promoted to Lieutenant Colonel January 5. The whole army remained at Murfreesboro until June 28, when the Nineteenth was marched to McMinnville, where it remained until August 16, when it crossed the Cumberland Mountains, reaching Lee & Gordon's Mills on the 13th of September. Two men of Company D were killed in a skirmish at Crawfish Springs. On the 18th of September, the regiment, with other troops, was ordered to advance upon the enemy, which order was executed with a cheer. The rebels were driven back, and a battery and several prisoners were captured. But the captors were in turn driven back by a heavy force of the enemy, and were unfortunately mistaken for the rebels and fired upon by other Federal troops, causing the loss of several men. The regiment fought hard on the 20th at Chickamauga, and at nightfall withdrew with the army to Chattanooga, having lost about one hundred men in killed, wounded and missing. The Nineteenth remained in Chattanooga during the siege, and, on the 23d of November, took part in the advance on Orchard Knob, losing some twenty men killed and wounded. On the 25th, it participated in the charge on the rebel works at the foot of Mission Ridge, and, without orders, climbed the steep sides of the mountain, driving the rebels in confusion down the opposite side, and losing one man killed and thirteen wounded. It returned to Chattanooga, and then, with Sherman, moved toward Knoxville, suffering severely during the march, leaving footprints in blood on the snowy ground. The regiment moved to Strawberry Plains and Flat Creek, and 400 men, on the 1st of January, 1864, re-enlisted at the latter place as veteran volunteers. From the 4th until the 16th, the regiment marched to Chattanooga, where the veterans were mustered in and the others mustered out. The regiment then returned to Ohio, reaching Cleveland on the 16th of February.

The regiment finally started for Knoxville, Tenn., where it arrived March 24, 1864. On the 9th of April, it moved to McDonald's Station, and there began preparing for the Atlanta campaign. On the 6th of May, Sherman's whole army began this important movement, and the Nineteenth was sent to Parker's Gap to hold that pass. Afterward, it participated in the fight at New Hope Church, where about fifty men were killed and wounded. It was engaged at Kenesaw, at Peach Tree Creek, at the crossing of the Chattahoochie River, and was under fire almost daily up to the evacuation of Atlanta. It also passed with Sherman around to the right of Atlanta, engaging in the affair at Jonesboro. On the 2d of September, it participated in the action at Lovejoy Station, where, among other casualties, Col. Manderson was severely wounded in the spine. Seventy men were killed and wounded. It captured the enemy's front line of works, and held it for three days. The loss to the regiment in the Atlanta campaign was: Killed, two commissioned officers and twenty-eight men; wounded, six commissioned officers and ninety-six men; missing, thirteen men. When Sherman started on his march to the sea, the Nineteenth was ordered back toward Nashville to aid in opposing Gen. Hood. During the investment of Franklin, it lost a few men, and a few more at Nashville. It followed Hood to the Tennessee River, and, on the 5th of January, 1865, was established at Huntsville, where it remained until April.

On the 17th of March, Col. Manderson resigned, from physical disability, and Lieut. Col. Nash assumed command. In April, it moved into East Tennessee, but soon returned to Nashville. In June, it started for Texas, and suffered severely from hard marches. On the 21st of October, 1865, the gallant Nineteenth was mustered out of service at San Antonio, Texas, and the tired boys started joyously toward home. It reached Columbus, Ohio, November 22, and was paid off and discharged at Camp Chase three days later, and the brave boys, after nearly five years of active and honorable service, started for home, and were welcomed all along the journey by crowds of grateful people.

The Seventy-sixth Regiment contained about two companies from Stark. The officers were: Company K, James M. Jay, Captain; David R. Kelley, First Lieutenant; Mark Sperry, Second Lieutenant. Company I, Edward Briggs, Captain; James M. Blackman, First Lieutenant; John H. Hardgrove, Second Lieutenant. The regimental officers were: Charles R. Woods, Colonel; William B. Woods, Lieutenant Colonel; Willard Warner, Major; Charles R. Pierce, Surgeon; John W. McCarty, Chaplain. The regiment was recruited for three years' service at Newark, Ohio, where it was organized on the 9th of February, 1862. It immediately proceeded, via Paducah, Ky., to Fort Donelson, and took an active part in the engagement there. On the 6th of March, it moved to Crump's Landing, where it remained until the 31st, when it marched to Adamsville, and took position in Gen. Lew Wallace's division, on the right of Gen. Grant's army. It made a forced march, on the 6th of April, to Pittsburg Landing, going into line of battle at dark, and being constantly under fire during the remainder of the fight. In a reconnaissance toward Corinth toward the last of April, it charged the rebels, drove them from their position, and destroyed their camp equipage. It moved with the army to Corinth, thence to Memphis, where it arrived on the 17th of June, having marched 130 miles with wagon supplies. On the 24th of July, it moved down the river and encamped at Helena, Ark. Here it was placed in the Second Brigade, Third Division. It participated in the movement down the river to Milliken's Bend in August, where a rebel regiment from Louisiana was surprised, and its camp and garrison equipage captured. The enemy was followed nine miles, and forty prisoners were captured. A portion of the Seventy-sixth participated in the movement on Haines' Bluff, when four siege-guns, two field pieces and a large quantity of fixed ammunition were captured. Early in October, the regiment moved to St. Genevieve, Mo., and a week later, to Pilot Knob, where it rested and re-organized. On the 12th of November, it returned to St. Genevieve, and embarked for Camp Steele, Miss. In December, it formed part of the expedition against Vicksburg, but did not engage the enemy. It moved up the river about the 10th of January, 1863, landing at Arkansas Post. The night of the 10th, the regiment marched six miles through mud and water, and, by 2 o'clock next morning, occupied the cantonments of the enemy. Shortly after daylight, they moved upon the enemy's works, and, about 1 o'clock, charged within one hundred yards of the rifle-pits, halted, opened fire, and held the position for three hours, when the enemy surrendered. On the 23d, the regiment moved to Young's Point, La. During February, the regiment worked largely upon the canal in progress across the neck of land opposite Vicksburg. On the 2d of April, it moved to Greenville, Miss., and, on the 7th, routed the rebels, under Col. Ferguson, on Deer Creek. It destroyed a million dollars' worth of corn and cotton, and returned to Greenville with large numbers of cattle, horses and mules. About three hundred negroes followed, who afterward served in colored regiments.

During the last of April, it occupied Young's Point and Milliken's Bend, and, early in May, moved to the rear of Vicksburg, arriving at the river on the 6th. At Fourteen Mile Creek it had a brisk skirmish with the enemy's cavalry; and at Jackson it charged the enemy's works, which were evacuated, and the city surrendered. It moved on Vicksburg, and established itself near the river and within 600 yards of the main lines of the enemy. The guns of the enemy in front were silenced. Heavy details were made for strengthening the works; and during the nights eight guns were taken from the sunken gunboat Cincinnati, and placed in position with telling effect. After the surrender of Vicksburg, it moved in pursuit of Johnson, reaching Jackson on the 10th of July. Here it was employed in foraging and making reconnoissances. It rested and re-organized at Big Black Bridge. In September, it moved to Memphis, thence to Corinth, and, during October and November, marched and skirmished in Northern Alabama and Tennessee, arriving at Chattanooga in time to join Gen. Hooker, in the assault on Lookout Mountain. The regiment was engaged at Mission Ridge, and, on the 27th of November, charged up Taylor's Ridge under a heavy fire, suffering a fearful loss. In one company of twenty men, eight were killed and eight wounded; and seven men were shot down while carrying the regimental colors. The regiment finally went into winter quarters at Paint Rock, Ala. In January, 1864, about two-thirds of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans; and, early in February, the regiment returned to Ohio on furlough, and was warmly welcomed by the citizens. The Seventy-sixth went away 962 strong, and returned in two years with less than three hundred. It returned to Paint Rock in March, and, on the 1st of May, started for Chattanooga, where it arrived on the 6th, and pushed forward twelve miles. It moved through Snake Creek Gap, and continued to advance until the evening of the 14th, when it charged across the fields with its brigade, under a hot fire, and gained a footing on the first line of hills west of Resaca. The enemy evacuated that point about the 16th, and the regiment advanced to Dallas.

In June, the regiment moved to Rossville, thence to within four miles of Atlanta, where it arrived on the 20th of July. Here the regiment with the Thirteenth Ohio recaptured four twenty-pound Parrott guns; and later, the Fifteenth Corps, of which the Seventy-sixth formed a part, was charged upon three successive times by heavy masses of the enemy, but without avail. One thousand of the rebel dead were found in front of the Fifteenth Corps. On the 13th of August, the regiment captured fifty prisoners. On the 26th, it marched southward toward Jonesboro; and, on the night of the 30th, formed in line across Flint River. The rebels charged the line on the following day, but were repulsed. After remaining at East Point about a month, the regiment on the 4th of October, crossed the Chattahoochie, marched through Marietta, Resaca, Snake Creek Gap, and, on the 16th, skirmished with the enemy at Ship's Gap. On the 18th, it bivouacked at Summerville, where the non-veterans were mustered out. In November, the regiment started with Sherman for the sea, passing through McDonough, Indian Springs, Clinton, Irwintown, and down the Ogeechee to the mouth of the Canoochee, thence westward to Savannah, twenty-six days' march from Atlanta. Here it performed provost guard duty until the 9th of January, 1865, when it embarked for Beaufort, S. C., and soon afterward marched to Gardner's Corners. On the 31st, it started on the campaign of the Carolinas. It skirmished at Columbia, and, after the evacuation of the city, performed provost-guard duty for four days. The regiment moved to Fayetteville on the 12th of March, thence to Bentonville, and finally to Raleigh, where it remained until Johnston's surrender. The Seventy-sixth then marched to Washington, D. C., where it shared in the grand review, and shortly afterward moved to Louisville, Ky., where it was mustered out of service. It then proceeded to Columbus, Ohio, and was discharged on the 24th of July, 1865. The regiment, during its term of service, participated in forty-four battles and skirmishes; moved 9,625 miles by foot, rail and water, and passed through eleven rebellious States. Two hundred and forty-one men were wounded in battle; 351 died on the field or in hospitals; 222 carry scars as evidences of their struggle with the enemy; and 282 have the seeds of disease, contracted in the line of duty. It is a sad, but noble record, and the survivors may well be proud of the part they took in establishing the permanence and greatness of the American Union.

In June, 1862, Capt. Andrew V. P. Day enlisted a company of 102 men in Stark County, for the 100-day service, in the Eighty-sixth Regiment. The company was I, and was officered as follows: Andrew Day, Captain; Charles C. Brandt, First Lieutenant; Samuel S. Blackford, Second Lieutenant. Company G, of the Eighty-sixth, was partly composed of Stark County men. The regiment was organized at Camp Chase on the 11th day of June, 1862. It was ordered to West Virginia, and, on the 17th of June, arrived at Clarksburg. Here it was stationed to guard the railroad and protect Grafton, which town was the base of supplies for a large number of troops. On the 27th of July, Companies A, C, H and I, under the command of Col. Hunter, were ordered to Parkersburg in anticipation of a raid upon that point. The citizens were found greatly excited, and the companies, with the exception of H, which was ordered to different points on the railroad east of the city, remained to guard Parkersburg. In August, this detachment was ordered back to Clarksburg, and thence toward Beverly as far as Huttonsville to repel the threatened invasion of Ohio by the rebels under Jenkins. The latter did not appear, and the Eighty-sixth returned to Clarksburg, reaching that place about the 26th of July. Afterward, in this vicinity, Jenkins succeeded in destroying nearly $200,000 worth of Government stores. It was thought at one time that he contemplated an attack on Clarksburg, allured by the tempting chance of destroying the large stores there, and anticipating this movement the troops removed the stores to Fairmount and Wheeling. The Eighty-sixth remained at and near Clarksburg, prepared to make a vigorous defense. Jenkins, probably aware of the condition of things, continued on toward Weston and the Ohio River. Soon after this, the three months' term of enlistment expired, and the regiment was ordered to Camp Delaware, Ohio, where it arrived on the 18th of September. Seven days later, it was paid and mustered out of the service. The regiment was afterward re-organized under a six months' enlistment; but contained no men from Stark County. In the One Hundred and Fourth Regiment, Companies B, E and part of A were from Stark County. The officers were: Company B, Jesse K. Coats, Captain; Franklin A. Perdue, First Lieutenant; Andrew J. Southworth, Second Lieutenant. Company E, Andrew J. Bahney, Captain; Augustus B. Ricks, First Lieutenant; Shepherd M. Knapp, Second Lieutenant. Company A, Oscar W. Stearl, Captain; George V. Kelly, First Lieutenant; William M. Jameson, Second Lieutenant. The regimental officers were: James W. Reiley, Colonel; Asa S. Mariner, Lieutenant Colonel; Lorin D. Woodsworth, Major. It is very probable that other companies than those mentioned contained men from Stark County, as the regiment was organized at Camp Massillon. About the 1st of September, the regiment left the last-named camp for Cincinnati, and upon its arrival was sent across the river to Covington, and went into camp three miles out on the Alexandria Turnpike, to prevent the threatened attack of Kirby Smith on

"The 'Queen of the West,'
In her garlands dressed,
On the banks of the Beautiful River."

Later it was sent to Covington, and thence to Fort Mitchell, where, in a slight skirmish with rebels, one man was killed and five wounded. The rebel loss was twice as great. This was the first and only blood spilled in defense of the "Queen City." September 12, the regiment marched toward Lexington in pursuit of the rebels, and suffered intensely on the way. At Lexington, the regiment remained until the 6th of December, and while here received the compliment from the commanding officer of being the best disciplined regiment in the command. On the 6th of December, it moved to Clay's Ferry, on the Kentucky River, and, on the following day, reached Richmond. Here it assisted in constructing formidable earthworks. On the 27th of December, the regiment moved to Danville, to intercept John Morgan's guerrilla force. Slight skirmishing occurred, and the troops moved back to Frankfort in January, 1863. Here the regiment was mounted, and assigned provost-duty until February 21, when it marched to Danville through the furious snow storm. On the second night, Harrodsburg was reached. It remained in Kentucky, watching the rebel force under Morgan, Pegram and Cluke, until the following summer, and finally joined Gen. Burnside at Knoxville early in September, 1863.

During this period, the regiment suffered numerous hard marches and privations, and on one occasion lost twenty-five men captured. It was also placed in the First Brigade, Third Division, Twenty-third Army Corps, under Gen. Hartsuff, the First Brigade, under orders marched with such rapidity to Cumberland Gap as to receive a complimentary telegram from President Lincoln. Gen. Burnside demanded the surrender of the Gap, but was refused. Just as he was preparing to carry it with the bayonet, the rebel leader surrendered his entire command as prisoners of war. The One Hundred and Fourth was the first regiment to enter the works. In November, at the siege of Knoxville, the regiment was ordered to the south side of Holston River, where it had a spirited engagement, and the enemy was repulsed with considerable loss. Great hardships were endured by the men during the siege. Later, it skirmished with the retreating rebels under Gen. Longstreet. It spent the winter in the vicinity of Blain's Cross-Roads, and during this dreary period was but half fed and half clothed. In April, 1864, it was ordered to Cleveland, Tenn., where the troops were preparing for the Atlanta campaign. It moved forward with the army, and in the desperate assault at Utoy Creek lost twenty-six officers and men killed and wounded. It accompanied the movement to Jonesboro, but did not participate in the engagement. It tore up railroads and guarded lines of communication until the fall of Atlanta, when it marched to Decatur. In October it moved North with Gen. Thomas, passing through Marietta, Acworth, Allatoona, Cassville, Kingston, Rome, Calhoun, Resaca, Snake Creek Gap, Gaylorsville, and finally reached Cedar Bluff, Ala. Near the last of the month, it moved to Rome, Ga., thence to Dalton, where, on the 6th of November, it took cars for Nashville. It moved to Spring Hill, Columbia, Pulaski, thence back to Columbia, where it had a skirmish with a force of rebel cavalry. After this, in other skirmishes, it lost several men killed and wounded. It participated in the fight at Franklin, the severest in which it was ever engaged, losing sixty killed and wounded, including Capt. Kimball and Lieut. Bard, who were both shot dead. Several Lieutenants were severely wounded. The battle began at 5 o'clock on the evening of November 30, and lasted five hours. After the fight, the regiment marched to Nashville, where it remained until December 30, when it moved to the right, and, in a slight skirmish, lost three men wounded. On the 16th, it participated in a charge on the enemy's works. In January, the regiment was transferred to Federal Point, N. C. On the 18th of February, it skirmished with the rebels near Fort Anderson, losing five men killed and wounded. Two days later, at Old Town Creek, it charged the enemy, losing two killed and twenty wounded. After occupying several points and taking part in the grand review at Raleigh, it was finally mustered out of service on the 17th of June, 1865, at Greensboro. On the 27th of June, it was paid off and discharged at Cleveland.

The One Hundred and Seventh Regiment was represented by more than a company from Stark County. The regiment was largely German, and was organized at Camp Taylor, near Cleveland, August 25, 1862. Seraphim Meyer, of Canton, was chosen Colonel; Charles Mueller, Lieutenant Colonel; George Arnold, Major; and C. A. Hartman, of Cleveland, Surgeon. It remained at Cleveland preparing for the field until the latter part of September, when it was ordered to Covington, Ky. Companies A and D and about fifty men of Company H were from Stark County. The officers of Company A were: Captain, Peter Sisterhen; First Lieutenant, Jacob Hose; Second Lieutenant, John H. Piero. Those of Company D were: Captain, Bernard Steiner; First Lieutenant, Samuel Surlburg; Second Lieutenant, William T. Bechtel. Those of Company H were: Captain, Augustus Vignos; First Lieutenant, John Sinning; Second Lieutenant, Philip Setzler. The regiment was ordered to Covington to assist in repelling the threatened attack of Kirby Smith on Cincinnati. At the end of a week, it was ordered to Delaware, Ohio, and soon afterward to Washington, D. C., where it was employed for nearly a week on the fortifications of that city. Early in November, it was ordered to Fairfax C. H., Virginia, and two weeks later to Stafford C. H., where it was assigned to the Second Brigade, First Division, Eleventh Army Corps, Maj. Gen. Sigel commanding. Two weeks later, it was ordered on a flanking expedition to the left and rear of Fredericksburg, to co-operate with Gen. Burnside on a second attack against that point, but the design was foiled by bad roads, and the regiment fell back with the army to Brooks Station, where it went into winter quarters. On the 29th of April, 1863, the whole division moved across the Rappahannock to Chancellorsville, and took part in the bloody battles there on the 2d and 3d of May. The regiment went into battle under Col. Meyer, and the corps under Gen. Howard. While the storm of battle was threatening, the commanding officer rode along the lines to encourage the men, which he did by telling them that the enemy would attack them in front, and that they must fire low and not throw away a single shot. But the Fates had decreed otherwise. That wonderful man, "Stonewall" Jackson, completely flanked the Union lines, and with his legion of desperate rebels swept like a spirit of destruction upon our lines, scattering the men like chaff before the gale. The One Hundred and Seventh suffered terribly, losing 120 officers and men killed, wounded and missing. The Regimental Surgeon, Dr. Hartman, was instantly killed by a heavy shot which struck him in the abdomen, tearing him in a frightful manner. Company D, from Stark County, lost some twenty men killed, wounded and missing. Company A lost about as heavily, and Company H lost eighteen men. On the 6th of May, the regiment returned to Brooks Station, where it remained until June 12, when it was ordered North to assist in intercepting Gen. Lee, who had invaded Pennsylvania. It passed through Catlett's Station, Manassas Junction, Centerville, Frederick City, and Emmetsburg, reaching Gettysburg on the morning of the 1st of July, and instantly engaging in the battle on the right wing. During the day, it was compelled to fall back through the town of Gettysburg to Cemetery Hill, where it remained during the continuance of the battle. While falling back, the regiment lost in killed, wounded and missing

250 officers and men. On the second day's fight it participated in the headlong charge, capturing a flag from the Eighth Louisiana Tigers, and again losing heavily. The regiment went into the battle of Gettysburg about 550 strong, and came out with less than one hundred and fifty men, rank and file. Lieut. Col. Mueller was wounded in the arm. Capt. Steiner, of Company D, was shot through the bowels, from which he afterward died. Adjutant Young, who captured the rebel flag, was severely wounded. Capt. Vignos, of Canton, had his right arm terribly shattered, necessitating amputation, which was not performed, however, until two or three days after the battle. Nothing daunted by the fearful loss, the remnant of the regiment, 111 guns strong, joined in pursuit of the rebel army, following it to Hagerstown, thence to Catlett's Station, in Virginia. On the 1st of August, the regiment was removed on transports to Folly Island, S. C., where it performed picket duty until January, 1864, when it was removed by boat to Kiawah Island. It waded over to Seabrook Island, driving the rebels from that point, and returning to Folly Island, where it remained until the 7th of February, when a similar expedition was made across Seabrook Island to John's Island, in order to cover the operations of Gen. Gilmore at Olustee, Fla. A lively skirmish was had with the rebels at John's Island. It returned to Folly Island on the 11th of February, and, on the 23d, was taken on transports to Jacksonville, Fla., where it had several light skirmishes with the enemy. In July it moved to Fernandina, but, a month later, returned to Jacksonville. On the 29th of December, it was taken on transports to Devos Neck, S. C., where it had several skirmishes with the enemy, losing five men killed and about fifteen wounded. It afterward marched to Pocatoligo Station, thence to Gardner's Corners, where it did picket duty some seven days. It then with some detention marched to Charleston, S. C., and soon afterward was taken by boat to Georgetown, doing picket duty there until the 23d of March, when it moved to Sumterville, meeting and defeating the enemy, and capturing three pieces of artillery, six horses and fifteen prisoners, with the loss of four men wounded. At Singleton Plantation it met the enemy, and lost two men wounded. Near this point it destroyed considerable railroad property. On the 16th of April, 1865, the news of the surrender of Lee and Johnston reached the regiment. It moved back to Georgetown, and three weeks afterward was conveyed by steamer to Charleston, doing provost duty until July 10, when it was mustered out of the service and sent to Cleveland, at which point the men received their pay, and immediately started with light hearts to meet the loved ones at home, and to receive the warmest thanks of their fellow-citizens.

In the One Hundred and Fifteenth Regiment, Companies B, E and F were almost or quite wholly from Stark County, and, in addition to this, about thirty men of Company K were from Massillon, some twenty of Company I from near Alliance, and a few from the county in Company D, making a total of about four companies from "Molly Stark." These companies were officered as follows: Company B, Lewis F. Hake, Captain; John S. Orr, First Lieutenant; William Pence, Second Lieutenant. Company E, Joseph S. Harter, Captain; J. G. Mohler, First Lieutenant; G. M. Hershey, Second Lieutenant. Company F, Alfred J. Ware, Captain; H. C. Ellison, First Lieutenant; H. C. March, Second Lieutenant. Company K, William Ramsey, Captain; A. W. Thompson, First Lieutenant; J. N. Campbell, of Stark County, Second Lieutenant. The regiment was organized at Camp Massillon in August, 1862, and was mustered into the service September 18, 1862, by Capt. A. E. Drake, of the Second United States Infantry. The regimental officers were: Jackson A. Lucy, Colonel; Thomas C. Boone, Lieutenant Colonel; Isaac H. Fitch, Major; H. B. Johnson, Surgeon. The regiment was at first 985 strong, received during its term of service over three hundred recruits, and at muster-out numbered 630 officers and men. About the 1st of October, 1862, the regiment was ordered to report to Gen. Wright at Cincinnati, where it arrived on the 4th. Five days later, it was separated in two divisions of five companies each, one under the command of Lieut. Col. Boone, proceeding to Camp Chase, Columbus, to do guard duty, and the other, under Col. Lucy, remaining at Cincinnati, to act as provost guard. The two divisions exchanged commanders in November, 1862, Col. Lucy going to Maysville, Ky., and Lieut. Col. Boone remaining at Cincinnati. Col. Lucy, with five companies of the regiment, was ordered from Maysville to Covington in December, 1862, where the troops did provost-duty until October, 1863, when they were relieved and ordered to report to Gen. Rosecrans at Chattanooga. Reaching Murfreesboro, it was joined by the other division, and was ordered to report to the post-commander for duty. A portion of the regiment was at once mounted, and sent after rebel guerrillas, infesting the country between Nashville and Tullahoma. In June, 1864, that portion of the regiment not mounted was posted in block-houses on the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad, to prevent the track from being destroyed by the guerrillas. In August, one of the block-houses under the protection of Sergt. Flohr, of Company B, was captured by rebel forces under Gen. Wheeler. Another one, commanded by Lieut. Orr of the same company, was attacked at the same time, but the rebels were handsomely repulsed. Lieut. Orr lost three men killed and seven wounded, out of the detachment of forty men. Soon after this, Company K (mounted) surprised and captured a squad of guerrillas, losing Sergt. Richmond killed and three men wounded. Portions of Companies C, F and G were afterward captured by rebel forces under Forrest. One of the block-houses was assaulted and surrounded by rebels, and for fifteen days the garrison dared not venture outside. Another commanded by Lieut. Harter was assaulted by the enemy with three pieces of rifled artillery, and, from 9 o'clock in the morning until dark, a continuous fire was kept up, occasioning a loss of two killed and five wounded. Under cover of the night, the garrison withdrew to Nashville. One battalion of the regiment with other troops garrisoned Murfreesboro, when that place was attacked by Gen. Buford. After five hours of hard fighting, Gen. Rousseau repulsed the rebels with heavy loss. The members of Companies B, C, F and G, eighty in number, who had been captured in the block-houses already referred to, and who had been paroled and placed on board the ill-fated steamer Sultana bound for the North, were killed and wounded by a terrible explosion on board the boat. The regiment performed other guard duty in Tennessee until the 23d of June, 1865, when it was mustered out of service by Capt. W. S. Wilson, A. C. M., receiving its final discharge and pay at Cleveland July 7, 1865.

Col. Boone, at Cincinnati, had charge of all prisoners, military and political, and of forwarding troops to their respective regiments. He was in command there when the civil and military authorities were brought in conflict. The Colonel refused to obey the writ of habeas corpus issued by Judge Paddock, of Hamilton County, for the delivery of certain deserters to the civil authorities; whereupon a warrant for the arrest of the Colonel was issued, but could not be executed, on account of the guard which constantly surrounded the person of the commanding officer. In July, 1863, Col. Boone called out his battalion to assist in the pursuit of John Morgan, and, in October of the same year, the regiment proceeded to the front, and was assigned to the Fourth Division, Twentieth Army Corps. Although this regiment was thoroughly reliable and well-drilled, it was not permitted to be massed on the field at any time.

The One Hundred and Sixty-second Regiment, with the exception of one company from Brown County, was wholly from Stark County. The regimental officers were: Ephraim Ball, Colonel; James E. Dougherty, Lieutenant Colonel; Benjamin A. White-leather, Major. Many of the men were wealthy or in good circumstances. The regiment was mustered into the 100-day service in May, 1864, at Camp Chase, when Companies A, C, F and K were assigned duty at Tod Barracks, near Columbus, and the remaining companies at Camp Chase, where they remained until they were ordered into Kentucky to assist in repelling John Morgan. The regiment arrived at Covington the day after Morgan's defeat at Cynthiana. Several companies were placed on duty here, and the remainder of the regiment sent down the river to Carrolton, which was threatened by Moses Webster's men. Two companies on horses scoured the country, but Webster was "conspicuous for his absence." After a few days, the companies returned to Covington, and performed post-duty. After performing some other service, the regiment, on the 4th of September, 1864, was mustered out of the service at Camp Chase.

The One Hundred and Seventy-eighth Regiment had one company (I) or thereabouts from Stark, under the command of W. A. Miller, Captain. The men were recruited for one year's service in the fall of 1864. The regiment was organized by Lieut. Col. A. C. Johnson, at Camp Chase, on the 29th of September, and was immediately ordered to report to Gen. Thomas, Nashville, Tenn. It did guard duty here two weeks, and was then sent to Tullahoma, where Lieut. Poland, of Company B, while scouting with a detachment of men near Manchester, captured John Seal, a noted guerrilla and murderer, and executed him without the formalities of a court-martial. During the winter of 1864, the regiment was transferred to Murfreesboro. Col. Johnson was appointed Chief of Artillery, and, during the movement, superintended the transfer of artillery and ordnance; and, while Murfreesboro was besieged by Gen. Hood, the Colonel was Chief of Artillery on Gen. Rousseau's staff. Frequent sorties were made in force from the fort for foraging purposes, under the command of Gen. Milroy, with severe fighting. The regiment under Col. Joab Stafford was closely engaged, on one occasion losing both of its color bearers. In the fight at Wilkerson's Pike, it was with the force under Gen. Milroy, when two fine twelve-pounder Napoleons and 200 prisoners were captured. After Hood was defeated at Nashville, the regiment was brigaded in the Third Brigade, First Division, Twenty-third Army Corps, and ordered to North Carolina. It landed at Moorehead City, and, a few days later, participated in a smart skirmish with the enemy under Gen. Johnston, at Wise's Fork. It joined Gen. Sherman at Goldsboro, and moved with him to Raleigh, and, after Johnston's surrender, was ordered to Charlotte, N. C., where it performed garrison-duty until mustered out of service June 29, 1865. It was finally paid and discharged at Camp Chase, Ohio, July 10, 1865.

The One Hundred and Eighty-fourth Regiment was recruited to serve for one year, and had one company (B) under the command of Capt. Joseph Allen, from Stark County. It was organized on the 21st of February, 1865, and was ordered to Nashville, Tenn., where it remained a short time doing garrison-duty. It finally moved to Chattanooga, thence to Bridgeport, Ala., which point was reached about the 21st of March, and was engaged in protecting an important railroad bridge over the Tennessee River. It also guarded the track between Bridgeport and Chattanooga, a distance of about thirty miles. While performing this duty, detachments of the regiment stationed in block-houses and forts along the road had frequent encounters with the rebel guerrillas and squads of rebel cavalry. On the 25th of July, it was ordered to Edgefield for garrison-duty, remaining here until it was mustered out of service on the 20th of September, 1865. It was paid and discharged at Camp Chase, September 27, 1865. The regiment was a capable one, being largely composed of men who had seen active service in other regiments. Its bravery was not tested on the field of battle.

The Third Independent Battery, known as Williams' Battery, and consisting of about thirty men with one gun, was organized under the old militia law before the commencement of the war. When the guns of Sumter spoke, Capt. William S. Williams, of Canton, who had gone to Michigan, returned to Canton, and was authorized to enlist volunteers for the artillery service, and his old "gun squad" as a body placed their names upon the roll. Daniel Lanker was First Lieutenant of the squad. The services of the battery were tendered the Governor, who accepted, and the boys were ordered to report at Columbus during the latter part of June, 1861. Here they were united with Capt. Cotter with about thirty men with one gun, all to be under the command of Capt. Cotter, who outranked Capt. Williams by seniority of commission. The two old guns were exchanged for new six-pound rifled guns; and the battery was ordered to Gallipolis, where it remained two weeks, drilling and preparing for the field. It was then ordered up the Great Kanawha, and attached to Gen. Cox's division in Western Virginia. It participated in the fight at Scarey Creek, shelling Gen. Wise's forces from their works, and losing one man mortally wounded. The battery had a lively skirmish at Charleston, and captured one gun. Some two months later, it participated in the fight at Hawk's Nest, where one of the Canton boys lost an arm. The battery then moved back to Kanawha Falls, and soon afterward, its term of enlistment (three months) having expired, Gen. Cox requested the boys to remain until they were relieved, which they accordingly did. In November, they were ordered to Columbus, where they were mustered out and sent home. Capt. Williams returned to Canton to recruit for the three years' artillery service. He secured about eighty men and F. J. Myers, of Canton, and W. J. Mong, of Minerva, about as many more—in all 161—and, in February, 1862, the company was ordered to Camp Denison, where the following officers were elected: William S. Williams, Captain; W. J. Mong, Senior First Lieutenant; F. J. Myers, Junior First Lieutenant; W. G. Watson, Senior Second Lieutenant; Thomas J. Blackman, Junior Second Lieutenant. Here the battery was provided with four six-pound rifled bronze guns, and two six-pound smooth-bore bronze guns, together with all necessary accouterments, horses, etc. In March, the battery was ordered to Benton Barracks, St. Louis, Mo., where it remained until about the 1st of April, when it was conveyed to Pittsburg Landing, arriving there Sunday night at the close of the first day's battle. As the boats approached the place, thousands of wounded, frightened and desperate men lined the river bank. Some had concealed themselves at the extreme edge of the bank, clinging to roots or anything that would support them. Here it is said originated the army expression "grab a root." The sight was sickening. Scores of surgeons were busily engaged amputating limbs that were piled in heaps on the bank. Strong men grew white as death at the dreadful scene. Capt. Williams inquired for the commanding General, but no one seemed to know where he was. The Captain pressed one of the superior officers for orders, and the latter at last impatiently exclaimed: "Oh just go out here anywhere; it's no trouble to find good shooting." Accordingly the guns were taken ashore, and everything got in readiness for the conflict of the morrow. The day dawned, and the battery assisted in driving the rebels back in full retreat. Soon afterward, the battery assisted in the siege and capture of Corinth and at the battle of Iuka. It moved with Gen. Grant in the first advance toward Vicksburg; but fell back when the base of supplies was cut by Forrest. At Memphis the boys received new clothing, etc. About the 1st of February, 1863, the Third Battery moved with Gen. Grant to Grand Gulf, below Vicksburg. Some time before this Capt. Williams, for gallant and meritorious service, was made Acting Chief of Artillery of Gen. Logan's Division, the appointment being confirmed in August. This gave him rank equivalent to Brigadier Generalship. After this he was the intimate friend and associate of corps, division and brigade commanders, and was considered by these officers as Bonaparte considered Marshals Murat or Ney. He was held in reserve until the crisis of the battle, and then his powerful brigade of artillery was thrown to the most difficult position, and never failed to command the admiration and congratulations of superior officers by the consternation it cast in the ranks of the enemy. Capt. Williams received the highest commission possible in the artillery service. The battery participated in the artillery fight at Raymond, Jackson and Champion Hills. At the latter place, it went into an advance position on the gallop, within about seven hundred yards of a heavy rebel battery, which did not perceive his approach. Capt. Williams noticed that his men were nervously impatient, and to cool down their temperature quietly issued his orders between the puffs of his pipe, which he slowly lighted with a sun-glass. When this was accomplished, the men had been told to throw their shells into the rebel battery—every shot to be cast under an apple-tree in the center of the enemy's battery. At the word every gun belched forth its missiles of death, repeating the volley again and again with dreadful results. Nothing of the rebel battery escaped, save a limber and two horses, all else, except a few prisoners, being torn to pieces by the shells. The six guns captured here were turned over to Company F, of the Thirty-second Regiment, which afterward became the Twenty-sixth Ohio Battery, and which contained about fifteen men from Stark County. At this battle, Capt. Williams with four batteries formed a V to check the rapid advance of seven regiments of rebels. Canister from the twenty-four guns was thrown into the advancing ranks, which retreated in disorder. A fence which was standing directly in the way of this destructive volley went down as though stricken by a tornado. The battery entered Vicksburg on the 4th of July, and soon afterward moved with Sherman against Meridian, participating in the fights at Clinton, Jackson and Meridian, losing several men killed and wounded. It returned to Vicksburg, where it remained until the spring of 1864, when it was ordered out to participate in the Atlanta campaign. It was supplied with new twenty-pound Parrott guns at Vicksburg. It moved first to Cairo, thence up the Ohio and Cumberland Rivers, and finally marched across the country to Huntsville, Ala., thence to Rome, Ga., joining Gen. Sherman's army at Big Shanty. At this time, it was in the Seventeenth Corps, then commanded by Gen. Frank Blair, and operated with it at Kenesaw Mountain and Niojack Creek. On the 22d of July, at Leggett's Bald Knob, it was engaged from 11 o'clock A. M. until sundown. This was one of the hottest engagements it was in during the war. The battery was attacked from all sides, and often the men fought hand to hand. Capt. Williams lost one of his guns; and here it was that, as stated by one of the Generals at a late re-union: "Capt. Williams cried like a child." In fifteen minutes the gun was re-taken. Those were the kind of men belonging to the Third Battery, and those were the kind that quelled the rebellion. The battery was supplied with new guns at Atlanta, and moved back to Nashville with Gen. Thomas, but before this it took part in the fights at Jonesboro and Lovejoy Station. After the battle of Nashville, it was transferred to Fort Donelson, where it remained some three months, and was then ordered to Camp Taylor, Cleveland, and mustered out of the service August 1, 1865, and the brave boys remaining returned to their homes. The battery lost some fifty men during its service. Capt. Williams was presented with a fine gold-mounted saber, belt and sash by the members of his company; and, while at Vicksburg, was presented with a miniature Parrott gun cast from rebel projectiles by the members of his battery, in one of the foundries at Vicksburg. Capt. Williams is at present Vice President of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, a fine and merited compliment to a brave man.

This closes the brief and imperfect sketches of the regiments containing a considerable number of Stark County men. Two weeks of continuous labor have been spent to improve the sketches as given by Whitelaw Reid, and to furnish additional matter of interest to the citizens of the county. History at best is but a partial narration of particulars, and this will answer as an apology for whatever imperfections are found in these pages. This chapter cannot be properly closed without reference to the great re-union held in the city of Canton on the 1st of September, 1880. It was determined the year before to hold the next meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic at Canton, and from that time onward preparations on a gigantic scale were begun and executed by select committees appointed for the purpose. Mr. C. Aultman was selected as President; Joseph Biechele and Jacob Miller, Vice Presidents, and an extensive bureau of committees was appointed for the ensuing year. During the winter of 1879-80, through the agency of a loan and bureau association, about $2,500 were realized. Other means were employed, and, at last, when the great day came, some six or eight thousand dollars had been accumulated. The citizens of the county decided to give a grand free dinner at the fair grounds, and, to meet the occasion, over twenty-five thousand feet of lumber were used in constructing tables, seats, etc., and that portion of the grounds inclosed by the track was almost wholly taken up by these tables. The day dawned bright and clear, and the citizens were aroused by the roll of drums and the report of cannon. The business portion of the city and a large number of private residences were one grand profusion of evergreen boughs, flags and decorations. Almost the whole county turned out for the occasion, and it is said 40,000 strangers were in the city. The following distinguished persons were present: President and Mrs. Hayes, Gen. Garfield, Gov. Foster, Ex-Gov. Bishop, Gens. Sherman, Hazen, Devens, Crook, Carroll, Kennedy, Gibson, Heckenlooper, Meyer, Poe, Leggett, Barnett, Robinson, Beatty, Voris, Manderson, Wiley, Com. Wells, Col. Corbin, Hon. Stanley Matthews, Webb Hayes, Hon. Amos Townsend, Maj. Goodspeed, Col. Dewstoe and several others. During the forenoon the procession was formed as follows:

Maj. Gen. Samuel Beatty and Staff.
Grand Army Band.
Wallace Grays.
Open landau, drawn by four white horses, containing President Hayes and suite. Two open carriages, with Gen. Garfield, Ex-Gov. Bishop, Maj. McKinley, and other prominent officers and citizens.

East Liverpool Band.
East Liverpool Veterans [100 men].
Members of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry.
Twenty-eighth, Fourth and Eleventh Pennsylvania Infantry.
Citizens in Carriages.

This splendid procession was over an hour in passing a given point, and on its march was accompanied by thousands of the citizens. At the fair grounds the vast assemblage partook of the dinner prepared. Each township had a separate table, ornamented with a large maltese cross at its center, upon which was the name of the township. Five steam engines were used in forcing the water from twenty-one pumps, the water to be used for cooking purposes. About four hundred waiters ministered to the wants of the public, and the distinguished persons were distributed around among the townships, so that none of the latter would be left out in the cold, as it were. Mayor Valleley delivered the welcoming speech, and Gen. Kennedy replied on behalf of the visitors. Then the great men of the nation were brought forward, one by one, and introduced, and were greeted by the vast assemblage with loud acclamations and thundering cheers. Speeches were delivered by the following persons in about the order given: President Hayes, Gen. Garfield, Gen. W. T. Sherman, Hon. Stanley Matthews, Gen.

Wiley, Ex-Gov. Bishop, Maj. McKinley, Gov. Foster, Gen. Voris, Gen. Devens, Gen. Crook, Senator Sullivan and others. At night, on the square in Canton, $500 worth of fireworks, in charge of an experienced man from New York, were exhibited to 25,000 people. The crowd present during the day was the largest ever in Canton. Although the costs were very great, yet, so great had been the effort, that the citizens found they had left about $1,000, which has since been subscribed to the monument fund. It may be said, in conclusion, that the citizens, generally, celebrate Decoration Day in a fitting manner. Some distinguished speaker is obtained, who reviews the achievements of the honored dead, and demonstrates that their death was not in vain.

The silent mounds of sod are lovingly decked with sweet blossoms, and over the precious dust of the dead heroes waves the bright banner they died to sustain. Let us not forget them, but place their names, like jewels in memory's golden urn, to be treasured in everlasting remembrance. It is sad, though glorious, to think of the noble lives sacrificed on the bloody altar of secession; but we forgive it all, and accept the advice of the sweet singer:

“From the silence of sorrowful hours
The desolate mourners go,
Lovingly laden with flowers,
Alike for the friend and the foe.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day,
Under the roses the Blue,
Under the lilies the Gray.”

CHAPTER VI.*

THE COURT AND BAR—COMMON PLEAS—ASSOCIATE AND PRESIDENT JUDGES—LAWYERS, PAST AND PRESENT.

ON Tuesday, the 18th day of April, 1809, the first Court of Common Pleas was held in Stark County, at the house of Philip Dewalt in Canton. Present, the Hon. Calvin Pease, President Judge; Thomas Latimer, James Campbell and George Bair, Associates. Under the Constitution of 1802, Section 1 of Article 3, it was provided that: “The judicial power of this State both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in a Supreme Court, in Courts of Common Pleas for each county, in Justices of the Peace and in such other courts as the Legislature may from time to time establish.” Section 3d of the same article provided that the Courts of Common Pleas should consist of a President and Associate Judges, * * * not more than three nor less than two Associate Judges, who, during their continuance in office, should reside in the county for which they were appointed. The terms of the Courts being established annually by the General Assembly, the Common Pleas met pursuant to an act fixing the times of holding the courts throughout the State, the county of Stark being then in the Fourth Judicial Circuit.

On the 19th of April, 1809, John Harris was appointed Clerk; William Reynolds, Jr., Deputy, and John Sloane, Recorder. As a matter of history, although not germane to the subject, it is proper to state Mr. Sloane subsequently removed to Wooster in the County of Wayne, was Colonel of a regiment in the war of 1812, and served ten years in the National House of Representatives, retiring from public life on the 4th of March, 1829, having been defeated in the election in 1828, by Gen. John Thompson, of Columbiana, which county with Stark and Wayne constituted the district. In 1826, Col. Sloane was elected for the last time, Stark County giving him the preponderating vote and a majority in the district of ninety-six votes. He was, however, elected Secretary of State by the Ohio Legislature and was United States Treasurer under the Fillmore Administration. On the 19th of December, 1809, William Reynolds, Jr., Esq., was appointed Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, and held the office until December 19, 1816, being the full period of seven years, when he received the appointment of Clerk pro tem., which he held until April 2, 1818, when he was re-appointed Clerk, and held the office until November 6, 1824, when John Myers was appointed Clerk pro tem., and held the office until the 24th of June, 1825, when he was appointed Clerk.

Mr. Harris, the first Clerk of the Court, was afterward, in 1812, elected Associate Judge. After the expiration of his official term, he studied law; was admitted to practice about the year 1819, and was prominent, as a member of the bar, for near forty years; was twice elected to the House of Representatives in the General Assembly of the State of Ohio. On retiring from the practice of the law, he removed to Omaha, Neb., where he died in October, 1863, at the age of eighty years. His remains were brought to Canton and were deposited in the beautiful cemetery west of the city. William Reynolds, Jr., Esq., his Deputy Clerk and successor, was one of the most active of the business men and pioneer settlers, and was foremost in every public enterprise; liberal and generous, he commanded and enjoyed the esteem of all who knew him; he died in 1829, at the age of forty years. By comparing dates, it will be seen that he was made Clerk of the Courts as soon as he was eligible. The President Judge, Hon. Calvin Pease, afterward Judge of the Supreme Court, came into the State about the time it was admitted into the Union, and settled in the County of Trumbull, where he continued to reside until his death, in 1841. He was an able lawyer and upright Judge, as all who knew him will bear witness. His repartee was so habitual that he could scarcely restrain it on the bench, even in pronouncing the opinion of the Supreme Court in banc, as the earlier volumes of the Ohio Reports occasionally show. The increasing population of the State and consequent increase of new counties rendered a corresponding increase of circuits and judges necessary, and in 1810 Stark County was placed in a Judicial Circuit with Belmont, Jefferson, Tuscarawas and Columbiana, and on the 17th of April, 1810, court was held by Hon. Benjamin Ruggles and the Associates. Judge Ruggles continued on the circuit until October 10, 1815, when Hon. George Tod appeared as President Judge. Meanwhile, March 7, 1812, John Harris had been elected an Associate Judge in place of Thomas Latimer, and February 24, 1814, James Clarke in place of George Bair, and in 1815, August 7, John Hoover and Samuel Coulter were Associates. While Hon. George Tod was President Judge, he held court but one year in this county and with him was associated the late Hon. William Henry as one of the Associate Judges. Judge Henry came into what is now Stark County in 1807, immediately after that portion of the county known as the "new purchase," which is that portion west of the Tuscarawas River, and is included in the Treaty of Fort Industry made in 1805, was acquired by that treaty, and assisted in the surveys of the tenth, eleventh and twelfth ranges. After his term of service as Associate Judge expired, he was elected to the House of Representatives in the State Legislature, and discharged his duty faithfully. After serving the people in that capacity, he went into business as a merchant and was successful. On retiring from business, he removed to Wooster and resided there until his death.

Judge Tod was a profound lawyer, an eminent jurist, and left a record as an upright Judge of which no superior can be found in the State. The constant changes of county lines and the formation of new judicial circuits had by this time put Stark, Columbiana, Jefferson, Harrison and Tuscarawas into a circuit, and Hon. Benjamin Tappan was elected by the Legislature President Judge, who held the place for the full term of seven years, from 1816 to 1823. On leaving the bench, he published a volume known as Tappan's Reports, which adorns the shelves of lawyers' libraries all over the State. No mere sketch of his life here could do justice to him. It will only be when the lives of Ohio's eminent and truly great men shall be written that the name of Benjamin Tappan, the jurist and statesman, will have its proper place on the historic page, nor will any history of Ohio approximate correctness without it. During the President Judgeship of Tappan, the following gentlemen were his Associates: James Clark, of Sugar Creek, and Thomas Hurford and George Stidger, of Canton, all of whom were of the pioneer settlers and of a character and class to build up and improve the new country. Judge Clark was a farmer, and the others farmers and merchants, owning some of the best and now the most valuable land in the county.

In 1823, Hon. Jeremiah H. Hallock, of Steubenville, Jefferson County, was elected President Judge and re-elected in 1830, and served the two full terms of seven years each, during which periods the following gentlemen were Associate Judges:

Hon. William Christmas, merchant, of Canton, who had studied law and been admitted to practice.

James Clark, already referred to.

John Kryder, of Plain Township.

Jacob Hostetter, of Minerva, Paris Township.

John Everhard, Massillon, Perry Township.

Harman Stidger and Eli Sowers, of Canton.

Peter Loutzenhiser, of Plain, and Jacob Miller, of Massillon, all of whom are dead save Judge Loutzenhiser, who now resides in Plain Township at his old homestead with the wife of his youth, both of whom have long since passed fourscore years, and are in the enjoyment of excellent health. Judge Hallock is remembered by the writer as a man of stern uprightness and Christian character, and as judge laid down his judicial robes as unsullied as when he first assumed them. Judge Stidger remained on the bench but a short time, when he resigned and was elected Clerk of the Court, which office he held for the constitutional term of seven years. The other gentlemen held their offices for the full term, except Judge Miller, who died in 1843, before his term of service expired; they were all of the best men in the county that could have been selected for the place, and those who survive them may point to their record with just pride.

During the seven years that succeeded Judge Hallock's term of service on the Common Pleas Bench in the Fifth Circuit—the Legislature having at the session of 1816–17 changed the number—was occupied by the late Hon. George W. Belden, with whom the writer became acquainted in the then village of Massillon in 1828, Mr. Belden being at that time a clerk in a store at that place, having left a printing office in Middlebury, Portage, now Summit County—the office of the Portage Journal, a weekly newspaper, edited by Messrs. Bowen & Mason. Mr. Bowen and Mr. Belden abandoned the “art preservative” about the same time, Mr. Bowen to study law, and commence practice at Marion, and was finally elected a Supreme Judge. Mr. Belden, after fulfilling his engagement in the store at Massillon, worked for a short time on the Ohio Repository. The writer well remembers seeing him work off the paper on a Ramage press and also at work at case in that office. He commenced the study of medicine and surgery, with Dr. Marlin Johnson, of Middlebury, and after perhaps a year's study, he abandoned that, and took up Blackstone and Chitty, finished his studies and went into partnership with Hon. John Harris already referred to. While in that partnership, he was elected Prosecuting Attorney, which office he held two terms, when he was elected President Judge, through the influence of Hon. D. A. Starkweather, then a prominent member of the Stark County bar. Judge Belden at once saw and realized the responsibility of his position. The bar of Stark County, in those days proverbial for its strength, had Harris, who was the Nestor of the brethren, having then been at the bar nearly twenty years; Hon. Hiram Griswold, now of Leavenworth, Kansas; Loomis & Lahm, Starkweather & Jarvis, E. P. Grant, Samuel Pease, and many others referred to particularly hereafter, whose names adorn the Ohio, and Ohio State Reports, in addition to whom were lawyers from the neighboring circuits; from Wooster, Hon. Edward Avery and Levi Cox, and many more whose names have passed from memory. In Columbiana, the late Judge C. D. Coffin, whose recent death at Cincinnati calls up memories of the early days of the bench and bar in the circuit, Brewer, Mason, W. D. Ewing and Russell. At Steubenville, the Brothers Collier, Wright, Goodenow and Tappan; at Cadiz, Harrison County, a bar at the head of which was the honored Chauncy Dewey, and W. B. Beebe; at Carrollton, which became a county seat in 1832, Johnson, better known in Ohio now as Bill Johnson, since Judge of the Superior Court of Hamilton County; John Pearce, since President Judge, and one of the most accomplished gentlemen and scholarly lawyers in the circuit, and Stanton, afterward the great war Secretary, who, although a resident of Steubenville, seldom failed to be at Carrollton at court, while New Philadelphia, in Tuscarawas County, seemed to be a focal point at which the lawyers from the entire circuit, and also from the counties of Holmes, Coshoc-ton and Muskingum, gathered, at the Common Pleas and Supreme Courts.

At the head of the Tuscarawas County bar was Joseph C. Hance, Esq., where he yet remains, honored and respected, the senior member of the bar in that county. With that array of talent and legal learning before him, ready to take exceptions to his rulings, did the youthful Judge enter upon his seven years of official duty. So youthful was his appearance that his official title seemed misapplied. He, however, served the full term, and at the close of which, the bar of the circuit felt that he had discharged his duty faithfully. He was succeeded by Hon. John Pearce, of Carrollton, who took his seat as President Judge of the Fifth Judicial Circuit in Stark County, April 15, 1844, and held the position until 1851; was then re-elected and held until 1852, when the Judges elected under the present constitution of Ohio took their seats and the judicial system of Ohio underwent an entire change. Instead of a Common Pleas Court with four Judges, one learned in the law and three country gentlemen, the Common Pleas was reduced to one Judge, who must be learned in the law, and instead of the Supreme Court meeting annually in each county, two out of the four judges composing the court, the Constitution provides for a District Court, that must be composed of three Judges of the Common Pleas of the judicial district, and one Supreme Judge, any three of whom shall form a quorum, for the transaction of any business within the jurisdiction of the court.

During the terms of service by Judge Pearce from 1844 to January, 1852, Daniel Raffensperger was Clerk and Hon. Messrs. John W. Greenwood, James S. Kelley, Samuel Schrantz, James Hazlitt, David Welker and Thomas Blackburn, the last of whom with Hon. Peter Loutzenhiser, already noticed, are all of the Associate Judges who remain in Stark County, as landmarks of the old Constitution of Ohio, and of the judicial system organized under its wise provisions.

At the first election for Judges under the new Constitution, adopted in 1851, Judge Belden was almost unanimously elected Common Pleas Judge of the first subdivision of the Ninth Judicial District, composed of the counties of Stark, Columbiana and Carroll; he held the office about two-thirds of the term of five years, when he resigned and Hon. John Clarke, of New Lisbon, was appointed by Gov. Medill to fill the vacancy until the time for an election should arrive. On his resignation, Judge Belden returned to the bar and immediately went into a lucrative practice, in which he continued until his death in 1869. As a lawyer, including all that is understood by the term, Judge Belden had few equals and certainly no superior in this section of Ohio, and at his death left many warm friends who will ever cherish his name and memory.

At the expiration of Judge Clarke's term of service, which was at the election following his appointment, to fill the vacancy, Hon. Lyman W. Potter, of New Lisbon, was nominated and elected for the full term. He held the office until some time in the year 1858, when he resigned and Hon. Jacob A. Ambler, of Salem, Columbiana County, was appointed and held until the next annual election, when he was elected for the unexpired term of Judge Potter, and in October, 1861, was elected for a full term of five years, when he was succeeded by Hon. Joseph Frease, of Canton, who served two full terms, when he was succeeded by Hon. Seraphim Meyer, who is now closing his first term. Since the adoption of the present constitution of the State, the judicial force in several of the districts has been increased by special acts of the Legislature. The first subdivision of the Ninth District was authorized by special enactment to elect a Judge, and Hon. John W. Church, since deceased, was elected, and before his term of service expired the act was repealed. An increase of business in later years rendered it again necessary for an increase of Judges for the district, and the Legislature re-enacted the former law, and Hon. Peter A. Laubie, of Salem, was elected and is now serving his second term of five years, he having the counties of Columbiana and Carroll, and Judge Meyer the county of Stark. Stark County may be said to have been favored in her Judges. Since the people have been authorized to elect, the wisdom of the provision in the constitution of 1851, allowing them to do so, has been fully justified by the selection of worthy men to fill all the judicial positions in the county. The wisdom of the measure was very much doubted, but with rare exceptions the result has been favorable, and few if any would be found to go back to the old mode of electing Judges, which was by the Legislature on joint ballot of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The Associate Judges to whom reference has been made could come together as a "Called Court," and attend all probate and testamentary business, appointing executors, administrators and guardians, and in that respect facilitated business which otherwise would have had to remain for the stated terms of the Court. Up to about 1845, the Supreme Court on the circuit had exclusive jurisdiction in divorce, when by act of the General Assembly the power to divorce was given to the Common Pleas. The Legislature also used to exercise the right to annul the marriage contract until Judge Read in a most able opinion in the Supreme Court in banc took the power away from that body. These matters, having had the attention of the bench and bar of the State, are deemed worthy of a brief consideration here.

As already noticed, the first Court of Common Pleas was held on the 18th of April, 1809. The first case on the docket was that of James Pearce and others, plaintiffs, against Isaac Van Meter, defendant. The action was debt, $42; damages, $40. The law's delay was as apparent then as in later days, as judgment was not rendered until the April term, in 1810, when the plaintiffs recovered against the defendant a judgment on default for $42 debt and $24.72 damages, and $9.77½ costs, $6 of which was a docket for the plaintiffs' attorney. At the close of the entry on the appearance docket are the words, "and defendant in mercy," then follows: "Ca. sa. issued to August, 1810." In those days there was imprisonment for debt in Ohio, and whether the ca. sa.—capias ad satisfaciendum—was ever returned with the body of the defendant, the record does not show. Potter, supposed to be Horace Potter, of Columbiana, attorney for plaintiffs, and Obadiah Jennings, of Jefferson County, for the defendant. The first term of the Court lasted just long enough to transact the following: "At a Court of Common Pleas, begun and held for the County of Stark," after reciting the time and place, "Ordered, that John Harris be appointed Clerk pro tempore to this Court until a permanent Clerk be appointed. Ordered, that Sampson S. King be appointed Prosecuting Attorney until a permanent appointment be made.

"James Leeper vs. Hamilton J. Hamilton. Bill in Chancery. This day came the plaintiff by his attorney, and the Court, on hearing the petition read, Ordered, that the pendency of this petition be published in the Western Herald, printed in Steubenville, and that a subpoena issue directed to John Cox of Brooke County, Virginia, returnable at the next term, to be by him served on the defendant. Ordered, that the Court do now adjourn sine die.

"CALVIN PEASE, President."

The next term of the Court was held on the 15th day of August, 1809, by Judge Pease, President, and Judges Latimer and Bair. At this term a grand jury, and the first in Stark County, was impaneled and William Nailor appointed foreman, "and the jury having received the requisite documents retired to their room." A "traverse" jury that had been summoned appeared, but, there being no business for them, they were discharged. Several journal entries were made occupying the time of the Court one day, including the labors of the Grand Jury, who "came into court and made no presentments." They returned an indictment in the case of the State of Ohio against George Stidger, indorsed "Not a True Bill."

The following entry of a part of the proceedings of that term is deemed worthy a place in this history:

vs.
GEORGE THOMPSON. } In Debt.

This day came the plaintiff by his attorney and thereupon came John Shorb, who acknowledged himself special bail in this case in the sum of $256, to be levied of his goods and chattels, lands and tenements, conditioned that the said George Thompson shall be and appear before the court at their December term next, and that if judgment be entered against him he will pay the debt and cost or render his body in execution.

The names of Jennings, Tappan, King, Mason, Edgington, Wright—Hon. J. C., afterward Supreme Judge—and Reddick, are the names of practicing lawyers who appear of record on the first appearance docket of Stark County Common Pleas, and which contains all the appearances entered from the organization of the court to January 21, 1812. The journal of the court furnishes the names of many distinguished lawyers residing in neighboring counties, but the names of Roswell M. Mason and Sampson S. King are all who appear as those of resident lawyers until after 1815.

The old Supreme Court of Ohio, who shall write its history and do it justice? In preparing historical sketches of a single county, the history of the old Supreme Court from its organization would be out of place. So far as its labors in separate counties have become a part of the history of each county, a brief mention may be made.

On the adoption of the constitution of 1802, the Supreme Court of Ohio consisted of three Judges, the Legislature having the power to increase the number to four, two of whom were required to hold court in every county, once in each year, the court was required by law to divide the State into two districts, the eastern and western, and the Judges were assigned by agreement among themselves to the districts, which arrangement continued for many years and until the Judges made other arrangements relieving each other, the court being constantly in session in some portion of the State, until the organization of the Supreme Court in banc, which was held at Columbus, by all the Judges. The twenty volumes of the Ohio Reports are the result of the faithful labors of that body as a court in banc and which have made Ohio the "Land of the Law." The Judges were elected for seven years, and from 1802 to 1851, almost a half century, the Supreme Court of Ohio not only commanded the respect of the bar of the State for the uniformity of its decisions, but of the neighboring States and the highest judicial tribunal in the land, the Supreme Court of the United States. Over the expiring embers of the old Supreme Court of Ohio, in the year 1851, under the provisions of the new constitution, the present Supreme Court came into existence, and, while inadequate in point of numbers to meet the needs and demands of the State, —has vindicated its industry in thirty-five well filled volumes of Ohio State Reports. Of the old Supreme Court but three of the Judges yet remain; the honored names of Collett, McLean, Sherman, Pease, Burnett, Hitchcock, Wright, Lane, Grimke, Birchard, Reed, Wood, Spalding, Caldwell and Ranney, the last three of whom are the surviving members, will, with the names of those which may have been here overlooked, always grace the history of the Supreme Court of Ohio, and their memories ever be kindly cherished by the bar of the State. Most of the Judges above named have held court in this county and are well remembered by the older members of the bar who yet remain after forty years' practice. Among the early members of the bar, in addition to those already named, is Luther Blodgett, who went to Lawrence Co., Ohio, where he continued to reside and practice until his death.

In 1816, in what was then a celebrated case, that of Moses Gleason against Nathaniel Skinner, an action to recover damages for uttering and publishing certain malicious, false and slanderous words of and concerning the plaintiff, was the first appearance of James W. Lathrop. He was associated with Mr., afterward, Judge Hallock, for the plaintiff; for the defendant, Wright and Goodenow. In this case the late Gen. Samuel Stokely, also of counsel for the defendant, made his maiden speech, having just been admitted to practice. The slanderous words were, "Moses Gleason is a thief, he stole my hay on the wild meadows." In those days the wild meadows in the northeastern part of Perry Township were resorted to for hay. They were Government lands, and people, especially "new comers" who had not been able to clear up their own land and raise food for their cattle in winter, relied on them. Mr. Skinner had cut and cocked up several tons of hay, some of which was taken, and he charged Gleason with the larceny. From the well known ability of the counsel employed, the case must have been most ably tried. In the list of witnesses appear the names of Thomas A. Drayton, Aaron Chapman, Nathaniel Ray, Edward Nelson, Matthew Macy, Alexander Johnson, and many others whose names appear also among the pioneer settlers of Perry and Jackson Townships.

From 1816 to 1829, the bar of Stark County did not increase rapidly in numbers. As nearly as can be ascertained, John Harris, Loomis & Metcalf, James W. Lathrop, Almon Sortwell, who died in 1840, David A. Starkweather, Sanders Van Rensselaer and Hiram Griswold composed the number, all of whom, except Mr. Griswold, have passed away. Messrs. Loomis & Metcalf graduated together from the same college, the Union College, of Schenectady, New York; selected law as a profession, were admitted to practice at the same time, formed a partnership, and came to Canton, where they practiced as partners for many years, when Metcalf moved to Pittsburgh, and Loomis to New Lisbon, the partnership still continuing, the Ohio branch being under the control of Mr. Loomis, and the Pittsburgh branch managed by Mr. Metcalf. Mr. Loomis continued to practice in Stark County for many years, and when the late Gen. Samuel Lahm came to the county, he at once formed a partnership with Mr. Loomis, which lasted for several years, and until Mr. Loomis joined his life-long friend and partner in Pittsburgh. The firm of Loomis & Metcalf continued until dissolved by the death of Mr. Metcalf. Mr. Loomis continued in practice at Pittsburgh for many years, and finally removed to Cleveland, where he died a few years since. He was a man of rare ability and learning, and commanded the respect of the bench and bar in all the courts in which he practiced, including the Supreme Court of the United States. During his residence at New Lisbon, he was elected to Congress to fill an unexpired term, and after that election steadily refused all political preferment. Mr. Van Rensselaer was of the family of that name in the State of New York, a gentleman of fine attainments, but did not remain in the practice after 1829. Mr. Lathrop, whose name appears more prominently in the sketches of the State system of Common Schools, was prominent as a lawyer until January, 1828, when, as will be remembered, he died at Columbus, during his term of service as Representative in the State Legislature.

In the year 1829, Hon. Hiram Griswold, above referred to, was admitted to practice at Bucyrus, in Crawford County, after the proper course of study with the late Hon. Van R. Humphrey, of Hudson, then in Portage County, now in Summit. On coming to Canton, Mr. Griswold at once took a prominent place at the bar, and largely enjoyed the confidence of the people of the county, from whom, had he remained in the county, he could have had any political preferment from the county or Congressional District. About the year 1852, he removed to Cleveland, where he was at once elected to the State Senate, but not feeling satisfied with his prospects there, removed, after a few years, to Leavenworth. During his residence in this county, he was Reporter for the Supreme Court of Ohio six years, and came within one or two votes of being elected United States Senator, at the time of the late Senator Wade's first election to that body. During his long and active practice, he has always ably sustained himself.

About the time Mr. Griswold settled in Canton, Luther L. Foote, Esq., a young lawyer and scholarly gentleman, came to the then little village of Massillon, the ground plat of which, but three years before, was covered with the leafy honors of the forest, and opened an office. He was a graduate of Yale. He, however, did not, nor could succeed as a lawyer, and left to seek "fresh fields and pastures new" in the Sunny South, since which time it is not known that he has been heard of by anybody in this county. In 1831, Gen. Dwight Jarvis, who had, in 1822, finished his professional studies at Canton, and located in Athens, Athens County, Ohio, returned to Canton, and formed a partnership with Mr. Starkweather which firm almost immediately took the lead in the business of the county. Mr. Jarvis was one of the most careful managers of the details of the business of a law office that has ever been in the county, while Mr. Starkweather, fond of his ease and a fox-hunt, would have Mr. Jarvis prepare the cases, and he, Mr. S., would try them. This firm lasted eleven years, until the spring of 1842, when the late Hon. Alexander Bierce became a member of the partnership, its style being Starkweather, Jarvis & Bierce. Mr. Bierce had been in practice in Massillon near three years, when he was tendered an equal partnership in the old established firm, and continued a member until 1848, when the senior partners withdrew from practice, and a partnership was formed by Mr. Bierce and Hon. Anson Pease, of Massillon, which continued twenty-four years, when it was dissolved by the death of Mr. Bierce, of whom it may be well said, "he was a lawyer." Few men who practiced in the courts of Ohio ever commanded more attention than did Alexander Bierce. He was a man of fine analytical mind, unyielding integrity, and a thorough knowledge of the law applicable to his cases, he was rarely overruled in the Supreme Court, as the reported cases in which he was of counsel fully show. The respect entertained for him by his brethren of the bar was exhibited by one of the largest bar meetings ever held in the court house, at the time of his death, at which resolutions of a most complimentary character were passed, and spread in the journal of the court.

Among the members of the Stark County bar who have gone hence, none are remembered in more kindness than Hon. David A. Starkweather. From the year 1827 to the last day of his residence in Stark County, near forty years, it can safely be said of him he never had an enemy. Always a Democrat of the straightest sect, the bitterness of parties in the heated canvass of 1828 and 1832, did not disturb his private friendships. On the occasion of his death, one of the city papers at Cleveland contained the following notice. As it was written by a gentleman always politically opposed to him, its magnanimity is but the more apparent, and the more appreciated by his surviving friends :

The Hon. David A. Starkweather, father-in-law of the Hon. A. T. Brinsmade, died at the latter's residence, No. 768 Custead Avenue, yesterday morning after having been entirely helpless for a year past from a paralytic stroke.

Mr. Starkweather formerly lived in Stark County, and was a gentleman long and well known throughout the State, having been quite prominent in the profession of the law and in politics. For three successive terms he was a member of the State Legislature and also spent two terms in the State Senate, with honor to himself and to the satisfaction of his constituents. He also represented the Stark County District in Congress for two terms, and while there greatly distinguished himself. One of the most notable of his services while there was his speech upon the Oregon Question, which brought out the warmest personal commendations from John Quincy Adams. He was selected by President Pierce in 1854, as Minister Plenipotentiary to Chili, and served there with the same distinguished honor noticed in other positions. He retired from the practice of the law some time since and has of late been residing with his daughter. The only children left by the deceased are Mrs. Brinsmade and Hamilton Starkweather, of Oregon. He leaves one brother in New York, and the late Judge Starkweather was a cousin.

In politics, the deceased was a Democrat, having been President of two State Democratic Conventions, and in 1852, acting as President of the National Convention of the party.

Mr. Starkweather must have been admitted to the bar as early as 1825, when he opened an office in Mansfield, and practiced there with marked success, until he came to this county, which was his final residence, except the period of his illness at Cleveland. When the firm of Starkweather, Jarvis & Bierce was dissolved, Mr. Jarvis, who during his residence at Canton, had married Miss Frances Upham, of Claremont, N. H., removed to Massillon where he died February 14, 1863, aged sixty-six. During his residence at Massillon, he was elected Major General of the Sixth Division of Ohio Militia, having been Brigade Inspector with the rank of Major during the early days of Gen. John Augustine. He was a gentleman of decided military taste, in politics a Federalist and ardent admirer of Jay, Hamilton, and the Federal leaders of Revolutionary times, and as earnest in his dislike of Jefferson and the Republican leaders, as they were called. As a lawyer he maintained a good reputation always, until age compelled him to seek that "Blest retirement, friend of life's decline," which with numerous friends he enjoyed, always dispensing a generous hospitality at his elegant residence in the city.

Among other members of the bar of Stark County, whose names adorn her dockets and briefs through a period of nearly thirty years, and which will be found in the files as frequently as that of almost any one from 1835 to 1855, is that of the late Hon. Samuel Pease, who came to Massillon in November, 1831, opened an office and succeeded, as a lawyer, a juris consult and pleader. As an advocate to a jury he never sought celebrity. In the social circle he had few equals and was fond of personal comfort. He died in 1867, at the age of 65, surviving his wife but a few years.

There was also among the old members of the bar, who took his place in the profession long prior to 1840, the late Hon. James D. Brown, and also Gen. Samuel Lahm. Mr. Brown was from the State of New York, and Gen. Lahm from the State of Maryland. They were prominent in the profession, Mr. Brown having been frequently elected Prosecuting Attorney, as was Gen. Lahm, who also represented this district in Congress, and the Senatorial District in the Ohio Senate, and the county in the House of Representatives. He was a man of untiring energy in everything he undertook. He left the bar and went to farming, owning many hundred broad acres between Canton and Massillon, which he cultivated successfully. He died in May, 1876, at his residence in Canton.

Mr. Brown was an industrious, earnest laborer at the bar, and continued until just before or during the war of the rebellion, when he removed to Omaha, Nebraska, where he died on the 1st day of July, 1880, aged seventy years. He was a son-in-law of Hon. John Harris. The remains of both repose in Canton Cemetery. Harris & Brown had been a law firm in Canton for many years, and in active practice, and in the fitness of things their final resting place is near the scene of their struggles and successes.

Of those who practiced in the courts of Stark county prior to 1840, but one remains, either at the bar or on the bench. On looking around the bar at a term of court, none of the old familiar faces are to be seen. Not one!

"They are no longer here ; they are all gone
 Into the land of shadows—all save one.
 Honor and reverence and the good repute
 That follows faithful service as its fruit
 Be unto him, whom living we salute."

The reader of these sketches, acquainted with Hon. Seraphim Meyer, Judge of the Common Pleas Court of Stark County, and ex officio Judge of the District Court of Ohio, need not be told that it is he to whom reference is made. In 1828, a few weeks after navigation was opened on the Ohio canal to Massillon, a family of immigrants from the Department of Upper Alsace, in the then Kingdom of France, arrived at the little village which was the southern terminus of internal navigation of the State ; of that family Judge Meyer was a son. The family remained at Massillon, or rather at Kendall, for the two hamlets were not then, as now, one and indivisible, about twelve days, when they removed to Canton, where they have remained.

In 1838, Mr. Meyer was admitted to practice by the Supreme Court on the circuit at Springfield, in the county of Clark, and at once opened an office in Canton. Being master of the German and French languages, as well as a fine belles lettres scholar, and an intensely close student, he has attained a standing at the bar as a lawyer and on the bench as a judge that commands the respect of the district embracing the counties of Stark, Carroll and Columbiana, Portage, Trumbull and Mahoning, and Lake, Geauga and Ashtabula, to all of which counties, as a District Judge, his official duties call him. During his practice at the bar, he was a member of the firms of Dunbar & Meyer, Brown & Meyer, and Meyer & Manderson. On the breaking-out of the war of the rebellion, Judge Meyer's two sons did not wait to be called on for the military service of the country ; they volunteered immediately, and remained in the service until the close of the war, when they returned, bearing upon their persons evidence of their courage in the shape of honorable scars, the result of wounds received in many well-fought battles. One son, Gen. E. S. Meyer, has been remembered by President Garfield, in the appointment of Attorney for the Northern District of Ohio, and the other is the senior partner in the well-known law firm of Meyer & Piero, at Canton. For their distinguished services to the country, they will ever be gratefully remembered. When the One Hundred and Seventh Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry was raised, Judge Meyer, then Prosecuting Attorney of Stark County, resigned, and accepted the command of the regiment, and its history from the day it marched from Camp Cleveland to the day it was mustered out of the service, July 10, 1865, attests its bravery and its service to the country, especially at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. He who would learn its history, almost written in the blood of the gallant men of whom it was composed, should read "Ohio in the War." No Ohio regiment furnishes a more terrible record of its slaughter, or one of more distinguished gallantry. Col. Meyer, after severe sickness and suffering, was compelled to resign on the 8th of February, 1864, and returned to his home in Canton, and was for a long time unfit even for the lightest labors in his profession. On regaining sufficient health and strength, he resumed practice, formed a partnership with Gen. C. F. Manderson, and at the dissolution of which, engaged with his son, C. T. Meyer, Esq., which continued until he assumed the duties of the judgeship, in January, 1877.

In 1839, Hon. H. B. Hurlbut, then a young gentleman just entered the profession, came to Massillon from Cleveland, and opened an office. Active and energetic, he soon acquired a paying business, and "gathered gear." After Judge Underhill came to the bar, Messrs. Hurlbut & Underhill formed a partnership. After the dissolution of which, about the year 1845, Hon. D. K. Cartter removed to Massillon from Akron, and there was a partnership formed immediately between him and Mr. Hurlbut, by the style of Cartter & Hurlbut, which lasted until Mr. Cartter was elected to Congress, this district being then composed of Stark and Wayne Counties, and that partnership was dissolved. Meanwhile, Hon. Arvine C. Wales, "a native of Stark County, and to the manner born," was admitted to practice with the most flattering prospects, and a partnership was formed by the style of Hurlbut & Wales. Mr. Hurlbut, who had continued to "gather gear," had gone into banking largely with the late Dr. Isaac Steese, Joseph J. Brooks and Sebastian Brainerd, Esqs., of Massillon, all of whom have passed "into the land of shadows," and he withdrew from practice and removed to Cleveland, where he has since been engaged in banking and railroad enterprises with the habitual success that has always attended his efforts. Judge Cartter is Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, being appointed thereto by President Lincoln twenty years since.

Judge Cartter came to Stark County a Democrat; as such was elected and re-elected to Congress; when his Congressional terms expired, he returned to his constituency without any political affiliations that placed him in unity with either Whigs or Democrats. On the formation of the Republican party, he became an active member. Having, meanwhile, removed to Cleveland, he was appointed a delegate to the Chicago Convention, and claims the honor of President Lincoln's nomination by that body. Mr. Wales resides at his Spring Hill farm, just outside of the city limits of Massillon, a scientific and practical farmer; is President of the Stark County Agricultural Society, and an active member of the State Board of Agriculture. He always has a generous welcome for all who call on him. In public life, he has served the people of this Senatorial district—the Twenty-first, composed of Stark and Carroll Counties—for the unexpired term of Gen. B. F. Potts, appointed Governor of Montana Territory, and the full succeeding term.

Among the lawyers of Stark County, of fifty years since, was William Bryce, Esq. In 1826, he was a stone-cutter, and cut much of the stone work of the "Fulton Lock," on the Ohio Canal. He concluded, on finishing his job, that he could do better as a special pleader than in cutting stone on the public works, and entered an office in Canton as a student. He put in many years of close study, but finally succeeded in reaching the goal of his ambition, which was his admission to the courts of Ohio as an attorney and counselor at law and solicitor in chancery. His briefs were "few and far between." He tried politics and was elected Recorder of the County for one term, which ended his official labors. His last appearance in court was as plaintiff to secure compensation or commissions for having been employed to sell patent steam gauges. He has been dead many years.

Among the members of the bar forty-five years ago, should be mentioned Elijah P. Grant, a most accomplished lawyer and scholar, a profound thinker and believer in a re-organization of society, by which great and lasting benefits should accrue to mankind. In the pursuit of his theory, based upon the doctrines of Fourier and other socialists, he expended a fortune and many years of valuable time, and died in the city of Canton a few years since. He was a gentleman of many genial qualities, and will always be kindly remembered. Among the lawyers of the Stark County bar, prior to 1846, was Benjamin F. Leiter. During his practice, he was of the firms of Belden & Leiter, Leiter & Pool and Leiter & Treat, and at one time with Edward L. Carney, Esq.; was editor of the Stark County Democrat. Mr. Leiter came to Canton from the State of Maryland, before the organization of union schools, and taught school in the winter; worked as a common laborer in the summer; was elected a Justice of the Peace; got some ideas of law, and studied with Gen. Samuel Lahm; was elected to the Senate and House of Representatives of Ohio, and was Speaker of both branches. In 1854 and 1856, he was elected to Congress, as a member of the American party or K. N.'s. On the breaking-out of the war, he entered into the Union cause with energy; had two sons in the army, one of whom was killed in battle, the other making an honorable record. Mr. Leiter died a few years ago at his residence in Canton. On the breaking-out of the war, Mr. Treat at once went into the service, since which he has not returned to Canton, nor is it known what became of him. Mr. Pool removed to Cleveland, and went into the army, and now resides in New York City, and is engaged in banking.

Of the older members of the bar who commenced their professional life in this county next to Judge Meyer, are Hon. Louis Schaefer, of Canton, and Robert H. Folger, of Massillon. They were examined and admitted together on the 1st day of March, 1842, at New Lisbon, by the Supreme Court, then on the circuit, Lane and Wood, J. J., holding the term. Mr. Schaefer was born on the 25th of December, 1815, in Arrondissement of Sarreguémine, Department de la Moselle, now the Republic of France, arrived in the city of Philadelphia June 7, 1830, in Stark County September following; has lived in Canton since 1831. Commenced the study of the law with Griswold & Grant, March, 1840, the two years of study required by law having expired on the day he was admitted. Mr. Folger was born in Chester Co., Penn., on the 11th of January, 1812, and came to Kendal, now the Fourth

Ward of the city of Massillon, with his parents in 1813, and lived there until February 4, 1828, when the family removed to Massillon where he has resided ever since, and should he and Mr. Schaefer be favored to keep within "this mortal coil" until March 1, 1882, they will have been at the bar of Stark County and in practice forty years. Mr. Folger commenced his professional studies in the office of Samuel Pease, where he remained until November, 1841, when he went into the office of Gen. Dwight Jarvis, and completed his studies. Next in the order of time is Hon. James W. Underhill, admitted near the close of the year 1842, and went into practice at Massillon where he remained until elected Probate Judge, which he held by re-election four terms, having first served one term in the House of Representatives of the State Legislature. He was a member of several partnerships in addition to the firm of Hurlbut & Underhill; during his residence in Massillon he was of the firm of Folger & Underhill, and Keith & Underhill, and since his retirement from the Probate Judgeship, has been in partnership with John Lahm, Esq. Being much engaged in railroad building, he is devoting little time to the law. Among the young men who came to the bar in the early forties and opened offices in Massillon, were F. M. Keith, from Lorain County, who came in 1840 and formed a partnership with Hon. S. Pease, and the firm, while it lasted, enjoyed a successful practice; George Miller, a son of Hon. Jacob Miller, Associate Judge; Leavitt L. Bowen and David M. Bradshaw. On the dissolution of the firm of Pease & Keith, Keith and Miller at once formed a partnership and remained together until the death of Judge Miller compelled a dissolution to enable Mr. Miller to look after the estate. Mr. Miller was a young gentleman of education, a graduate of Jefferson College Penn., and excellent native ability, and could he have lived and devoted his time to the law, would have taken a high rank in the profession; he served one term in the Legislature and died, suddenly, in 1850, at the age of thirty-five. On the dissolution of the firm of Keith & Miller, a partnership was formed by Messrs. Keith & Bowen, but the changes were so rapid that it is not certain how long this firm lasted. When Mr. Bradshaw came to Massillon, he and Bowen formed a partnership by the style of Bradshaw & Bowen. On the dissolution of which Messrs.

Bradshaw and Wales formed a partnership which was dissolved by the death of Mr. Bradshaw in 1852. Mr. Keith removed to White Cloud, Kan., before the war and on the breaking-out of hostilities, entered the service and rose to the rank of Colonel; at the close of the war he returned to his practice in Doniphan Co., Kan.

Among the gentlemen of the bar in Stark County, against whose names the "fatal asterisk of death is set," is that of Hon. William K. Upham. Mr. Upham was a native of Vermont, a son of Senator Upham, and came to New Lisbon about the year 1843, and after practicing law there several years, removed to Canton; he was a distinguished lawyer, distinguished in all that is included in the term. As is now recollected, he died in 1867, while attending court in Mahoning County. Out of respect for his memory, the bar of Stark County erected a beautiful marble monument over his remains in Canton Cemetery.

Mr. Bowen, on his dissolving with Mr. Bradshaw, went first to Omaha, Neb., and after a few years' residence there went to Denver, Colo., in its early days, where, with him, "life's fitful fever" ended.

Another lawyer who, in a comparatively early day, was a member of the Stark County bar, was Col. Lyman Humphrey, a resident first of Deerfield, whence he removed to Marlborough, studied with Hon. H. Griswold, and had he commenced early in life, would have succeeded in the profession as he was above what is termed the average man, intellectually, and by education. His son, Hon. Lyman U. Humphrey, on the 1st of January, 1881, closed his second term as Lieutenant Governor of Kansas, and is now engaged in a successful law practice in that State. After the war, in which he bore a conspicuous and honorable part, he went West; the respect entertained for him by the citizens of his native county is kindly and affectionately reciprocated. A later addition to the death roll of Stark County lawyers is found in the names of Horace P. Dunbar, Esq., of Canton, and James Harsh, Esq., of Massillon. Mr. Dunbar studied and was admitted at Canton, where he opened an office, and continued in practice until 1861, when he surrendered to the "King of Terrors." Mr. Dunbar was one of the most agreeable gentlemen at the bar, of a high sense of honor in practice; he will, for his urbanity and agreeable, social intercourse, be remembered as a gentleman with whom it was pleasant to be associated. Mr. Harsh was a native of Massillon, studied his profession in Findlay, Hancock Co., where he married Miss O'Neill and became a member of the firm of O'Neill, Blackford & Harsh. After remaining at Findlay a few years after admission to the bar, he came to his old home to engage in practice. He had been subject to hemorrhage of the lungs which was increased while in the army, where he served as Captain, and death followed a sudden attack in 1870. He was about forty years of age at his death, and gave promise of great usefulness as a lawyer. He was an only son of Hon. George Harsh, of Massillon.

In 1844, Hon. Anson Pease, who had studied with R. H. Folger most of the time required by law, received his certificate of admission to the bar and at once opened an office at Massillon, where he has remained in active practice. For twenty-four out of the thirty-seven years that have elapsed since he commenced as an attorney and counselor at law, he was a partner of the firm of Bierce & Pease, then of Pease & Ricks, and now Pease & Baldwin. Mr. Pease was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1874, serving on important committees in that body, and commanding the respect of the members. In 1847, John Lahm, Esq., now a resident of Canton, took his place among the lawyers of the county, and has faithfully kept it through the third of a century that has since elapsed, commanding the respect of the court and his brethren as well as the confidence of his clients. Three years of the time since Mr. Lahm came to the bar, he served as Clerk of the courts, to the entire acceptance of the bench and bar, all of whom entertain most pleasant recollections, not only of his urbane and gentlemanly deportment, but of the skill and ability with which he discharged the duties of the office.

In 1851, Hon. Joseph Frease, who had lived in the county from boyhood, came from Sugar Creek Township, to the bar, having studied, as is now remembered, with Hon. Hiram Griswold. In a few years he was elected Prosecuting Attorney. After serving one term in that position, he was elected and re-elected Common Pleas Judge, and was succeeded at the annual election in 1876, by Hon. S. Meyer, the present incumbent. Excepting the time Judge Frease was on the bench, he has enjoyed an active practice and in his official, professional and personal relations, has always commanded the esteem and confidence of the community. As a Judge, he was ever courteous and conservative, and the records of the superior judicial tribunals of Ohio, will show as few reversals of his decisions as of any judge who has filled that position. He is now in active practice, the senior member of the firm of Frease & Case. Another prominent member of the bar during his residence in this county, was Hon. William Dunbar, who practiced successfully in the courts of the State. A portion of the time during his residence in this county, he was senior member of the firm of Dunbar & Meyer, after the dissolution of which firm he removed to Mount Vernon, Knox Co., Ohio. He came to the bar about 1843.

About the same time Hon. Thomas Goodman, now a respected citizen of Chicago, was admitted to practice but paid little attention to the law. Fire Insurance being a subject to which he had devoted much careful study, he sought a wider field in which to labor and has met with success. Among the Judges of the Ninth Judicial District who have honored Stark County Common Pleas and District Courts by their presence, the names of Hon. Messrs. Day, Hitchcock, Belden, Conant, Hoffman, Tuttle, Taylor, the two brothers, Horace and Eli T. Wilder, Potter, Chaffee, Church, Woodbury, Canfield, Ambler, Clark, Laubie, Lee, Frease, Meyer, Arren, Sherman, Spear, will ever be held in kind remembrance by the brethren of the bar of Stark County, who in triumph or defeat have appeared before them. Among the early transcripts from Justices' dockets on file in the Court of Common Pleas, is one of which the following is an extract. "This day came the said parties, and the defendant being unruly and noisy, was by the court ordered into silence, when he replied, profanely taking the name of God in vain, whereupon he was by the court ordered into the custody of the Constable, and becoming more noisy and profane, he was fined 25 cents, and on his swearing by the second person in the Trinity, was by the court fined 50 cents, whereupon he God damd all the Constables in the township of Sugar Creek, and was by the court fined 75 cents, when he became so disorderly as to God dam all the Justices of the Peace in the township, and this court in particular, for which he was fined $1, making a total sum of $2.25, and on refusing to pay the same, execution was issued therefor which was delivered to the Constable, who returned the same in due time unsatisfied, for want of goods and chattels whereon to levy. It is 'surmised,' however, that the defendant has lands and tenements subject to levy and sale on execution." In those days and under an entry stating that it was suggested that the defendant had lands and tenements subject to levy and sale on execution, the Common Pleas was authorized to issue a Scire Facias, and bring the defendant into court, and if he was not found on the issuing of the first, a second one was issued, and if returned "nihil" the plaintiff was entitled to an execution for the Justices judgment and costs.

On another occasion, the writer, in the course of his practice, had occasion to meet Mr. James B. Craig, then a young gentleman, just admitted, before the same justice, and when it was common to classify actions under the nomenclature of the English Common Law, such as assumpsit, debt and covenant. This was known as an indebitatus assumpsit, for goods sold and delivered. The plaintiff made out his case and rested, when Mr. Craig, now Gen. Craig, of Missouri, on the part of the defendant, moved for a nonsuit, and argued his motion at length; the plaintiff's counsel followed, and Mr. Craig closed the argument, whereupon the Justice decided the motion "thusly:" "Well, gentlemen, you have argued this motion with tact, wit, ingenuity and pathos, but the motion is overruled. If the defendant has any proof, let's have it." On Mr. Craig saying he had no proof to offer, the Justice at once rendered judgment for the plaintiff, saying he thought there had been a d—d sight of fooling over it, and that it was about time to stop it. The case was tried in Tuscarawas County, to which the Justice had removed. Mr. Craig shortly afterward removed to Missouri, has been a member of Congress, and during the war rose to the rank of Brigadier General; he was a man of more than ordinary force of character.

The township of Sugar Creek is entitled to honorable mention for having furnished a member of the Stark County bar, who, although he seldom appeared in the higher courts, was nevertheless a gentleman of much force of character, and commanded respect. Reference is had to Henry W. Stambaugh, Esq., who, after serving many years as a Justice of the Peace, was admitted to practice by the old Supreme Court on the Circuit of Canton. He was a brother of the late Hon. David W. Stambaugh, a prominent member of the Ohio bar in Tuscarawas County, and Senator from the Third District at the time of his death, a few years since.

Among the young gentlemen who have come to the bar, and passed away under the dispensation of the war of the rebellion, no one deserves more honorable mention than Frank Spalter, who, in September, 1858, entered the office of Hon. Louis Schaefer, in Canton, as a student, of whom Mr. Schaefer says, "he was a man of superior intellect and acquirements, having a finished French, German and English education." He had been book-keeper for the well-known house of Sharpless & Sons, Philadelphia. He remained in Mr. Schaefer's office two years, and was admitted to practice at Carrollton, the late Hon. William K. Upham being of the examining committee, and who remarked, after the examination, "That boy knows more about the elementary books than does the whole committee."

After his admission, Mr. Spalter opened an office in Canton, and continued until 1861, when he was one of the first to enlist, and was killed in the battle at Petersburg, Va., in 1863. He was a native of Berlin, now the capital of the German Empire, and arrived in the United States in 1856; politically, he was a thorough Abolitionist, and exhibited his faith by pouring out his life's blood in the cause of human rights. Mr. Schaefer was his friend and patron, and with characteristic benevolence aided him all through his studies, "without fee or reward, or the hope thereof," a generosity that was well timed, as Frank was without a surplus of this world's goods then. Of the judges named in the foregoing list, Judges Potter, Church, Belden and Canfield have gone to their final account, as has Judge Pearce, of the old organization.

At this time, it is believed that the following is a correct list of the members of the bar in Stark County.

Canton.—Hon. S. Meyer, Judge, Messrs. Frease & Case (this firm is composed of Hon. Joseph Frease and F. E. Case), A. D. Braden, J. J. Parker, J. P. Fawcett, A. C. Hiner, George E. Baldwin, and Robert S. Shields, of the firm of Baldwin & Shields, Louis Schaefer, and Louis M. Schaefer, firm of Schaefer & Son, Peter Chance, Anthony Housel, C. R. Miller, John M. Myers, Will Wynn, William A. Lynch, William R. Day, and Austin Lynch, composing the firm of Lynch, Day & Lynch, Turenne C. Meyer, and William J. Piero, firm of Meyer & Piero, John Lahm, J. W. Underhill, F. W. Bond, Charles C. Upham, E. E. Russell, Julius Whiting, Jr., L. M. Jones, H. R. Spencer, Henry A. Wise, Hon. William McKinley, member of Congress, Abner McKinley, Allen A. Carnes, T. T. McCarty, J. S. Hudson, B. F. Faust, H. W. Harter, Prosecuting Attorney, Stark County, William W. Clark, and James J. Clark, firm of W. W. & J. J. Clark, A. W. Hildenbrand, Probate Judge, G. W. Raff, Col. P. S. Sowers, and John C. Mong.

Massillon.—Anson Pease and F. L. Baldwin, firm of Pease & Baldwin, R. H. Folger and John O. Garrett, firm of Folger & Garrett, L. C. Cole, Mayor of the city, and Robert W. McCaughey, firm of Cole & McCaughey, Isaac Ulman, Eugene G. Willison, Robert A. Pinn, Otto E. Young, William McMillan and Andrew C. Robertson.

Alliance.—Harvey Laughlin, Amos Burden, A. L. Jones; these gentlemen may be classed as the oldest lawyers in Alliance, having been at the bar thirty-seven, thirty-two and twenty-seven years respectively, and are gentlemen who command respect, all having held offices of trust and profit, and are prominent in the profession. The rest of the members of the bar in that flourishing city are James Amerman, Samuel F. Esseek, David Fording, William C. Pippitt, J. M. Harrison, James A. Coulter, A. B. Hoover, Judson D. Lewis, James C. Stanley, M. M. King.

Canal Fulton.—William G. Myers and James Sterling.

Hartsville.—S. S. Geib.

Since the organization of the county, there have been many who have entered the profession, and opened offices in various portions of the county, but not succeeding, have gone, some into other professions, and of some it may be written:

"They, the young and strong, who cherished
Noble longings for the strife,
By the wayside fell and perished,
Weary with the march of life."

Among those, however, who have entered the profession in this county at comparatively a late date is Gen. Charles F. Manderson, and whom Stark County regards one of her own sons. Mr. Manderson, in 1860, in March, was admitted to practice at Ravenna, Portage County, after having studied with Hon. Lewis Schaefer and the late Hon. William K. Upham. On the breaking-out of the war in 1861, in April, Mr. Manderson entered the army as a Lieutenant in Company A, Nineteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, Col. Samuel Beatty, and continued in the service until 1865, having risen to the rank of Brigadier General of Volunteers, for meritorious services. He immediately formed a partnership with Col. Meyer, the firm being Meyer & Manderson, which lasted until October, 1869, when the firm was dissolved, and Gen. Manderson removed to Omaha, Neb., where he now resides, in a successful practice.

In 1816, the old court house of Stark County was received from the architect and builder by the Commissioners, and without ceremony, so far as can be ascertained, dedicated to the uses for which it was erected. Those who have seen the court houses at New Philadelphia and Millersburg can form an adequate idea of the buildings erected as temples of justice in the early days of Ohio. The people builded, as well as they knew, they were willing to be taxed all that they could bear, and the old court house was a fair specimen of the public buildings in Ohio, including the old State House, at Columbus, and the United States court house for the District of Ohio, also at Columbus, which will be remembered as having stood in front of the first Neil House. A view of the last-described buildings will be found in Howe's Historical Collections, and the old State House, as there represented, is strikingly like our old court house. With all its imperfections, it has pleasant memories. Within its walls, the old members of the bench and bar named in these sketches, who have gone "to the promised land," achieved a reputation that will last while words are preserved. In that old building, the first death penalty in Stark County was pronounced, the case being The State of Ohio vs. Christian Bachtel, the indictment in which was prosecuted by Messrs. Starkweather & Jarvis, the defense being managed by Messrs. John Harris and Orlando Metcalf. Few remain who witnessed that trial.

Forty-eight years have passed into the great ocean of time, but the circumstance is not forgotten, too sadly have recent similar events refreshed the memory of the long past. The old building has gone; it only graces the page of history. In 1867, Gen. Ed F. Schneider, a member of the bar, and Senator from this district, and who died in the city of Berlin, the seat of government of the German Empire, while making a tour of Europe, procured the necessary legislation to enable the Commissioners of the county to build a new court house. The Commissioners at once took the necessary steps, the work was let to contractors, and finished for occupation at the February term of the Common Pleas Court, A. D. 1870. The taking possession of the noble structure, the gathering together of a large number of the citizens of the county, the presence of distinguished members of the bar from neighboring counties, among whom were Hon. John McSweeney, of Wooster, and Hon. J. T. Brooks, of Salem, all tended to clothe the occasion with uncommon interest. The proceedings of the court and bar on that occasion will be found in the chapter on the organization of the county.

CHAPTER VII.*

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION—EARLY PRACTICE AND PRACTITIONERS—PREVALENT DISEASES— ADVANCE IN MEDICAL AND SURGICAL SCIENCE.

DIVINITY, Law and Medicine are institutions that characterize civilized society. They constitute the foundation upon which the distinctive features of our superstructure rest. The heathen has his religion; the barbarian, a law unto himself, and the savage, a crude idea of the healing art; but what are known and recognized as the learned professions, exist only among enlightened nations.

In the beginning, the first of these most likely called into requisition, was that of medicine. The "accidents by flood and field," and the "ills that flesh is heir to," must be met and treated. How successfully, would depend upon the progress made by observation and experience. In the early settlement of Stark County, the inhabitants were in a measure thrown upon their own resources for the means whereby to relieve suffering humanity. The first case of sickness and death that occurred in the county was that of James Culbertson, in the fall of 1805. He was in the employ of James F. Leonard, surveyor and land jobber, as an assistant, and his duties consisted mainly in helping about camp, procuring food, cooking, and aiding to show emigrants land. From exposure, he contracted a severe cold, which settled upon his lungs. There was no physician nearer than Steubenville, a distance of sixty miles, and it was out of the question to send there for help, so his comrades had no alternative but to do what they could for his relief. They made a decoction of snake root, which they gave him; applied hot fomentations to his chest, and as his prospects of recovery became darker, administered spiritual consolation. The man died on the fourth day after he was taken down and was buried on the Reed farm, immediately north of the present location of the county fair grounds.

The second death was that of a son of John Bowers, of Nimishillen Tp. He was taken with a fever in winter of 1806-7. The few neighbors—none nearer than five miles—were promptly on hand with proffers of assistance in whatever way it could be rendered. Every means suggested that was within reach, was tried, but to no avail. The boy lingered and died. He was buried in the woods and a tree cut to fall upon the grave that the body might not be disturbed by the wolves. The first case of surgery that occurred in the county was that of Philip Smith, residing in the same township. While at work clearing he was struck by a limb of a falling tree, and his leg broken in two places. A young son with him at the time immediately started for help, and in a few hours several of his neighbors were on hand, ready to render such assistance as they were able. No time was lost sending for a doctor, as there was none within reach. A few minutes' consultation decided a plan of action. They straightened the fractured limb, enveloped it with elm bark peeled from the tree and held the splints in place by wrapping them with withes. He was taken home on a sled, and as he was addicted to an indulgence in intoxicating drink, he begged for a dram. This only excited a taste for more, and he was allowed to have it, or rather his wife was compelled to furnish it. There is a witness still living who will testify that Philip Smith, while confined to his bed six weeks with a broken leg, drank six gallons of whisky. At the end of that time the splints were removed and the leg was to all appearance perfect, and upon subsequent trial, found completely restored. This, in proof of the common saying, that the whisky of olden times was less pernicious in its effects upon the human system than that manufactured at the present day.

The first birth in the county was in 1806, a boy, to the wife of Hugh Cunningham, a resident of Plain Township. On this occasion, Mrs. Jacob Loutzenheiser, mother of Judge Peter Loutzenheiser, officiated as midwife. For many years after the settlement of the county, and long after physicians were within reach, was it the custom to employ females in cases of this nature. It was a rare case that a physician was called in. And, so far as results are known of success in the management of labor in former years, as compared with later times, it is believed, by those who have investigated the subject, that the showing is in favor of "ye olden times." This may be accounted for, either in the habits of pioneer life being more favorable to developing and strengthening the system, thereby better enabling the patient to withstand the wear and tear of labor; or, because there was less interference with the efforts of nature.

Fifty years ago, there were but few medical colleges in the United States, and graduates were not then, as now, roaming over the country seeking situations. The population of Stark County had attained considerable growth before a physician settled among them, and after the first, it was years before the second came. To a great extent, the people were compelled to rely upon themselves for relief in case of sickness or accident. In every community, there were those who pretended to a knowledge of disease and its treatment. They were not governed by principles in practice.

Theirs was a routine system. It was bleed, blister and physic. No matter, whether the individual had been kicked by a horse, had the ague or the itch, all the same, he must be bled, and then physicked. In springtime, the house of the man who had a lancet, and could bleed, was a sort of trysting-place on Sundays, where young people, especially women in an interesting condition, would collect, in order to be bled, under an impression that it was good for the health. The gunsmith and blacksmith pulled teeth. They would wrap the fulcrum of a turnkey with a silk handkerchief, and yank out the largest molar. They opened felons with a razor.

A large proportion of the early settlers of Stark County were of German descent, and not favorably disposed toward a liberal education. They were inclined to be superstitious, and believed in the power of words as a remedial agent. There were those who claimed they could, by words, stop bleeding, take out fire, arrest a felon, cure sore mouth, check the fits, and perform divers other miraculous feats.

The diseases most prevalent in early times, were of a malarious character. Fever and ague, bilious fever, and dysentery, during the summer, and pneumonia and pleurisy in the winter. The orthodox treatment of the former was by bleeding, emeto-cathartics, and Peruvian bark. Quinine had not then been introduced. The chief domestic remedies were boneset, dogwood, and snakeroot. The treatment of pneumonia and pleurisy was bleeding, blistering, calomel, opium and tartar-emetic. The absurd practice of interdicting cold water in fever, and excluding fresh air from the sick-room, was religiously observed. The physical labor attending practice at that day, was, at times, very great. The only way of getting over the country was on horseback. The roads were rough, and in the winter, very muddy. Often much of the distance to a house was by a bridle-path. But few of the streams were bridged, and in time of high water, there was no alternative but to plunge in and swim across. It was not an unfrequent occurrence for the physician to be called after night, fifteen or twenty miles away, much of the distance over muddy roads and through dense forests; the place, a log-cabin with only one room, and no resting-spot save the puncheon floor.

Since then, a wonderful change has been wrought, not only in lightening the labor of professional work, but what is more generally appreciated and commended, in those things which minister to the relief of the sick. Almost every branch of scientific research has contributed to the advancement of the science of all sciences—the conservation of human life. Through chemistry, microscopy, experimental physiology, new and more perfect methods of investigating disease have been introduced by which its diagnosis has become more certain. The discovery has been made by pharmaceutical chemists of the active principles of various drugs, by which they have been rendered more certain in their effect, and less nauseous. In therapeutics, the modern physician has many advantages over his predecessor in the facility and safety with which surgical operations can be performed under the influence of ether or chloroform and the use of medicines hypodermically, more especially for the speedy relief of intense pain. He has chloral hydrate, the bromides and many other valuable remedies unknown as medicine in former years. Different systems of practice have arisen in the past, and will in the future. It is for the regular scientific physician to investigate their respective merits, appropriate what is good, and reject that which is worthless. From hydropathy, he has discovered that water is generally a harmless comfort to the sick, whether used externally or internally, and has many valuable uses as a curative agent, though not a cure-all. Homœopathy has taught what nature will do for the restoration of disturbed functional action. Eclecticism enlarged the field of vegetable remedies, and barren must be the new system, claiming the patronage of community that has not some merit.

Scientific medicine—that grounded upon rational ideas, has acquired such momentum that all medical pathies and isms can have but one of two fates—extinction or absorption. They may exist for a time in name, but they die in fact. The aggregate experience and accumulated learning of the profession, inevitably assimilate all that is good, and as surely eliminate all that is bad or nonsensical in pathological or therapeutic theories. For centuries, medicine has constantly advanced, appropriating to itself all that is demonstrably efficient in the alleviation of bodily ills, however irregular its source. It has in its ranks, an army of pioneers, sappers and miners, armed with all the appliances of advanced science, toiling day and night, from youth to old age, in an effort to discover something still more efficacious for the relief of suffering humanity. There can be no “schools” in scientific medicine. Truth has no compromises to make. Opposition only lives by martyrdom or imitation, or both combined. Medicine is progressive, and the coming physician will have advantages far surpassing those of the present day, in methods and instruments for exact diagnosis, more certain knowledge as to the action of medicines, and understand better the effect of certain ailments and occupations on the human organism. As we review the past, and reflect upon the progress made, we wonder what will the future bring forth? In the hope that a short biographical sketch of the early practitioners of the county would add to the historical interest of the work, we have gathered the following list. No statement has been made not believed to be truthful. The writer would

Nor set down aught in malice.”

The first physician located in Stark County was Andrew Rappe. He was born in Paris, France, 1779. Having lost both his parents when quite young, he was left to the care of an aunt, residing near the border of Germany. His medical education was obtained in Frankfurt-on-the-Rhine. After serving several years as Surgeon in the army, he emigrated to America, sailing from Hamburg, September 11, 1804, and landing at Baltimore May 5, 1805, the voyage occupying over seven months. He remained in Baltimore about one year, then came to Steubenville, where he resided until 1808. The same year he changed his location to Canton, where he remained the rest of his life. His practice extended over a wide range of country—beyond the Tuscarawas River and east of Sandy. The difficulty of obtaining foreign drugs at that early day, compelled him in many instances to rely upon indigenous plants. To prepare them for use involved much time and labor, and he was often compelled to work late at night after a day spent in visiting distant patients. On one occasion, while manipulating with an acid, an explosion took place, throwing some of the ingredient into his eye whereby it was destroyed. He was very exacting in his treatment of patients, insisting upon every direction being carefully observed. He was proprietor of an eye salve, known as "Dr. Rappe's Invaluable Eye Salve," selling large quantities and gaining for it considerable local reputation. He obtained the formula from a French physician aboard the vessel in which he sailed to America. During the voyage, this physician was taken seriously ill, and Dr. Rappe gave him special attention. On his recovery, feeling grateful for the services rendered him, he said to Dr. Rappe that money he had none, but he had the recipe for an "invaluable eye salve" which he would give him, with the request that he would never part with it—and he never did, it being kept in the family to this day. Dr. Rappe was married in Steubenville to Mary Shorb, daughter of John Shorb. They had seven children, only three, however, lived through infancy. These were John S. Rappe, now of Upper Sandusky, Ohio; the late Mrs. Henry H. Myers, and the late Mrs. Louisa Faber Kimball. The Doctor died February 5, 1842, of pleurisy, after a short illness, leaving property of considerable value, acquired by professional industry.

William Gardner came from Albany, N. Y., and located in Kendall (now "Fourth Ward" of Massillon) in 1813. He was married in 1816 to Sarah B. Earl, daughter of the hotel proprietor with whom he boarded. The year following, he removed to Norwalk, Huron County, where he continued in active practice until 1825, when he returned to Stark County and settled in Canton. Here he remained until his death in 1833. Dr. Gardner was heavy-set, broad-shouldered, quick in action and highly esteemed for integrity. He was regarded a man of more than ordinary ability, and had an extensive practice. Independent in thought, he did not hesitate to express his opinions, though in opposition to the popular current. His law suit with Nicholas Lichley, will be remembered by many still living. A daughter of Lichley had some trouble of the eyes and was brought to Gardner for treatment. Instead of improving, under various applications, her sight became worse, and finally she went totally blind. Lichley, being an impulsive man, and rather free talker, did not hesitate to charge Gardner with mal-treating the case, whenever the subject was introduced in his presence. This talk became very annoying to Dr. Gardner, and for the purpose of vindicating himself brought suit for slander, laying his damages at $2,000. His attorneys were Harris & Belden. Lichley employed Starkweather and Jarvis. They were the two strongest firms at the Stark County bar. The case excited a wide-spread interest, and the court house was crowded during the progress of the trial. Starkweather was then in the zenith of his reputation as a jury lawyer. He had the blind girl seated in front of the jury while he addressed them, and whenever he made an appeal in behalf of his client, the poor girl would turn up her sightless orbs, imploring, as it were, sympathy for her father. The defense claimed that the blindness was caused by culpable carelessness—introducing into the eyes something different from what was intended—and this theory was sustained by the testimony of Dr. Bennett, a well known, reputable physician of Bolivar. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant; thereupon, Lichley brought suit against Gardner for mal-practice, laying his damages at $10,000. Before the trial was reached, Gardner died and the case was withdrawn. This was the first mal-practice suit in the county.

The two Bonfields, John and Thomas S., brothers, settled in Canton soon after the war of 1812. They were from Baltimore, and both graduates of the medical school of that city. John was an Assistant Surgeon of the army at the time of the attack upon Fort McHenry. He was a strange genius, and many thought too much learning had disturbed his balance. He was slovenly in dress, wore his hair long and straggling, and would often appear with a red bandana as a neck-tie. He was slow of speech, and kept his horse so poor that the boys would caw after him on the streets. Many reposed great faith in his medical skill, particularly in the treatment of fevers. He had an itching for office, and was repeatedly a candidate, though never successful. He came within one, in a race of half a dozen for the County Treasurer's office. He married a daughter of William Cunningham, by whom he had several children. Several years after her death, he returned to Baltimore, where he died in 1835.

Thomas S. was very unlike his brother John. He was a tidy, dapper young man, fluent talker, quick in his movements, and prompt to respond to calls. He was a fast rider, stood in his stirrups, projecting his body forward, apparently going faster than his horse. He was popular as a physician, and had an extensive practice. He died in 1855, leaving a large landed estate, now very valuable.

Thomas Hartford came from Connecticut, and settled in Canton in 1818. He was a kind hearted man, and generous to the poor, as the following verbatim notice in a Repository of 1820 would indicate :

"Dr. Thomas Hartford hereby informs such as are in indigent circumstances, in the county of Stark, that in cases of sickness, advice and medicine will be given to them gratis."

That he was not prompted to make this offer from ulterior motives, is evident from the bequest in his will, giving a large proportion of his real estate to the poor of Canton. After some ten years of general practice, Dr. Hartford engaged in the mercantile business ; and, about 1833, removed to Pittsburgh, Penn.

James Jerow came to Canton in 1820. He was from one of the New England States, and was reputed a man of more than ordinary intelligence, and well educated in his profession. In managing a case, he was very decided and exacting, and would tolerate no interference. If there was any hesitancy about carrying out his instructions, any distrust manifested as to his skill or judgment, or a disposition to try a remedy recommended by another, straightway would he give the parties to understand that unless he had the exclusive and uninterrupted control of the case he would retire. He would take the whole responsibility or none. He died in 1825 of a malignant fever. John Coulter, the first medical student in Stark County, studied with Dr. Jerow.

Justin Scott, a surgeon in the war of 1812, located in Kendall about the year 1815. From what can be learned of him, he was regarded by the community a well qualified physician and a skillful surgeon. He remained in Kendall several years, then removed to Burton, Geauga County, Ohio.

George Breysacher was born and educated in Germany, and settled in Canton in 1819. It was said he had been a Surgeon under Bonaparte, which gave him considerable reputation. He did an extensive practice, particularly among the German people, native and foreign. He was a fine horseman and a great hunter, always rode at break-neck speed with several dogs following him. He was once seen coming into town with two deer on his horse that he had shot. He died in 1844. One of his sons, Augustus L., was a Surgeon in the confederate army, and Medical Director of Hardee's Corps.

Joseph Simmons was one of the early physicians of Canton. He came from Pennsylvania in 1820 ; was a man of fine personal appearance, scrupulously neat in dress, and bore himself with an aristocratic air. He did not succeed in securing a satisfactory run of business, not because of any question as to his qualifications, but by reason of this seeming hauteur in his manner. The same has driven many a well-qualified young man from the ranks, while a bloviating ignoramus has succeeded in making money. Dr. Simmons remained in Canton about ten years, when he removed to Cincinnati. There he continued several years, then changed his location to St. Louis, where he died about two years ago.

Joseph Watson was of Quaker descent, born in 1798, near Philadelphia, Penn. His elementary education was such as the scant opportunities of the time and place afforded. He commenced the study of medicine in 1821, with Dr. Wood, of Lycoming County, remaining with him a year. In the fall of 1822, he came West, stopping in Wrightstown, Belmont Co., Ohio. Here he resumed the study with Dr. Hartley, and continued with him until he decided to look up a location to practice. He visited Cadiz, New Philadelphia, Wooster and Dover (now called Dalton), and when he made known at the latter place the object of his visit, he was so strongly urged to settle among them that he decided to do so. The town was without a physician, and he had several calls before he could hang out a shingle. He soon had all he wanted to do. His work was laborious. Disturbed at all hours of the night, long rides over rough roads, exposed to all kinds of weather, will eventually dampen the zeal of most men, so after a residence of ten years in Dover, Dr. Watson concluded to change the field of his operations, and, in the fall of 1833, came to Massillon, which at that time was the rising town of this part of the State. While in practice at Massillon, he had several partners, including Dr. Michener and Dr. Bowen, both men of well-known professional reputation. Dr. Watson withdrew from active practice about 1843 and engaged in the drug business, in which he built up a large wholesale and retail trade. In this he continued until 1877, when admonished by advancing years and failing vigor, that it was time for him to retire from active work. Dr. Watson was married in 1824 to Mary Ann Walton, of Columbiana Co., Ohio. The couple are enjoying life's peaceful evening together—the only remaining link in the county connecting the old-time practitioners with the present.

Beriah Brooks, John Shaw and Josiah Gale were physicians who located in Kendall between 1820 and 1825. Brooks moved over to Massillon as soon as it was started, and died there in 1831. Gale abandoned practice for a contract on the canal, and Shaw, after remaining several years, left for parts unknown.

Thomas and John Townsend, brothers, removed from Wooster to Massillon about the year 1828, and set up in practice together. They remained a few years, when Thomas went to Wheeling, Va., where he died. The last known of John he had drifted to California.

Robert Estep was born in Fayette Co., Penn., in 1793; served an apprenticeship at the trade of silversmith; pursued that calling several years, when he concluded to study medicine. After reading eighteen months, he commenced practice in Paris, Stark Co., in 1824. He soon acquired a wide-spread reputation, not only as a skilful practitioner, but as a surgeon of more than ordinary ability. Twice he performed the Cæsarean section, the only physician of the county that ever attempted it. He several times operated for cataract and cut for stone. In 1834, he removed to Canton, where he enjoyed an extensive practice until his death in 1852, at the age of fifty-nine. The honorary degree of M. D. was conferred upon him by the Ohio Medical College, in 1835.

Joseph H. Estep, son of Robert Estep, was born in 1819. He followed painting until twenty-three, when he took up the study of medicine. He read with his father, and graduated at the Cleveland Medical College in 1847. He commenced practice at Waynesburg, and soon succeeded in obtaining a profitable run of custom. When the California gold excitement overspread the land, he yielded to the temptation and went there. He remained there several years, during which time he was elected a member of the first Legislature. On his return in 1852, he settled in Canton. Here he continued in practice until failing health induced him to return to California in 1873. He died in 1876. Dr. Estep was twice married. His first wife was Miss Polley, by whom he had three children. His second wife was Miss Rank; by her he had no issue. He was a man of considerable natural talent, an original genius, a ready, forcible writer, not much of a student, but extravagantly fond of light literature, and inclined to take the world easy.

Perkins Wallace was born in Trumbull County, Ohio, in 1808. Studied medicine with Dr. Thomas Bonfield, Canton, and graduated at the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati, in 1833. He commenced the practice of medicine at Brandywine Mills, Summit Co.; from thence he removed to Akron, where he remained about two years, when he again changed his location to Massillon. Here he continued until 1850, doing an extensive practice. Considerations outside of professional, influenced him to remove to Canton, where he remained until his death in 1868, aged sixty. Dr. Wallace was married in 1835 to Rebecca Reynolds, by whom he had six children.

Lorenzo M. Whiting was born in Litchfield County, Conn., in 1811. Received his medical degree at Williams College in 1835, and located in Canton in 1836. Dr. Whiting has continued longer in practice at the one place than any physician who has ever lived in Stark County. He has always been held in high esteem, not only as a practitioner of medicine, but as a general scholar, versed in literature and the sciences. His consultation calls have exceeded those of any other practitioner, a proof of his standing with the community. He was appointed a Trustee of the Northern Ohio Lunatic Asylum, by Gov. Chase, in 1856. During the rebellion, he was appointed by Gov. Denison one of the Board of Examiners of Surgeons to Ohio regiments, also Examining Surgeon for Stark County and for the Board of Enrolment for the Seventeenth Congressional District of Ohio, which position he held until the close of the war. He was Pension Surgeon from 1862 until October, 1880, when, by reason of ill health, he resigned. He was likewise Censor of Cleveland Medical College. In all these varied positions he discharged the duties devolving upon him with entire satisfaction to all parties concerned. The Doctor was struck with paralysis in the summer of 1880, since which time, he has been unable to practice.

Auren W. Whiting was born in Connecticut in 1826. Educated in the High School of Westfield, Mass. Read medicine with Dr. W. B. De Forest, Colebrook, Conn., and in 1846 matriculated at the Medical Department of Yale College. After one course of lectures, he came to Canton, and engaged with his brother L. M., continuing the study, and gradually taking up practice. He attended a second course of lectures at Cleveland, graduating in 1850. He located first in Massillon, where he remained until 1858; then spent about eighteen months in Europe, visiting the hospitals of Paris and other large cities. Soon after his return from Europe, he was elected Assistant Physician of the Northern Ohio Lunatic Asylum, which position he held several years. During the rebellion, he was a contract surgeon, doing duty in the field hospitals near Georgetown. At the close of the war, he settled in Canton, where he has since remained, making a specialty of chronic diseases.

Carl F. Brackebush was born and educated in Germany. He came to this country in 1835, and first settled in Osnaburg, but remained there but a short time, when he removed to Canton. He was considered well educated in his profession, and had an extensive practice. He died in 1849, of neuralgia of the heart, caused by exposure in professional labor.

F. D. H. Dallwick was born in Cassel, Germany, in 1814, and received his medical education in that country. He came to Stark County in 1833, first settling in Greentown. From there he removed to Canton, where he remained some years. He was the first physician appointed to the County Infirmary. From Canton he removed to Canal Fulton, where he died in 1849. His wife was Louisa, daughter of Christian Palmer, a pioneer settler.

Joseph H. Mathews was born in England. He studied medicine with Dr. Robert Estep, and received his degree from the Cleveland Medical College. He commenced practice as a partner of his preceptor, and on his decease was associated for some years with Dr. Wallace. On their dissolution, Dr. Mathews continued practice until within a year, accumulating considerable property. He is now connected with the Diebold Safe & Lock Company. His wife, now deceased, was Mary A. Shorb, daughter of John Shorb.

Barak Michener was born 1779, in Chester County, Penn. His grandparents came over with William Penn. His educational opportunities in his youth were extremely meager, but he was a young man of good natural ability and indomitable energy, by reason of which, he became a man of very considerable learning. While yet a boy, his father removed to Jefferson County, Ohio, and when about eighteen years of age, he started out for himself, coming to Lawrence Township, Stark County, where he had relatives living. Working here a short time, he engaged in teaching near Kendall. About 1825, he commenced teaching in Canton, and it was while engaged in this pursuit, that he conceived the idea of studying medicine. He read with Dr. Gardner, and commenced practice with him, never having attended lectures. He removed to Massillon in 1834, and for several years was associated in practice with Dr. Watson. It was about this time that Asiatic cholera made its appearance as an epidemic in the neighborhood, carrying off more people than has any epidemic in the same length of time, before or since. In the treatment of this disease, Dr. Michener had an extensive experience, and his success was above the average. He was an original thinker, and not a routine prescriber. In 1839, he removed on to a farm near West Brookfield, continuing to practice until 1849, when he went west to Freeport, Ill., where he remained until 1853, when he again emigrated west, purchasing land near Adel, Dallas Co., Iowa. He had relinquished practice, and was living upon and improving this land when he died March 10, 1878. A son of the Doctor is a physician, was engaged in practice in Adel, but removed to Dallas, Tex., and is now a planter.

John Schertzer was born 1799, in Franklin County, Penn. The education of the Doctor, owing to the limited facilities of the time and his place of residence, was not very extended. He began the study of medicine when about eighteen years of age, with Dr. Jacob Grubb, of Lebanon County, Penn., and obtained his degree of Doctor of Medicine from Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia. After practicing at several places in the counties of Lebanon and Franklin, he removed to Massillon, Stark Co., in 1835, where he continued practice until appointed Postmaster by President Lincoln, which office he held nine years. He was elected State Senator in 1850, serving one term. He died in 1880.

Jeremiah V. Schertzer was born in Pennsylvania, 1821, had a common-school education, and read medicine with his father. He attended lectures at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and began practice with his father in 1844. He is still a resident of Massillon, and engaged in medical practice. Dr. Schertzer was married in 1848 to Mary Ellen Ogden, daughter of Hugh Ogden, of Massillon.

Daniel L. Gans was born in Fayette County, Penn., 1819. At an early age, he manifested a taste for reading, and a preference for the study and practice of medicine. At eighteen, he engaged with an older brother, a practicing physician of Moundville, Va., and with him, he remained as a student two years, completing his medical course in the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati. He commenced practice in Smithfield, Penn., three miles from his birthplace, and continued there about eighteen months, then removed to Magnolia, Tuscarawas County, Ohio. He lived here eight years, and during this time, purchased a large farm in Pike Township, near Sparta. Upon this he removed in 1850, and has lived here ever since, devoting his leisure from practice to overseeing his farm, and giving attention to breeding fine stock, particularly sheep and cattle. Dr. Gans was married in 1845, to Margaret Hanna, of Steubenville. They have four children—two sons and two daughters.

J. P. Barrick was born in 1818, in Morgantown, Rockingham Co., Va. His father was a farmer, and before this son was grown, he removed to Columbiana Co., Ohio. His opportunities for acquiring an education in early life were quite limited. He married young, and at the time of his marriage was in the employ of James Farmer, merchant, of Salineville. Soon after, he went to Cleveland and engaged with Dr. Henry Everett, with whom he studied medicine. He located in the practice at Massillon in 1842, and continued in the profession until his death in 1879. He received the honorary degree of M. D. from the Cleveland Medical College in 1866. Dr. Barrick was married the second time to Mrs. Clarissa A. Baldwin, of Massillon. He served a number of years in the City Council, and in the Board of Education, of which he was a member at the time of his death. He was of a social disposition and popular with the people.

Frederick T. Hurxthal was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1814. His father was a merchant. His early education was such as the local schools afforded opportunity to acquire. He read medicine under Dr. Willard Parker, of New York City, and graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, in 1845. He began practice in Magnolia, Tuscarawas Co., and continued in that place until 1847, when he removed to Massillon. Dr. Hurxthal served in the army during the late war as Surgeon of the Nineteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. His death, which occurred under specially sad circumstances, was the result of an injury received by a fall on the platform at the railroad station in Canton, Feb. 3, 1865. Dr. H. was a live member of the profession—a close student, always abreast of the improvements of the day, and a frequent contributor to the journals.

Abraham Metz was born in Stark County in 1828. His father was a pioneer settler of 1807. He was educated in the common schools, in which he taught when a mere lad. He began the study of medicine with Dr. Kahlor, in Columbiana County, and attended a course of lectures at Willoughby Medical College. The summer following, he enlisted in the Mexican war, Third Ohio Regiment, and was appointed Hospital Steward, much of the time doing the work of an Assistant Surgeon. After his return from Mexico, he resumed his medical studies, and graduated at Cleveland Medical College in 1848. He commenced practice at North Georgetown, Columbiana County, remaining there about a year, then went West, settling at Big Lick, Hancock Co., Ohio. From here he went into Seneca County, where he continued until 1854, when he changed his location to Massillon. He soon after made a specialty of diseases of the eye, and became widely known as a successful practitioner in that line. He also gave attention to general surgery, and was recognized as a skillful operator. Under the disadvantages of a country location, he kept abreast of the rapid growth of his specialty. He was one of the founders of Charity Hospital Medical College (now the Medical Department of Wooster University) at Cleveland, of which institution he was one of the original Faculty, occupying the chair of Ophthalmology, which place he filled at the time of his death, February 1, 1876. He was Surgeon of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne &

Chicago Railway, and was frequently sent beyond his district when accidents occurred involving serious or important surgical operations. Dr. Metz was emphatically a self-made man. With very limited educational advantages, he made himself master not only of our own language, but acquired such a knowledge of the German and French as enabled him to read without difficulty their publications. By his indomitable energy he overcame obstacles presented in his researches, that would have appalled most young men. He is the author of a work entitled "Histology of the Eye," now used as a text-book in many of our medical colleges; has also contributed many articles to the journals of the day. Dr. Metz was a genial companion, inclined to make the most of what this life afforded, and long will be remembered for his many excellent traits of character. He was married in 1849 to Elizabeth Patterson, of Columbiana County, by whom he had one child, a daughter—both still living.

Hermann J. Uhl, was born in Saxony, 1823. Read medicine with his father and obtained his degree at a medical school in Dresden, 1846. He was associated in practice with his father until 1848, when he came to America and located in Bethlehem, Stark County. Here he remained until 1853, when he removed to Bolivar, where he continued about three years, during which time he was physician to the "Zoar Community." From 1856 to 1858, he was a resident of Dunleith, Ill., from there he returned and settled in Massillon; here he remained about seven years, when the desire for change prompted him to locate in Navarre. In the spring of 1877, he made a trip to Europe, and while at the home of his youth was taken sick and died December 20, of the same year. Though somewhat eccentric and subject to fitful moods, the doctor was always considered a good physician.

G. Kersey Thomas was born in York County, Penn., 1818, of Quaker parents. He came to Salem, Ohio, when quite young, and at the age of eighteen began the study of medicine with Dr. Benjamin Stanton. At the age of twenty-two, he married Rebecca Shaw and settled in Marlboro and commenced practice. His wife died in 1849, and in 1852 he married Eliza L. Smyth, a teacher in the Marlboro Union School. In 1856, he went to Philadelphia where he spent over a year pursuing his medical studies, and in 1857 he settled in Alliance. In 1862, he was appointed Surgeon of the One Hundred and Fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, but his health soon failed, and in December of the same year, he was prostrated with paralysis, resigned his commission and was brought home on a lounge. In 1864, his second wife died, and in 1868 he married Mrs. Rosanna Milner. He died March 10, 1869, of congestion of the brain. Dr. Thomas was considered a man of more than ordinary ability. In practice, his taste was in favor of surgery. At the time of his death, he was Surgeon of the two railroads passing through Alliance.

Levi Haldeman, born in Columbiana County; read medicine with Drs. Robertson & Carey, of Hanoverton, same county, attended lectures at Louisville, Ky., and commenced practice in Minerva, Stark County, in 1839. He did an extensive business up to 1860, when he left the profession to engage in oil speculation, in which he has accumulated several large fortunes. He is the only physician of the county, who has ever had a case of well-marked, unmistakable hydrophobia. The case was that of Andrew Shultz, bit by a small dog, who in three weeks after, manifested symptoms of hydrophobia, terminating fatally in three days.

Francis Joseph Wernet, born in Baden, Germany, 1812; studied medicine in Basle, and graduated at Freyburg; came to America in 1842; settled first in Pittsburgh, but the health of his wife becoming impaired as was supposed from local causes, he removed to Canton the next year, and there remained in practice until his death in 1862. He had five children. Mrs. Wernet died in 1881.

William J. Parker was born in Jefferson County, Ohio, 1812; his parents came from North Carolina. He commenced the study of medicine with his uncle, Dr. Parker, of Belmont County, Ohio, at twenty years of age, and set up in practice when twenty-five, at Salineville in company with Dr. Farmer. He remained here four years, and then after having resided and practiced in Fairfield, Columbiana and New Lisbon, all in the same county until 1866, he removed to Alliance where he remained until his death in 1880.

J. L. Leeper was born in Norfolk, Va., 1818; educated at Cannonsburg, Penn., and studied medicine in Brooke County, West Va. He came to Navarre in 1847, and continued there in active practice until 1867, when he removed on to his farm in Perry Township where he still resides. Dr. Leeper is a clever, social gentleman and popular with his neighbors.

William Neely was born in Jefferson County, 1819. He studied medicine with Dr. Thomas Wood (late of Cincinnati), and was associated with him in practice for a time. In 1843, he settled in New Franklin, Paris Township, since which time, he has continued in practice in different localities in the eastern portion of the county, Alliance and Mount Union.

Charles Kay was born in New Jersey; read medicine in Warren County, Ohio; settled in East Fairfield, where he practiced over thirty years. In 1849, he received the honorary degree of medicine, and in 1869, removed to Alliance, where he has since resided, engaged in active practice.

David A. Arter was born in Columbiana County, Ohio, in 1820. His early education was what the common and select schools of that day afforded. He read medicine with Drs. Robertson and Cary, of Hanoverton, who had in their day a wide-spread reputation and did an extensive practice. He graduated at the Miami Medical College, Cincinnati, in 1845, and soon after located in East Fairfield, Columbiana Co. From thence he removed to Carrollton, where he remained a number of years, and in 1865, he removed to Canton. He has been in active practice some thirty-six years. He was married in 1844 to Almyra Ferral, by whom he had four children. She died in 1859, and he married Sarah M. McCall, of Harrison County. Dr. Arter was commissioned by Gov. Tod, Captain of Cavalry, during the rebellion, and for two years served as Deputy Revenue Collector. The Doctor has been more successful than most of the brethren in collecting and saving his earnings, as he is now in very comfortable circumstances.

John B. Wilson was born in Mahoning County, Ohio, in 1828. He read medicine with Dr. John Dickson, Pittsburgh, Penn., and attended lectures in Cleveland in 1846-47. Commenced practice in Austintown, Mahoning County, remaining there but a short time, and came to Alliance in 1849, where he has practiced ever since—being the oldest practitioner in the town. He attended a second course of lectures at Cleveland in the winter of 1853-54, graduating in the spring.

Lewis Slusser, born in Canton in 1820; educated at home schools and Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, the latter of which he was compelled to leave while in the Junior year, by reason of pulmonary trouble. For this, he sought a warmer climate, and while in Georgia teaching, he commenced the study of medicine, reciting regularly to a preceptor. He attended a first course of lectures, at the National Medical College, Washington City, in 1845-46. The second, at the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati, graduating March, 1849. The interim between lectures, nearly three years, he was with Dr. Haldeman, of Minerva, practicing under instructions. Soon after graduating, he located in Canal Fulton, where he remained in practice until the war of the rebellion, when he entered the service as Surgeon of the Sixty-ninth Ohio. While in the army, he served on post, field and staff duty. He was on the operating corps, in all the prominent engagements of the Army of the Cumberland and the Army of Georgia, and after the arrival of Sherman's army at Savannah, he was assigned in charge of an ocean hospital transport, engaged in conveying sick and wounded to Northern hospitals. Immediately after being mustered out with his regiment, he was re-commissioned Surgeon of the Twenty-sixth Ohio, ordered to New Orleans, and thence to Texas, where he served until mustered out with the last remnant of the army, November, 1865. On his return from the army, he settled in Canton, where he has since remained. Dr. Slusser was twice elected to represent Stark County in the State Legislature, serving from 1858 to 1861. He was appointed Superintendent of the Insane Hospital at Newburg, which position he held from 1874 to 1876. Was Surgeon ten years of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway. Has frequently written for the medical journals, and, of late years, has taken quite an interest in the early history of Stark County, collecting and recording events for preservation. He has been twice married. His first wife was Sarah C. Pearce, daughter of Dr. Joseph Pearce, of Huron, Ohio. She died while with him in the army, in 1863. His present wife is Helena A., daughter of C. F. Ricks, of Massillon.

The first physician to locate in Canal Fulton was William Myers. He read with Dr. Gardner, of Canton. Dr. Myers was in Fulton but a short time when he changed his residence to Sandyville. Here he died of consumption. The next in Lawrence Township, was Dr. S. Dolbear, and following him Alexander Porter. We have been unable to procure any definite information in regard to the early history of these men.

Henry Houtz was born in Pennsylvania, and came to Ohio with his father, who was a pioneer settler of Wayne County. The subject of our sketch, after completing his school studies, engaged for a time in teaching, and then commenced the study of medicine with Dr. L. G. Harley, of Dalton. Completing the preliminary course, he attended lectures, and graduated at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and commenced practice in Canal Fulton about 1838. He remained here until 1849, when he sold out and removed to Cleveland, where he is still living.

His medical education was completed by his graduation from the Starling Medical College of Columbus, during the winter of 1863-64. He immediately hung out his shingle in Louisville, where he has since remained in active practice.

J. S. Beucler was born in Switzerland in 1829. He received a good education, and taught several terms of school in his native land. His medical studies were begun in 1853. Two years later, he came to Louisville, Ohio, and began practicing his profession. With the exception of three years spent in Wayne County, he has since remained in practice at Louisville.

J. P. Callahan was born in Mahoning County in 1835, and, when about nineteen years of age, began reading medicine with Dr. J. M. Hole, of Greenford, and, in 1869, graduated at the Eclectic Medical College of Pennsylvania. He practiced ten years at Berlin Center, and, in 1870, located at Alliance, where he has since resided, practicing his profession.

John V. Lewis was born in Greenford, Mahoning Co., in 1836, and read medicine with Dr. A. Wickart, of his native town, after which he attended lectures at the Eclectic Medical Institute of Cincinnati. He practiced at East Berlin, Ill., for a time, but at length returned to Ohio and formed a partnership with his preceptor. In 1869, he graduated from the above-mentioned institution, and, in 1871, located at Alliance. Here he has since remained.

Joseph Dilworth, a native of Columbiana County, studied medicine in Mount Union, and afterward attended lectures at the Cleveland Medical College, but did not graduate. He located in Mount Union, where he enjoyed a lucrative practice until the time of his death, which event occurred in November, 1878. He was elected to the State Legislature in 1868.

A. H. Day was born in Deerfield, Ohio, November, 1815. He began the study of medicine in 1840 with his brother, J. H. Day. He studied thus for three years and then began practicing in Columbiana County, and after six months went to New Baltimore where he has been the greater portion of the time since. Through his long practice he has had reasonable success.

J. H. Rogers was born in Wayne County, Ohio, in November, 1847. His medical studies were begun in the fall of 1873, under Dr. Barnes, of Fredericksburg, Ohio. In 1875-76, he attended medical lectures at the University of Wooster, Cleveland, from which institution he graduated. Soon after this he began practicing at Beech City, where he remained until the fall of 1878, and then went to Louisville, where he has enjoyed a lucrative practice since.

A. B. Campbell was born in Canada, where he first began the study of medicine. He afterward attended the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, graduating from the medical department in April, 1871. He practiced for two years in Summit County, and then removed to Canal Fulton, where he has since remained. During the winter of 1880-81, he attended the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia to further perfect himself in his profession.

H. Dissinger is a native of Summit County, Ohio. He began the study of medicine in 1875, under Dr. D. Rowe, of Manchester. In 1878, he graduated at the Medical College of Ohio, Cincinnati; he is also a graduate of the Long Island Hospital College of Brooklyn, New York. In December, 1878, he located at Canal Fulton and has secured a large practice.

C. M. Dickson is also a native of Summit County. He began the study of medicine with his father, Dr. M. M. Dickson, under whose direction he remained one year. He then entered the Medical College at Ann Arbor, Mich., and graduated in 1880. He practiced seven months in Port Clinton, Summit County, and then removed to Canal Fulton, where he has since been in active practice.

Z. T. Goucher is a native of the Keystone State. He studied medicine with his father, Dr. C. W. Goucher, and at last, after a collegiate course, graduated at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, in 1873. He then practiced at Inwood, Ind., three years, and also three years at Lester's Ford, Indiana. He removed to Ohio and practiced two years at Orrville, and then located in North Lawrence, where he has since resided and practiced.

J. W. McCort began the study of medicine with Dr. Carter, of Carrollton; attended lectures in Cincinnati, and finally graduated in medicine at the Bellevue Medical Hospital, New York. He located in Waynesburg in 1872, and has since remained there with a flourishing practice.

B. S. Dibble has been located in Minerva in the practice of medicine over thirty years.

Dr. Sanor, of the same place, has been a resident of Stark county a number of years.

A biographical sketch of Dr. George Holtz of New Berlin, and Dr. J. Steese of Uniontown, will appear in another part of the work.

J. M. Bye is a native of Columbiana County, and a graduate of the Medical Department of the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan. He has enjoyed an active practice at Waynesburg since 1865.

Alexander F. Atwell was born in Columbiana County; read medicine with Drs. Frease & Graham, of Hanover, and has been practicing at Waynesburg more than twenty years.

As dentistry may be considered an adjunct of medicine, it is proper to mention that the first dentist in Stark county was S. P. Hullihan.

He was a self-made man—had learned the silversmith trade, and afterward took up dentistry, and followed it some five years in Canton, then removed to Wheeling, Va., where he acquired a high reputation, not only as an expert dentist, but as a surgeon in special operations.

As early as 1836, a Medical Society was formed, composed of the most reputable and prosperous members of the profession, located in different parts of the county. They continued to meet regularly semi-annually and for a time quarterly, until internal dissensions arose, created by the introduction of personal quarrels, based on alleged violations of the code of ethics. For a time the society would be dissolved, and again convoked under a new regime—flourish temporarily, only to again wane. At present it has only a sickly existence. Most of the members belong to the Union Medical Association, of North eastern Ohio, which meets quarterly, having a representation from a number of counties, is a much larger body, and the meetings always interesting and profitable, which contributes to cripple the county organization.

CANTON TOWNSHIP was one of the first townships organized in the county. It is bounded on the north by Plain; east by Osnaburg; south by Pike; and west by Perry Township. It is six miles square, and covers, therefore, an area of thirty-six square miles, or thirty-six complete sections of land. Situated but a few miles south of the summit that divides the valley of the Ohio from that of the great lakes, it has some geographical features common to both; but the predominating ones are those of the Ohio River basin, to which it properly belongs. The surface features are varied—rolling and inclined to be hilly, in the northeastern portion; in the northwestern, it is almost a level plain; south of the central section line, it becomes more and more hilly, until in the southeastern and southwestern portions it is very rough and hilly; and this is particularly the case along the Nimi-shillen Creek just before it leaves the township, where steep, precipitous banks rise on both sides to an elevation of 150 to 200 feet, and extend back in each direction, east and west, for a considerable distance. The Nimi-shillen is hemmed in by ridges of moderate elevation through its whole extent, inclosing bottom land of great fertility from half a mile to a mile in width. Hurford's Hill, a little west of south from Canton, and Buck Hill, about two miles southwest, not more than one and a half miles distant from each other, are remarkable from the fact that, while each of them is of about the height of 125 feet, they differ radically and materially from each other, and represent quite closely the difference of the sections in which they are situated. The former is composed of shales of slate, several coal veins, fire clay and limestone, and it is characteristic of the whole, or nearly the whole, eastern and southern parts of the township. The latter is a mound of gravel-drift formation, and characterizes the northwestern part. The eastern and southern sections, including all parts of the township east of the Nimishillen and its west branch, belong to the forest region of North America. A small branch, rising from springs in swamp land, a little south of the middle section line of the township, and emptying into the Nimishillen three-eighths of a mile below the junction of its east-and-west branches, is the southern boundary, as the West Nimishillen is the eastern, of a sandy-soil region extending in a northwesterly direction to the Tuscarawas River. The southern portion of this region in Canton Township had some small timber; but eighty years ago, the greater part of it was without trees and covered with long grass, and was the first of a series of prairies west of the Alleghanies, which, gradually growing larger, at last culminated in the great prairies of the Northwest. The lands here are fertile gravel lands of drift formation, and are at this time in a high state of cultivation, ranking among the first lands in the county for the raising of all kinds of grain. Most of the hilly portions of the township, and the valleys inclosed by them, are clay lands, though gravel and sand hills are by no means uncommon among them. They are mostly underlaid with coal strata of sufficient thickness to be profitably worked. The soil is generally fertile on these hills and in the valleys, and yields a rich return to the labor of the husbandman, while the coal beneath, readily mined from the hillsides, gives a double source of income, and makes the land very valuable. From the northeastern part of the township a branch of the Nimishillen Creek, flowing southwesterly and in a westerly direction, meets the Middle Branch of the same creek coming from the north, just northeast of Canton, and they there form what is familiarly known as the East Creek, which, flowing in a southwesterly direction two and a half miles, forms a junction with the West Creek, south of Canton, and makes, with this, the Nimishillen Creek. From this point the Nimishillen flows in a southwesterly course through the township. The West Creek comes from the northwestern part of the township, and on its way it receives the outlet from Meyer's Lake. Besides the tributary from the west, already mentioned above as dividing the gravel from the clay lands, the Nimishillen, farther down, has another small tributary from the east. Springs and small rivulets are very numerous, and these, with the creeks, render the soil well watered.

* Contributed by Prof. Daniel Worley.

Meyer's Lake is in the northwestern part of the township, and is a beautiful sheet of clear water, supplied partly by the natural rainfall, and partly by numerous springs in its bottom coming from the gravel formation of the section and its northwestern extension, described above. This lake is one of a number of similar bodies of fresh water found in this part of the State of Ohio. It is now from a half to three-fourths of a mile long, with perhaps an average width of one-fourth of a mile. Formerly the lake undoubtedly was of much greater extent, as evidenced from the swamp lands at its northwestern, and more particularly at its southern and southeastern extremities. Its outlet has its origin in the last-named place. Its northern shore is a precipitous bluff, back of which is heavy timber land, mostly yet standing. The lake has long been a favorite resort for the boys fond of fishing, and when we say boys we mean many of larger growth as well as the smaller ones. It is well supplied with the fish common to this part of the country, and it seems that the supply is inexhaustible. To those skilled in Sir Isaac Walton's favorite art, it scarcely ever refuses to give a favorable response.

This lake is also the natural supply for the water consumption of Canton City, though, on account of deficiencies of one kind and the other, the city has to depend to a considerable extent on the West Nimishillen Creek for its water supply, for fire protection and even for ordinary demands.

With the exception of swamp lands about Meyer's Lake and along the Nimishillen Creek, the lands of Canton Township are profitable for cultivation; the swamp lands will, one day or other, also be turned to good account; and, as this township is on the direct line of the wheat-growing section of the State, and its bottom lands are almost or quite equal to those of the Lower Muskingum, Scioto and Miami Valleys for the growth of Indian corn, it is fairly presumable that no other portion of Ohio has greater agricultural advantages; and, that these, with its mineral resources, render the township rich among the richest in the means of supporting comfortably a large population.

Though the western portion of the township is said to be on the line of the great storms from the Northwest, with a few exceptions, it has as yet escaped their fury; and the times they did come they were of very limited extent in width, and not nearly as destructive as in most other parts of the country subject to their direful visitations. The climate is generally good, and tends to long life and happiness; neither too excessively cold in winter nor too hot in summer; neither, on the average, too wet nor too dry.

The prevailing type in the population of the township is Pennsylvania German, noted for its industry, frugality and slow but steady progress. The Yankee spirit of radical progression has not been wanting; the versatile Frenchman, the sprightly Irishman and the solid German from Fatherland have all made their influence felt; and these have, with the prevailing Pennsylvanians, succeeded in giving a spirit of progressive conservatism which has made Canton Township people successful, prosperous and safe against all ordinary reverses in business. Her farmers are noted for solidity, intelligence, industry, thrift; her capital city for rapid growth, great and even world-renowned manufactures, and a citizenship which, for general safety in business and for public virtue, stands among the fairest in this or any other land.

The early pioneers in the settlement of Stark County commenced near the present site of the city of Canton. Previous to the year 1805, the land office for all this part of the country was at Steubenville, in Jefferson County, of which originally this county was a part. Connected with the land office was James F. Leonard. He seems to have been the first one who came into Canton Township with the purpose of remaining and making a permanent settlement. In March, 1805, in company with James and Henry Barber, he established a station just northeast of the present city, and near the county fair grounds, on the well known Reed farm. This farm has the reputation, therefore, of being the first settled in the township and in the county. Leonard and the Barber brothers took pains to induce other settlers to come here, and showed them lands suitable for location; and, when required, surveyed and measured them. Leonard, as a land surveyor, made frequent trips to Steubenville; and, on one of these trips, he induced one of his personal friends named James Culbertson, to come back with him. Soon after coming here, however, the latter was attacked with inflammation of the lungs, and died on the 5th of October, 1805, his being the first death among the white people in the county. Others from Pennsylvania and Maryland came during the fall of 1805, who located lands, and did some clearing; but returned to their Eastern homes before winter. Soon after the establishment of Leonard's Station, another was established by Butler Wells and Daniel McClure, who were also surveyors from Steubenville, upon lands located and owned by Bezaleel Wells, about two miles northwest of Canton, near what was then called the Large Spring, now well known as Meyer's Lake, so named from Andrew Meyers, who afterward owned a large body of land around it. Wells and McClure brought workmen with them to build upon the lands and to cultivate them, their effort being most likely the first one for a systematic occupancy and cultivation in the township. These stations of Leonard and Wells were chosen with good judgment and discrimination; the one being in the undulating forest region almost at the very entrance of the less rugged and hilly lands between the branches of the Nimishillen Creek, as compared with the lands east and south of Canton, which, though good lands for farming and rich in mineral resources, were not, at this early period, so well adapted to please the eyes of emigrants from the older settlements seeking a new location; the other, upon the plains west of the Nimishillen, offering a tempting bait to settlers desirous of finding land already cleared, and waiting for the farmer to come in, possess and bring out its rich resources. As a consequence of this foresight on their part, these stations soon became, at this early period, the points to which emigrants came in their search for new homes. The woodless lands of the prairie, however, did not, for a long time at first, receive from the early settlers the attention which, from their agricultural worth, they should have had. Most of them preferred the wooded lands northward from Canton, and hence, the early settlement of Plain

Township is almost coincident with that of Canton Township.

In July, 1806, Leonard united in marriage with a daughter of James Barber, one of his associates, which is worthy of special note as the first marriage in Stark County.

In the autumn of 1805, Leonard surveyed and platted the original Canton, and at the first sale of lots by public outcry, in 1806, he purchased the lot on the southwest corner of Seventh and Market streets, and erected thereon a brick building, so long and so well known as the Oberly corner, which stood a relic of the olden times until the year 1879, when it was torn away to give place for Sherrick & Miller's large and imposing hardware store and building. Later, he removed to Plain Township, thence to Jackson Township, afterward to Summit County, and finally to Cleveland, where he died at an advanced age. Meeting as he did, at that early period, all classes of persons, who had come West to look up new locations for themselves and families, he had many adventures, and in after years, took great pleasure in relating these and stories of the pioneer times. One of these may give a better insight into the then condition of things by being given here. A stranger from the East came to the station, during Leonard's absence on a trip to Steubenville, to register lands for various persons in the land office there, which he had measured for them. It was on a Saturday, in the spring of the year 1805; the Barber Brothers and Culbertson, who were in charge of the station, were engaged by the stranger to show him the lands as far from the station as it was safe to venture, on the following day, Sunday. The stranger had brought with him $338 in silver, in a heavy cloth sack, in which he also carried his provisions for the journey; for greater security, before starting out to look at land, he placed this in the trunk of a hollow tree, and carefully covered the opening with moss, so that it might not be discovered by any one during his absence. Returning to the station late on Sunday evening, he concluded to let it remain in the tree until the next morning. But what were his terror and astonishment when, on Monday morning, he could find no trace of sack, or money, or the very necessary, in those days, bread and meat. The man was inconsolable, and as there was an encampment of Indians in the neighborhood, he naturally charged the theft upon them. But as he could find no trace of his money, and an encounter with the Indians to justify his suspicions and recover it, was entirely out of the question, he went homeward with a heavy heart; $300 in those days was a large amount, and it was doubtless the man's whole fortune, the savings from many years of previous industry and economy. On the way back, he met Leonard and told him of his loss, and also of his suspicions against the Indians. Leonard consoled the man as best he could, and assured him of his own belief that wolves, and not the Indians, were the thieves, and that, probably, the money would be again recovered at some later day. Four months later, three men from Pennsylvania were looking over the land, about a half mile from the tree-trunk in which the money had been placed, to find a desirable location, when one of them picked up a piece of the ticking sack; this, of course, led the man who was conducting them to relate the story of the stranger's loss, whereupon all made diligent search, and found nearly all of the stolen treasure. Wolves, indeed, true to their instinct, and lured by the savory smell of cooked meat, had discovered the hiding-place, and carried off sack, bacon and money; but as they had no special need of the last, they left it lying around loose among the leaves of the forest.

Among those who selected and located land in Canton Township, in the year 1805, were David Bechtel, Jacob Aultman, the Baer family, Philip Schlosser (afterward written Slusser), and William Ewing. The original title conveying one-fourth of Section 11 to David Bechtel was signed by Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, and James Madison, Secretary of State, and is still in possession of the family. Bechtel came from Maryland to Columbiana County in 1803; in 1805, he located his land in Canton Township; and in the fall of 1806 he came back with a hired man, built himself a log cabin, cleared three acres of land, and sowed it with wheat. He then returned to Columbiana County, and, having taken unto himself a wife, the young married couple removed to their new home, in the spring of 1807; here he lived until his death, in the year 1833. David Bechtel was one of the first settlers in the township who turned his attention to the raising of fruit. His orchard was planted upon high ground, where it would be less liable to injury from frost, and while planting for the future, he lived long enough to enjoy the fruits of his labor. He was also a great hunter, and when away from home, he was always accompanied by his trusty rifle, even when attending a funeral. He also wore a large knife attached to a girdle by his side. One night his dogs treed three bears on one tree, near his cabin, and held them there till morning, when he shot them. On another occasion, he had a fight with a stag, which, but for his faithful knife, would probably soon have made an end of him. Thinking that, inasmuch as the animal fell immediately when he fired, he had killed him, Bechtel went up to him, and he lay apparently dead, not moving a limb, but when he had drawn his knife to cut off the stag's head, and had taken hold of the antlers to turn his head around, the deer very suddenly leaped to his feet, attacked his assailant, and with one prong of his antlers, nailed him to a tree by his left hand. In this dangerous position, Bechtel's own presence of mind, and great strength, proved his salvation; a less determined and plucky man would certainly have perished. With almost superhuman strength, he plunged the knife into the stag's breast, and the latter fell over dead in reality, thus releasing Bechtel from his imminent peril. The ball from Bechtel's rifle had only struck the skull of the stag, and rendered him temporarily insensible. Bechtel also followed trapping successfully, and gathered, from time to time, a very great number of Otter and other kinds of pelts along the Nimishillen Creek. On Bechtel's farm, there was an Indian burying-ground or mound. Many remains of arrows and stone arrow-heads, together with many other articles of use among the Indians, made of stone and iron, have been found there.

It has been said that a building, which stood upon this mound many years ago, was frequently visited by the ghosts of the Indians sleeping underneath, but, like other ghost stories, the report lacks authentic confirmation. Despoiled as these Indians often were, in those early days, of their lands and their homes, it would not be at all wonderful if departed spirits could at all return to earth, that theirs should return once in awhile to disturb the slumbers of the children of their despoilers. Bechtel was a good man in general, was a good neighbor, and was honored with the respect of the community in which he lived, having been elected for several successive terms to the responsible position of County Commissioner, in which place his acts gave general satisfaction; but he did not like the Indians who at that time were yet quite numerous in his neighborhood. One of these had the impudence to display a number of human tongues on a string, and to boast, Indian fashion, that they were the tongues of white men whom he had killed with his own hand. Boasting thus on one occasion in the presence of Bechtel and others, the Indian and he left the company at the same time, and the Indian was never seen afterward. The supposition generally was that Bechtel had used his opportunity and assisted his red-skin brother home to the happy hunting-grounds of his fathers. However it may have been, Bechtel kept his own counsel well, and posterity are left to conjecture the truth as best they may. Politically, Mr. Bechtel belonged the old Jeffersonian school.

Philip Slusser came from Cumberland County, Penn., to Beaver County in the year 1804. The next spring he came to Stark County, chose a quarter-section of land directly east of Canton, and had the same entered in the land office at Steubenville. He then returned to Pennsylvania, and in the autumn of 1805, leaving his wife and younger children in the old home, he came back with his three sons, Philip, Peter and John, and his daughter Elizabeth, to take charge of the housekeeping branch of the business, together with eight or ten laborers. He erected the first mill in the county for grinding wheat and other grains. This mill, so long and so favorably known as the Roland Mill, has played a by no means unimportant part in the early settlement of Canton and the township. Previous to its establishment, the settlers were obliged to go thirty or forty miles away to the older settlements for their flour, and not at all unfrequently it required a number of days to get it ground, to say nothing of the long and wearisome journeys to mill and back home again. It must be remembered that in those days our pioneer settlers did not have the benefit of well-established and worked roads; the greater part of the country between them and the older settlements was an unbroken wilderness, and the roads were often mere paths through the woods. Some, accordingly, were obliged to live almost entirely upon wild game and fish, or used hand-mills and depended largely upon hominy for their grain supply. Others took a piece of iron plate, perforated it, and ground their corn, or rather, we should say, crushed it through the perforations by rubbing it on the rough side of the iron plate. Necessity is said to be the mother of invention, and the necessities of the fathers in the then Western wilds of our country led them to adopt many different ways to provide for themselves and their families. Soon after the establishment of the Slusser Mill, another one, a small log house upon four stone pillars, was erected a few miles northwest of Canton, on the West Branch of the Nimishillen, where the well-known Trump's mill now stands, for grinding Indian corn. Two rough stones were used, but according to tradition, the corn meal turned out from this mill was so coarse and full of sand that it was not even fit for making the once famous Johnny cake, the favorite morsel in those days upon many a pioneer's table. It need hardly be added that the miller, in that mill, received, on this account, the hearty benedictions of the girls and women of the period, such as only such girls and women knew how to give them. A saw-mill was added to this mill a little later, but was carried away by a flood the same year it was built; a consequence, presumably, of the bad corn meal made there. Slusser's mill seems to have done good work from the beginning of its establishment, and naturally drew custom, not only from Canton but also from Plain Township north. Among other reminiscences connected with the mill is the following: On one occasion, Elizabeth Harter, a fifteen-year-old daughter of George Harter, of Plain Township, was sent to mill with five and one-half bushels of wheat, three bushels in one bag and the remainder in another. She carried the lighter bag upon one horse which she rode, and the other upon one which she led; she was detained at the mill until late in the afternoon, when she started home with her flour. There was no road except a path through the dense woods for a part of the way, and as it was rapidly becoming dark she pushed her horses forward, as soon as she left Canton behind, so as to reach home in good time. But the path soon became more and more indistinct, and she finally deviated from it somewhat, when the overhanging boughs of the trees swept the bag of flour off from the horse she was leading.

Here was a new difficulty, and she was about at her wits' ends; but the girls of that time did not readily yield to trifles, and Elizabeth dismounted and used her best endeavors to put the sack back to its place; she did succeed in getting it upon her shoulder, but her strength was not great enough to throw it over the horse; she worried herself with it, however, a long time, and was about giving up in despair, with the thought of going back to Canton until morning, as she had yet several miles home, when an old settler, Frederick Rodacker, happened to come along, and threw the sack upon the horse. As by this time it had become quite dark, he advised her to go with him home, and she did so. But her mother was naturally very much alarmed at her daughter's long absence, and, thinking that Elizabeth had lost her way in the woods, she blew a horn for more than half the night, so that her daughter might discern the way to the house. Early the next morning, after having been hospitably entertained by Mr. Rodacker, she returned home with her flour, to the great joy of the entire family. It was of such material that our early settlers were made; they could go out with their husbands and fathers, and help them clear the land and roll the logs together for burning, satisfied with a cold lunch for dinner, from morning until night. Elizabeth Harter afterward became Mrs. Baer, and still later, Mrs. Grubb, and is still living in a green old age. She is active beyond her years, and has a good memory of those early times. Few, if any, of the girls of this day would venture or could accomplish what she has done.

Philip Slusser was born in the Upper Rhine country of Germany, and was a man of decided, upright character. He was one of the first Commissioners of this county, and was held in high esteem by all who knew him. He died in the year 1828. His sons, Philip and Peter, removed later to Tuscarawas Township, while his third son, John, carried on a saw-mill, commenced as early as 1807, for many years. John Slusser was the father of our respected fellow-citizen and highly successful physician, Dr. Lewis Slusser, who has represented the county in the General Assembly of the State, and, in later years, was Superintendent of the Newburg Asylum for the Insane near Cleveland. In connection with his business in the saw-mill, John Slusser soon became apt in the use of tools, and, as then there was no cabinet-maker in the county, he was often called upon to furnish bedsteads, cradles, cupboards and other articles of household furniture, until he found it necessary, finally, to make this his regular business, which he continued on East Tuscarawas street, east of Walnut, until he retired from active business. He died in the year 1859. Concerning a great flood on the East Creek, such as has not since occurred, he has given us the following account: "In June, 1807, it thundered and rained without intermission for two days and two nights, and the Nimishillen raised rapidly and overflowed its banks. The log house of my father stood between the creek and the mill-dam, and had about four feet of water on the first floor. It was just as high on the west side of the creek. Everything in the house was taken up to the garret of the house, excepting a barrel of whisky (an article generally used and considered necessary in those days), and one or two other heavy articles that could not be removed. It was considered unsafe for several days to attempt crossing the stream. After it had fallen a few feet, a man by the name of Brown came from one of the settlements east of us on his way to Canton to purchase some tools. He was acquainted with some of the mill-hands and wanted to be taken over the swollen creek. Mr. Fischel and his son took him safely over, but when, about sundown, they were trying to return, they were carried away by the force of the stream, ran against the trunk of a tree and were thrown into the water. John Fischel swam to the eastern shore; his father was carried by the force of the stream to the western shore, and Brown was drowned. His corpse was found a few days afterward about fifty rods from the place. The mill-hands buried him upon a high bank of the creek about one hundred rods from the mill. Brown was known to be a good swimmer, and it is thought that he was thrown against the trunk of a tree, or was in some way rendered powerless, when otherwise he could readily and easily have saved himself. He was the second person buried in Stark County.

In those days, wolves and bears were plenty all over this country, and ready for any prey that offered itself to their clutches. It was no uncommon event for the old settlers to be awakened out of their sleep at night by the cries of distress coming from one or the other of their domestic animals. The ready gun was at all such times called into requisition, and did good service both by ridding the settlements of one or more of the undesirable intruders, and by serving notice upon others to keep their distance. The present generation can scarcely appreciate the annoyances which for years accompanied the efforts of the old pioneers to open up this new country to civilization and progress, where now, in less than three quarters of a century, peace and plenty prevail, and luxury even crowns the frequent, festive board. But most of the annoyances of those days, outside of those necessarily incident to all pioneer life, came from the four-footed inhabitants of these Western wilds. The Indians of the neighborhood were peacefully disposed toward their "white brothers," by whom they had been generally treated in a fair, kind and friendly manner. These Indians belonged to the Delaware and Chippewa tribes, and had their chief encampment hereabouts, at the junction of the two branches of the Nimishillen Creek, south of Canton. They would often visit the new settlers, to the number of 200 or 300 at a time, and were generally well behaved, except occasionally, when under the influence of the white man's fire-water, some of the more belligerent of the tribe would get into quarrels, sometimes with the whites and sometimes among themselves; but very few adventures of a serious character are related to have occurred in this, as in many other parts of the country. How much of this was the result of the strong Pennsylvania type of the early settlers, it is not possible, of course, at this day, accurately to determine; though it probably was not without its influence. Among the few well-authenticated adventures of the early period is one of Dr. Cunningham's, with the Indians. Dr. Cunningham was an Irishman, and managed in some way to give serious and deadly offense to the Indians, by whom he was, in turn, watched and followed up with great bitterness. Though peacefully inclined, vengeance upon an enemy and revenge for an injury done them were, here as elsewhere, an essential part of an Indian's make-up. The white man, fearing for his life, fled westward as far as Mansfield, but finding himself hotly pursued by his relentless enemies, and fearing that sooner or later he might fall alive into their hands, he ended the chase by putting a musket ball through his own head. It is also stated that, at a later period, after Hull's surrender, during the last war with Great Britain, most of the men from these parts were paroled, and returned immediately to their homes. When a squad of them came to Canton, it so happened that a number of friendly Indians were in town trading. At this time, when the passions of the citizen-soldiery of the Western country were especially bitter against the Indians for the part the hostile tribes, under the influence of British emissaries, had been playing in the war, the sight of even friendly ones was sufficient to excite a desire and a determination to attack, and, if possible, destroy them, but the more considerate white residents of the town restrained the desire of the soldiers, until the Indians, getting an intimation of the brewing storm, wisely concluded to get out of the way for a season. Had it not been for the red man's considerate action, it would be hard to imagine the direful results of a rash attack upon them, either at the time or in after years. They did not venture back again until after the close of the war, when most of the bitterness against them had subsided. In later years, as the white population increased, the Indians who remained occupied mostly a semi-mendicant position, and could often be seen on the streets picking up six-penny pieces for a show of their skill at shooting with the bow and arrow. On these occasions they were frequently accompanied by their squaws, exposing beadwork and baskets for sale, in the making of which article, the Indian women were justly celebrated; but contrasted with the mendicant organ-grinder of this more enlightened age, the uncouth son of the forest exhibiting his skill in archery to make money does not stand out in the worst light either. But the Indian and his manner of life have long since departed, and his memory only lives among the traditions of a few of the oldest inhabitants.

Canton Township has been rapidly developing her resources, and already supports a large population; but her capacity in this direction is far from being exhausted. Indeed, she has not yet commenced to approximate even the limit of her powers. The days of large farms and much unremunerative labor, or, to say the least, not adequately remunerative farming, are beginning to wane. The tendency to hold fewer acres, and to farm them more scientifically, and, therefore, more thoroughly, grows apace; and what, with her natural advantages and commercial relations to Canton City, she will be yet able to accomplish, is hardly a matter of conjecture any longer. Her history, however, is so interwoven with that of the city, cotemporary with the township, that we must reserve for the former much of what is to be said of her history as equally the property of both.

In addition to Canton, the township includes the village of North Industry, on the west bank of the Nimishillen, near the southern line of the township, a flourishing little village, in the immediate vicinity of which is Browning's mill, doing a thriving business, under the management of Mr. O. F. Browning, a resident of Canton. In the township, outside of the city, there are also Trump's Mill, on the site of the second oldest mill in the county, northwest of Canton, and the Stark Mill, about one and a half miles south of the city, both of which do an extensive milling business, together with the East Canton Mill, on the site of the old Slusser Mill, to which extensive reference has been made above in this chapter.

Before closing, it will well subserve the purpose of history to refer to more personal reminiscences than have been given above of some parties already mentioned, and of some others, among the early settlers of this township. Among these, we take first the death of James Culbertson. He was born in Franklin County, Penn., of wealthy parents, who gave him a liberal education. He married a lady of considerable property, and commenced life under very favorable circumstances. At or about the close of the Revolutionary war, he united as a young man with a body of horse-troops, at that time so popular, and in this connection contracted a habit of hard drinking, which eventually led to financial embarrassment and domestic infelicity. He, therefore, left his family and friends, in the hope of retrieving his waning prospects in the West. As before said, he came in company with Leonard, from Steubenville, in the year 1805, to the station of the latter on the old Reed farm. In the autumn of the same year, he went on a visit to an Indian trader, located at the mouth of Sandy. According to the prevailing hospitality of the times, he indulged very freely in the use of whisky, and being obliged to lie out of night, in a country beset with heavy fogs, he contracted a severe cold, from which inflammation of the lungs ensued soon after his return to Leonard's Station. There was no physician nearer than Steubenville, but his comrades, thrown upon their own resources, did the best they could for the unfortunate sufferer, but in vain, for he died four days after, during the last week of October, 1805, and was buried, without coffin or ceremony, by his associates, Henry Friday, Hugh Cunningham, James F. Leonard, and the latter's brother, in a beautiful grove near the station. The grave is unmarked by stone or marble slab, but is within pistol shot of the present county fair grounds.

Nearly fifty years ago, a man by the name of Christian Bachtel lived near North Industry, in the southern part of the township, and was, likewise, addicted to habits of dissipation. He frequently came home under the influence of liquor, and, consequently, there were frequent family broils. His wife, an industrious and economical woman, was compelled, by her husband's excesses, to do the best she could to support herself and children. One night, after his wife had retired for the night, he came home maddened with liquor. Words naturally ensued, but, at last, she turned away from him, and was apparently asleep. He then struck her with an ax-helve, fracturing her skull, and, upon her moaning, gave her a second stroke, to make sure of her death. He took up the youngest child, sleeping by the mother's side, and placed it in a bed with the other children. With a few articles of clothing, his wife's earnings, and a flask of whisky, he went from his home a fugitive, to wander he knew not whither. Self-accused of the horrible crime which he had committed, his only support in his dire extremity, the whisky-flask, he was overtaken in two or three days near Wooster, within thirty miles of the scene of the tragedy, arrested, and brought back, without resistance, to jail at Canton. His trial occurred a few months later. In the trial, the State was represented by Starkweather & Jarvis; the prisoner by Harris & Metcalf. The defense set up for the doomed man was his own insanity and the infidelity of his wife. He was, nevertheless, convicted of murder in the first degree. Judge Lane presided over the court, and sentenced Bachtel to be hung on Friday, November 22, 1833, a sentence that was punctually executed.

To the credit of this township and county, it might be added that this was the first and last execution of a murderer from 1833 to 1880, when three young men, boys almost, for crimes committed in the east and west ends of the county respectively, paid the penalty of murder by hanging within the confines of our present city prison. Now, as then, there was a great crowd, and some military, upon precautionary considerations generally approved by our thinking people, but no parade, and no publicity in the execution. It is claimed that 40,000 people attended the execution of Bachtel; half that number would probably be nearer the correct figure.

Meyer's Lake, from the earliest settlement of the township, has always been a favorite resort for sportsmen, fishermen and pleasure-seekers. But with all the boating and bathing done here for more than seventy years, there has been but one case of drowning. Robert Stewart undertook, in the year 1816, to swim across the lake for the purpose of getting a boat. On account of the many springs with which the lake abounds, some of them very powerful ones, the water, even in midsummer, near the middle of the lake, is fresh and chilly. Stewart was reputed to be a good swimmer, but becoming benumbed or being overtaken with cramps, he was drowned in his attempt. A cannon from Canton was brought into speedy requisition, and fired over the water in the hope of raising the body, but without result. A few days after, however, the body was found, and was buried on the point which, from this circumstance, has ever since been known as Dead Man's Point. The lake is now known exclusively by the name of Meyer's Lake, and derives this name from Andrew Meyer, who, in the year 1816, came into Canton Township, and purchased, in 1818, 3,000 acres of land, including the lake and the lands about it, from Bazaleel Wells. Being a man of energy, of means and of good business habits, he kept about him a number of worthy and reliable laborers to develop the rich resources of the vast tract of land which by this purchase came into his possession, and, without ever having held any public position, he exerted a large influence in the early settlement of the township and of the city of Canton. Andrew Meyer was born in Bonn, Prussia, in the year 1762. He served nine years as a soldier in the allied armies of Europe against Napoleon, in the latter part of the last century, but, in 1802, he emigrated to America, and settled in Baltimore City, Md. Here he pursued the business of a brass founder a number of years, and being successful in business, he soon became sole owner of two vessels engaged in the ocean trade, and, at the same time, part owner in several others. He served personally in the war with England in 1812, as a volunteer, giving the faithful services of an old soldier against the enemies of his adopted country. He took an active part in the battles of Baltimore and Bladensburg, against Lord Ross, the British commander. In that war, it will be remembered, Great Britain was fighting to secure a mastery of the sea and the right of impressing American seamen of British birth into her service wherever found. Our Government found it necessary to adopt measures that would have a tendency to render British commerce insecure, and, as her navy (which, however, did most brilliant service during the war), was entirely inadequate for the purpose, the Government accepted, and authorized to engage in the service of the United States against Great Britain, a number of vessels belonging to private parties, and hence these ships took the name of privateers. Two such vessels—the "Joseph" and the "Mary"—were armed and equipped at his own expense by the subject of this sketch, put into the Government service, and they did a good share in the business of privateering. Several of the ships, also, in which Mr. Meyer was only a part owner, were in the same service, and all met with good success except one, which, attempting to run the blockade of Baltimore by night, came unfortunately right up by the side of a British frigate, and, by a broadside from the latter, was so riddled that the crew were forced to take to the boats, when in a few minutes the privateer sunk, and the vessel, with a rich cargo contributed by British merchantmen, went to the bottom a total loss. The crew escaped and made a safe landing, without the loss of a man. Andrew Meyer was the father of three sons and two daughters. After his death in 1849, his vast property was divided among these children, and, as it was entailed property to the deceased's grandchildren, nearly the whole of it is yet in the possession of his heirs, most of them to-day useful and honored members of society among us. Mr. Meyer's age was beyond the ordinary period allotted to human life when he died in 1849, at the age of eighty-seven years. In him, as in many others of the older settlers of Stark County, the destinies of two centuries and of two continents were closely united. The first building for the accommodation of the public at Meyer's Lake was erected by Meyer & Cross in 1866, and served its purpose well until the increasing demands of the place as a popular resort induced the present owner, our esteemed fellow citizen, Mr. Joseph A. Meyer, a grandson of Andrew Meyer, to build during the winter of 1879-80, the new "Lake Park Hotel," on the north bluff-bank of the lake. The building is two stories high, and is well adapted to accommodate a large number of guests, with all the comforts at hand to make their stay at this pleasant place agreeable and beneficial. A twelve-foot veranda extends on both floors entirely around the building, and it is surmounted with a tower in the center of the front, eighty feet high. The whole is neat, and indicates good taste on the part of the projectors. The architecture is a combination of the Gothic and Swiss styles, and does credit to the ability of Mr. F. O. Weary, architect, by whom the design was furnished. The construction of the building was under the care of Mr. D. C. Miller. With the increased accommodations both for invalids and pleasure-seekers now furnished, the popularity of Meyer's Lake as a place of public resort, is constantly increasing. By care on the part of the proprietors, and the observance of strict rules of propriety and order on the part of visitors, there is no good reason why the "Lake Park Hotel" may not be as popular a place of resort as many of the older watering-places of the East. The first boat-house at the lake was erected by the Eclipse Boat Club, of Canton, in 1873. This club held their first regular regatta August 12, 1876, and have held one each year since. They have been well sustained, and are becoming each year more and more popular with the staid citizens of the solid old Pennsylvania Dutch city of Canton and the surrounding towns.

Readers of Russian history and adventure

have often been regaled by highly vivid and exciting stories of the attacks and pursuit of travelers by wolves. We doubt if anything more trying ever occurred there than was experienced here among the earlier settlers in Ohio. As a sample of these, a friend furnishes us the following authentic scrap of our early history: In 1802, Messrs. Slingluff and Deardorff, in their Western trip, arrived at a point near Canton, on their way to Tuscarawas County, and encamped on the banks of Meyer's Lake. They were weary and much exhausted from the want of rest and sustaining food. But with all their fatigue and suffering, they were charmed and refreshed by the prospect presented before and all about them. The lake lay immediately before them, and on its rippling surface, fanned by the gentle breezes of the evening, the rays of the setting sun were reflected in a thousand forms of beauty and splendor. The banks were decked with flowers of different colors and of the fairest hues, while evergreens of the deepest green, enlivened the scene. Wild fowl, in countless numbers, were sailing gayly over the water, or feeding along the banks. Their bright plumage and graceful movements gave a sense of peace and security to our weary travelers, and they went on cheerfully, and with the prospect of quiet slumbers and an undisturbed rest before them, to prepare their frugal meal and an encampment for the night. It was a beautiful picture, guaranteeing secure repose, and the travelers laid themselves down confidently to sleep, and to dream of home or the great work to be wrought out by their hands in these Western wilds in the near future. They did sleep a little while, but, suddenly awakening, they heard the dismal howls of scores of barking wolves about their camp. The glaring, fiery eyes of the fierce, bloodthirsty animals, seemed pressing toward them from all directions. There was no safety but in precipitate flight. Their horses, fortunately, as weary but now excited as their riders, were near at hand, and were quickly saddled and mounted. It was several miles to the cabin of the nearest pioneer settler, and it soon became a race for life. For a short distance, they rode along the lake, the wolves falling back before them, then, suddenly turning their horses, they rode rapidly in an opposite direction, both horses and riders, by this time, fully alive to the horrors of the situation. The wolves, for a few minutes foiled, became even more furious than before, and soon followed on their track, in constantly increasing numbers, until, in the rapidity and excitement of the chase, their hot breath could almost be felt, as it came from the hungry, furious throats of the now maddened animals. Soon they reached an opening in the woods; the light from the log fires of the pioneer settler was seen in the distance. Ten minutes more, and they would be saved from every danger for the night. Suddenly, a huge, black wolf sprang at the flank of Deardorff's horse, and was only compelled to relinquish his hold by the free application of Deardorff's heavy whip, but at the very moment of deliverance, his horse stumbled, fell, and threw him over his head in the very midst of the excited animals. But for his companion, Slingluff, he would, with his horse, have been torn in pieces and devoured within a very few minutes. Seeing the situation, and appreciating the danger of his friend and companion, Slingluff, with remarkable presence of mind, quickly wheeled his horse round, and commenced uttering a series of yells and screeches, even more unearthly than those of the infuriated beasts themselves; they were momentarily checked in the very moment of their triumph. Deardorff, in the meantime, quickly remounted, and before the wolves recovered from their astonishment and confusion from Slingluff's ruse, both reached the settler's clearing, and were safe.

In these earlier days the schoolmaster was also abroad to help in the opening-up of both the material and the intellectual capabilities of this then frontier country. The first schoolhouse in Stark County was erected in the year 1807, on the Aultman place, Section 12, of Canton Township. The schoolhouse was made of round logs, and was seven feet high, with a clapboard roof and puncheon floor. As a substitute for windows, small square holes were cut out in the logs, small sticks were set in, and the holes were then covered with greased paper. Logs with feet set in and covered with boards, were the writing desks, and slabs from the saw-mill of Mr. Slusser, with legs attached, furnished the seats of this and many other primitive schoolhouses. John Harris, who afterward attained considerable celebrity as a lawyer in Canton, was the first teacher. The school books then used were Dilworth's Speller, the Old and New Testament of the Bible as readers, and Gough's Arithmetic, with its money calculations all in the old English currency of pounds, shillings and pence. Geography and grammar were not then taught, nor indeed for many years after. Some descendants of the early pioneers are yet occasionally found, so conservative are the people in this locality, who doubt the expediency or the necessity of these studies in our public schools. We are glad, however, to say, that their number is very small. Christopher Bair succeeded Harris as teacher in this school. In the early days, as before and since in Pennsylvania, the "barring" out of teachers was very common here in Ohio. On public days, such as Christmas and New Year's, pupils in schools deemed it the duty of the teacher not only to give them a holiday but also to treat the crowd. In the primitive days a treat of this kind meant whisky for the larger boys and something pleasing for the smaller children, and the few girls who had time to go to school. As a rule, teachers demurred to the demand and a struggle between teacher and pupils was generally the result; the "barring" process was the usual tactics of the pupils to bring the teacher to terms, when it became a contest partly of physical endurance and partly of tact and skill on the part of the teacher in outwitting his pupils. The parents, having themselves in their younger days been participants in similar contests, either sided with the youngsters or approvingly winked at their doings; and many teachers of the times were rather anxious to invite the struggle. One of these, in connection with this first school in Canton Township, is on record, and its relation here may be not without interest, even though there is not much instruction in it. John Criswell, a tall, raw-boned man, who prided himself greatly on his disciplinary powers in governing a school, was teacher a few years after Bair. The day before Christmas the larger boys determined that they must have a treat and that the master should furnish the liquor. According to previous arrangement operations were delayed until noon, when, according to his usual custom, it was known that the teacher would be away for awhile; the younger children were sent home, and then commenced the operation of barring out. Among the boys prominent—some of them still living—were the Reams, Aultmans, Latimers, Bairs

Shericks and Trumps. When the teacher returned he found the door effectually "barred." The openings in the logs for windows would not admit the body of any ordinary man, and when Criswell found the doors closed against him he at once became angry and excited. He, of course, demanded, in a peremptory tone, the opening of the door. When told that the conditions of surrender were a bottle of whisky and a dismissal of the school for the next day, he refused at once and threatened dire vengeance upon the heads (or backs) of the perpetrators. His threats did not amount to much, and when he attempted to get in by tearing off the clapboards of the roof, the boys so pounded his fingers that he was glad to desist; when he tried to come down the chimney they smoked him back; and he was at his wits' end. Necessity is said, however, to be the mother of invention, and Criswell improvising a battering-ram from a heavy fence rail, succeeded at last in breaking in the door and became himself master of the situation. He did not act generously under the circumstances and could only be placated by a severe bodily chastisement of the offenders. The boys got it, but they never forgave the teacher; many of them no longer attended school, and the teacher soon lost his influence for good in that locality.

William Ewing was one of the pioneer settlers already mentioned. Coming from Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, he erected a cabin in Section 2 of Canton Township, in the fall of 1805, and in the spring of 1806, came with his wife and five children to occupy it. His goods and some articles of furniture, purchased at Beaver, were brought to his new home on horseback. For several years, in the beginning, it was difficult for him, as for many others of the older settlers, to raise money enough to pay taxes and meet the urgent necessities of their families. People then had often to deprive themselves of what now would be considered absolute necessities, and were to a great extent thrown upon their own resources. Ewing has the credit of being one of the most successful hunters, perhaps absolutely the most successful, that ever lived in the township or county. He killed, on an average, from seventy to eighty deer during the season, in addition to many bears, wolves and wild-cats. This, also, he made a source of revenue. When he had more meat than the needs of his own family required, he sold to needy emigrants, while he tanned the skins for clothing and moccasins for himself and his family. He and his boys wore buckskin clothes and shoes for many years, and until sheep could be successfully raised, which, on account of the wolves, was at first impossible. But these were the fashions of the day. The women wore "linsey," and were not much concerned with spring and fall changes of fashion.

In June, 1811, an eclipse of the sun occurred. The settlers at this period were almost entirely cut off from intercourse with the East, and had had no word of the coming phenomenon. Ewing and his sons were out hoeing corn at the time. It became so dark that the stars were visible in the heavens, and, what was even more remarkable, the chickens went home to roost. Mr. Sowers, afterward Judge Sowers, of Canton, with others, was engaged in shingling a roof on the Kauffman House, corner of Ninth and Market streets, Canton. Every person looked for the immediate coming of the day of judgment, but were much relieved when the eclipse was over, that the sun occupied his old place in the heavens, and that nothing terrible had occurred.

Speaking of the habits of these earlier days, we know of no better way of closing this chapter than by giving here the statement of one of the old settlers himself: "Times ain't as they used to be," he remarked to a friend of fewer years, while sitting together on a store box in front of one of our stores only a few years ago. It was between sundown and dark; the weather was pleasant and the pavement crowded with ladies and gentlemen promenading. Evidently the remark was made by the suggestion of what the old gentleman saw transpiring before him; the younger man feeling some interest in the matter and desirous of drawing his old friend out in the way of a more modern "interview," asked, "How was it in earlier times?" "Quite different. Fifty years ago, Canton had a population of 400 or 500. I suppose there was as much pride then as now, and young people were just as anxious to make a fine appearance; but the fashions were somewhat different and were not changed so often. Calico was then the prevailing material for ladies fine dresses, such as were worn in making calls, attending religious meetings or evening parties. The more elderly wore bombazet or bombazine.

Six yards were amply sufficient for a pattern. An article called homespun wool, of cotton and wool, was usually worn about the house, when engaged in ordinary domestic duties. The bonnets were straw or leghorn, with large crowns and extensive fronts. The style worn by the older women was not much unlike those worn by the Quakers. It was made of black or dark colored silk, with a large crown and points in front. The calash, made of berage and to fold back like a buggy top, was the rage for a long time. There were no milliners in town at that time, but there were those who were handy with the needle, ingenious and tasty, who did the work for those who could not do it themselves. High-top combs were fashionable and the hair was worn in puffs. Little or no jewelry was worn; a ring or a breast pin was coveted by many, but owned by few.

"Fashionable young men wore tight-bodied swallow-tailed coats, with large high collars, buff or white vests, stockinet pants, high-top boots, wrinkled or fair, with a tassel in front, high shirt collars reaching to the ears, and a few wore ruffles. Gold watches were 'few and far between,' but a 'bull's eye,' with a metallic fob chain, seal and key was usually sported. The fashions didn't change then as often as they do now. The same bonnet or hat was worn for years. Men wore their hats eight or ten years, and yet, not half worn out, would barter them to the hatter in part pay for a new one of later style. The same bonnet was worn as long, the trimming perhaps changed every two or three years. There were social parties in those days, but there was some regard paid to proper hours for meeting and dispersing. The company assembled at early candle-lighting and went home at reasonable bedtime, and had no ice cream or oyster suppers or lager. The extent of our indulgence was in small beer and gingerbread. The mode of conveyance was mostly on horseback. Every young man aspired to have his own horse, and they were good horsemen in those days. Part of every lady's outfit was a side-saddle. There were but few vehicles and they were rude compared with those of the present day. Buggies were unknown; what was called a 'dearborn'—a body adjusted upon wooden springs—was all I remember seeing, except Dr. Hartford's gig which he brought from the East. There were other characteristics of that day—some that it would be well for our people yet to practice, I could tell you, but the court house clock has struck 9 and it is time to be in bed, so good night."

Our old friend's history of the olden fashions and modes of life was intended more to apply to the people of the town of Canton of sixty years ago, than to the people of the country; but with but little change it may be applied to the latter also. Those were the days of log-rollings for the men, and merry spinning-wheels for the girls and women; of hard work during the day, an early going to bed at night, and sound, refreshing slumbers until the early hours of new morning called to renewal of work. A simpler and more natural life than that led by most people of the present day; fewer indulgences in eating and drinking, and greater freedom from the aches and pains and sufferings which indulgence causes.

CHAPTER IX.*

THE CITY OF CANTON—ITS FIRST SALE OF LOTS—ORIGINAL BOUNDARIES—THE LAND OFFICE—EARLY INDUSTRIES—FARMERS' BANK—TEMPERANCE REFORM—PIONEER SPORTS—FIRST POST OFFICE—OBERLY CORNER.

PREVIOUS to the year 1805, Bezaleel Wells, of Steubenville, who was descended from the Quakers, and was a man of means and with a speculative turn of mind, entered in the land office at that place, a number of sections of land west of the Nimishillen Creek, including the portion now embraced within the limits of the city of Canton, and extending beyond and including Meyer's Lake, for many years called Wells' Lake. In 1805, as he anticipated the speedy organization of a new county, with an eye to speculation he determined to lay out a town on part of his purchase, and make a contest to secure for it recognition as the new county seat. There were already two contestants in the field, a paper town named Nimishillen town, not far from the present Louisville, in Nimishillen Township, which, for want of lot purchasers and buildings, never came to anything, and the already projected town of Osna-burg, five miles east of Canton, which, platted and entered a few months earlier than Canton, already contained several houses. West of the Nimishillen were, at that time, the plains or barrens, destitute alike of timber and stone suitable for building. These disadvantages resulted in the choice of the site between the two branches of the Nimishillen, in preference to a location a little further west, which presented somewhat superior advantages in some respects. The town was surveyed and platted by James

F. Leonard, and the plat was regularly recorded in Columbiana County, in the Clerk's office at New Lisbon. At this time, this was a part of Columbiana County. A few lots were disposed of at private sale in the fall of 1805, and a few cabins were erected. In the spring of 1806, a public sale of lots occurred. That a crowd might be brought together at this sale, a horse race, to come off the same day at Canton, was extensively advertised, and the result was that many people from Steubenville, New Lisbon and Beaver were present, more interested, however, it seems, in the races than in the sale of lots. Some lots were sold, but at a merely nominal price. But a good beginning had been made. The original plat had the boundaries of the streets at this time known as North street, Saxton street (formerly East), South street and Wells street (formerly West). At the sale of lots above mentioned, Leonard bought the lot on the corner of Market and Seventh streets for a trifle, with the understanding that he would immediately build a brick house upon it, with a view of inducing others to come in and help build up the new town. The house was built by Leonard, according to contract, and stood until the year 1879, and is yet well remembered by most of those residing in Canton as the old "Oberly Corner," where Sherrick & Miller's large and imposing hardware store at present stands. The first settler in Canton was Garret Crusen, who started a tavern on North Market street, between Fourth and Fifth streets. His house was a log cabin, with one room about eighteen feet square, which served amply all the purposes of the day, as bar, dining and sitting-room, and kitchen; two small shed additions furnished comfortable sleeping apartments for the family and guests, and a storeroom for general purposes. John Matthews, a butcher, had a cabin on South Market street, where Dumont's grocery now is, with a pen at the rear of the lot used as a slaughter-house. John Bower, a blacksmith, built a cabin and blacksmith-shop on part of the lot now occupied by the court house, and on this lot the first well in town was dug. Bower did not find his trade sufficient to meet the demand for the support of his family, and he, too, went to keeping tavern. Having exposed himself a great deal at night in fishing, he soon after took sick and died. The families of the parties just named were the only ones in Canton in the year 1806. Several other cabins were erected, but were not occupied until later. Mrs. Matthews died in the spring of 1808, of child-bed fever; hers was the first death in the town, and her child the first one born in Canton. Up to the year 1807, there was no regularly-established road eastward, and, west of the Tuscarawas River, the country was yet all a wilderness, and the sons of the forest held undisputed sway. But in this year a road was laid out between New Lisbon and Canton, afterward, with some alterations, between Osanaburg and Canton, known as the State road. Being a more direct route, and affording a better accommodation to travelers, it soon became the favorite road for those seeking homes in the Far West, as Canton was then called, or coming here to speculate in lands. On this road were two noted places—noted for directly opposite reasons—viz.: "Hahn's Bottom," dreaded because it was a very difficult matter to get over it with a heavy load, and "Shull's Tavern," a place of good cheer to every weary traveler when once it was reached, as every one on the road tried to do, who needed a stopping-place overnight. By means of this new road, Canton was brought into closer connection with the eastern counties and States; parties who had been out prospecting gave flattering accounts of the prospects of the new town, and the result was that a number of persons came here during the summer and fall of 1807, with a view to settlement in or near Canton, or for business. Among those who came for business were Philip Kroft, with a stock of goods from Pittsburgh; Hugh Cunningham, in the tinning business, with which he associated the selling of whisky to the Indians, contrary to law, on the corner of Market and Fifth streets; John Shorb, with a stock of goods from Baltimore, consisting mainly of tobacco, tea, hardware implements, leather, some drugs, a small supply of cotton goods, such as "cross-bar" gingham and a few pieces of calico, in one corner of Leonard's new building, and George Kirkpatrick, who had a blacksmith-shop on the east end of the court house lot. Col. Thomas Gibson, John Nichols, Christian Palmer and John Harris were also about this time identified with the interests of the town. Still other parties made investments, but went East again in the fall, with the intention of returning with their families early during the following year. Philip Kroft's building had but two rooms, the front one occupied by his family and the rear one containing his stock of goods; as there was only one outside door, customers had to pass through the family room into the store. Hugh Cunningham incurred the displeasure of the Indians, and shot himself for fear of falling into their hands. An account of his tragic fate has been given in the preceding chapter. John Shorb also brought his family, consisting of his wife and three children, with him, from Baltimore to Canton. He was a much-honored and highly respectable man; many of his descendants are still residents of Canton and the vicinity; others are scattered about in different parts of the country. We shall have more to say of Mr. Shorb later in this history of Canton. The winter of 1807-8 was a dreary one for the few residents of the town; there were no mails, no newspapers, and but very few books; habits of living were changed and many comforts and even necessities, which they had in plenty in the old homes, were scarce or entirely wanting; the bleak winds from the plains beyond the creek, with not a tree to break their force, came with their fury, penetrating houses and even clothing, and chilling to the blood; and the only break to the almost unbearable monotony was furnished by the coming together occasionally of the older settlers from the townships round about, and the relation of adventures in hunting or in dealing with the Indians.

The men, in this way, managed to get through the winter with tolerable composure, but, according to all accounts, the women, who were to a great extent debarred the comforts of any and every alleviation of their hard condition, became inconsolable and begged their husbands to return at once to their former homes. But the winter passed, and, with the coming of spring, many new arrivals soon cheered up the spirits of the most despondent. Of those who settled in Canton in 1808 and took an active interest in the prosperity of the town, we have the names of George Stidger, Samuel Coulter, Moses Andrews, John Sterling, Dr. Andrew Rappee, Philip Dewalt, James Drennan, Joseph Handlan, John Hunter, Daniel Fasber, and Alexander and John McConnell. Gen. Stidger, one of the most prominent of these, was naturally fitted to become a leader of men in all movements of a public character. He was a large, portly man, of commanding appearance, agreeable in his manners, attached to his friends, and ready always to do them a favor, but, when opposed, a formidable combatant. He exerted a great and generally a good influence in the community. Samuel Coulter, a staid Presbyterian, rented Leonard's new brick house and commenced keeping tavern, as the hotel business was then called, with the sign of the "Green Tree." John Sterling, a quick, bustling kind of a man, a sprightly talker, and one popular with the people, came from Washington, Penn., bringing with him a stock of goods from Pittsburgh. He had before bought out Hugh Cunningham, and immediately took possession of the frame building, corner of Market and Fifth streets, with his family and stock of goods. Mrs. Sterling was a woman of heroic mold, and came with her husband carrying her two little daughters along on horseback—Fannie (the elder, afterward Mrs. Binkley), and Eliza (a babe, afterward Mrs. Daniel Dewalt), one behind her on the horse, the other in her arms. A brick building was erected on this site in 1819. On the southwest corner of Market and Tuscarawas streets, now occupied by the First National Bank, a two-story log building, built by John Shorb, had been purchased by Philip Dewalt, and he also commenced keeping tavern therein with the sign of the "Spread Eagle." This corner has, from this circumstance, always since been known as the Eagle corner, and the imposing brick block upon it now goes by the name of the Eagle Block. Mr. Shorb removed to his farm immediately west of town and lived there until his death. The McConnell brothers were carpenters, and built a frame house on the east side of the square. Dr. Rappe, a German, and the first physician to locate in this county, after his arrival in this country, went first to Steubenville. Here he made the acquaintance of the Shorb family, and was shortly afterward married to Mr. Shorb's daughter. On coming to Canton, he erected a building on the southwest corner of the square, the cellar under it having been dug by an Indian squaw. For many years Dr. Rappe was the only doctor in town. His practice, extending over a large area of country, was laborious but great and remunerative. He acquired considerable property, and accumulated more means by the legitimate practice of his profession than any physician of Canton has ever been able to do since. He was the proprietor of an eye salve, called "Rappe's Invaluable Eye Salve," that maintained a good reputation for its healing properties long after his death.

The boundary lines of Stark County were established February 13, 1808. In June, following, the Commissioners of Columbiana County appointed Eli Baldwin and Elijah Wadsworth to fix the county seat. Nimishil-lentown soon backed out of the contest, and was soon lost to the geography of the county forever. The question was narrowed down to a choice between Osnaburg and Canton. Strenuous efforts were made by the patrons and friends of both places. Osnaburg had the advantage of containing, at this time, a larger population, and of having building material more abundant and more convenient than Canton.

James Leeper, the proprietor of Osnaburg, was quite a demonstrative talker, but of somewhat unsteady habits. The bleak winds from the plains were urged with much force against Canton. But Bezaleel Wells, the proprietor of the latter place, a man of few words but of fine personal appearance, excellent reputation, impressive in what he did say by his earnest, honest language, a member of the convention that formed the first constitution of the State, and liberal in his offers to donate lots, by the sale of which much of the expense in erecting county buildings might be raised, more strongly impressed the members of the commission than Leeper. After a proper inspection of the ground, and hearing the arguments in favor of each place, Canton was chosen as the county seat. In January, 1809, the Legislature completed the action necessary to make Stark an independent county.

After the survey of lands in 1808, west of the Tuscarawas River, a land office was established in Canton, with James Gibson as Register and John Sloane as Receiver. In January, 1809, a post office was established here, and James Coulter was the first Postmaster. The mail was carried on horseback, once a week, from New Lisbon to Canton. At the time of the location of the town, and for some years afterward, a lake, covering some thirty acres of ground immediately adjoined it on the northeast. It was supplied by Shriver's Run, from strong springs north of town. In many places this body of water was more than six feet deep, and, as it was abundantly supplied with fish, it was a great resort for the fishermen of the period. Shriver's Run was also the outlet of this water, but its course was a considerable distance west of the present run, which was changed to accommodate several tanneries in the east part of the town. At the edge of the lake stood a cottonwood tree, which, for nearly two generations, was the meeting-place of the boys when about to engage in their active outdoor sports. The lake was drawn off, in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly, in 1816.

The first courts were held in the Eagle Tavern, kept by Philip Dewalt, and afterward they were held, in 1810, for a short time, in an upper room at Coulter's. His cellar was used as a jail. The first criminal was that of a man convicted of larceny for stealing corn; he was sentenced by the court to ten days imprisonment in the cellar-jail. At this time whipping was yet considered a legitimate punishment for the commission of crime, and it is said that, in this case, the court hesitated between the usual infliction of "forty lashes save one," for such crimes, and imprisonment; but as it was in evidence that the man was moved to steal the corn on account of actual need in his family, the Court mercifully gave the sentence of imprisonment. A refusal to pay debts was also in those days a crime, and a prominent citizen refusing to a pay a judgment for debt rendered against him on the ground of its injustice, was put in jail until the matter was adjusted.

Roswell W. Mason, Canton's first resident lawyer, came here in 1810. He purchased ten acres of Wells, immediately west of town, and built a two-story frame house just about where the beautiful residence of Mr. Jacob Miller now stands on West Tuscarawas street, so long and well-known as the property of Mr. Samuel Lahm. Law business, however, was meager in this new country, and the prospects in the near future were not very encouraging. Mr. Mason accordingly, after living here somewhat isolated for several years, removed to Warren. His house remaining unoccupied for some time, soon presented a forlorn appearance, and on account of the creaking of doors and windows was soon regarded with superstitious eye as a "haunted house" by many of the dwellers in Canton. A family by the name of Burchfield lived in it a short time, but were soon frightened away from it by the many strange and unusual noises which disturbed their sleep at night. The ghosts, however, were considerate enough not to let themselves be seen, and were entirely exorcised some years later by Rev. James Morrow, who by his piety and a little necessary repairing, got rid of them all without much ado. Jerry Lind, who is still living, was engaged during this time in trapping muskrats along the banks of the West Creek, and he avers that the exaggerated reports about the haunted house made it difficult for him to keep his hat on his head when he was passing the house before daybreak in the morning, in going or returning from his traps. But Mr. Lind was no more fortunate in seeing the ghosts than others.

In December, 1811, the sessions of the court were removed to the Stidger Tavern, newly erected, on the site of the present St. Cloud Hotel; the upper story of a house near by, occupied by Daniel Faun, was rented for a jail. The second resident lawyer of Canton, Jeremiah H. Halleck, came here in 1812, but soon afterward removed to Steubenville. He, some years later, became President Judge of the circuit, and served with great acceptance in this capacity for fourteen years. Many yet living remember him well as a true gentleman, as well as an upright, conscientious Judge. Judge Halleck died in 1847.

William Reynolds was the first Clerk of the Court in fact, although, until he reached his majority John Harris was nominally Clerk with Raynolds as Deputy. Mr. Raynolds came here as a young man, and grew up with the town. He was a man of considerable information and of strict integrity, and exerted great influence in the earlier and somewhat later days of Canton, upon all who came in contact with him. He has the credit of having been in many things a kind of "Sir Oracle" among the people of this vicinity.

The first county jail located on a lot donated to the county by Mr. Wells, corner of Third and Market streets, was completed in the year 1814. The northern part, intended for the jail, was constructed of a double tier of hewed logs, with a partition dividing it into two cells, one for debtors and the other for criminals; each of these had an entrance from the hall, with a heavy door of two-inch oak plank, covered with plate iron. The south part of this building was intended as a residence for the Sheriff of the county. It was a frame, but both parts were weather-boarded together to give it the appearance of being a single structure. Several sessions of the court were held in the family part of this building just before the completion of the old court house, on the northwest corner of the square and Tuscarawas street. This was built in 1816, at a cost of nearly $6,000, and was in its day quite a pretentious structure.

Among those who settled in Canton previous to the year 1812, were Winans Clark, William Fogle, James Hazlett, Jacob Sowers, James Leeds, Thomas Hurford and Samuel and John Patton, and each of these men exerted considerable influence, in his own way, in shaping the destiny of the town. Clark was a butcher, attentive to his business, and made money. He built the brick house on Market street, between Fourth and Fifth, now owned by John R. Miller. He remained here only about ten years, and then removed to Arkansas. William Fogle was from Germany. Upon his arrival in the country, he first settled at a place called "The Glades," in Somerset County, Penn., and engaged in the practice of medicine. From some dissatisfaction or other with his profession, he concluded to go West and change his business. He stopped awhile at New Lisbon, but soon after came on to Canton. He purchased the lot now owned by Mr. Martin Wiki-dal, northwest corner of Fifth and Market streets, upon which a small frame building had been previously erected. In this he opened a store, and, among other things, he kept on hand a general assortment of drugs, which, as a physician, he had selected with a special view to the needs of this new country. Although known as a physician, he did not engage in general practice; but, upon request, would frequently prescribe in cases of sickness, and, upon emergency, he would sometimes even visit a patient. Dr. Fogle, as he was familiarly called, was a successful merchant, and accumulated some property. He had, as he deserved, the confidence of the people, and, as a man of good judgment, and more than ordinary intelligence, his counsel and advice were frequently sought by others. His great popularity is witnessed by the fact that he was for many years cashier of the "Farmers' Bank of Canton," that he was twice elected County Commissioner, and that he held and acceptably filled the office of County Treasurer for eight successive terms. He built the residence on the northwest side of the square where Mr. Wikidal resides; but not satisfied that this building might not soon be eclipsed in Canton by some more elegant structure, and himself taking great pride in a fine residence, he conceived the idea of building one so grand that no one in town would be able to excel it. He, therefore, engaged Abraham Doughenbaugh, a reputable carpenter with architectural taste, to design and superintend the construction of the colonnade structure on the hill on North Market street, still standing, which was erected without restrictions as to cost. It was, indeed, a noble structure, and honored the public pride of the projector, and the good taste of the architect. But "vanity of vanities" is written of all earthly works, and he who dreams to do what future generations, in a progressive age, will not surpass, has simply the pleasure of his dream and nothing more. The well on this lot is the deepest in the city, being nearly ninety feet deep. While it was being walled, an old man by the name of Ruffner fell into it and was killed. The building originally had a platform on the roof of the main part, which gave a good outlook over the surrounding country. At the time of Bachtel's execution for murder, it was crowded with people eager to see the sight. The grounds around the building were tastefully laid out in walks, which afforded fine promenades, and, on this account, evening parties given by the family to the young people of Canton are yet remembered by some of our now older people as very enjoyable occasions. Dr. Fogle died in 1847, aged eighty-seven years.

Cotemporary with Dr. Fogle, and, like him, engaged in the pursuit of merchandising, was James Hazlett. He came from Ireland while yet in his minority, first settled in Belmont County, Ohio, and, in 1811, came to Canton. He commenced business in a frame building on the southeast corner of the public square; and, having been prosperous in business, he erected on the old site a two-story brick house, which, though materially changed, is still standing, and is now known as the McKinley Block. Mr. Hazlett was much respected as a friend and neighbor; in his younger years, in connection with the store business, he was connected with other branches of business, among which may be named a tan-yard, corner of Seventh and Walnut, a forge or bloomery at Sparta, in Pike Township, and a furnace at North Industry; but every one of these has "gone the way of all flesh," and are no more recognized in the land of the living. He was at an early day elected one of the Associate Judges of the County, and held the place until these unnecessary appendages were done away with by our present State Constitution. An incident occurred in the heated "Log Cabin and Hard Cider" campaign of 1840, between Gen. Harrison, of Ohio, and Martin Van Buren, of New York, rival candidates for the high office of the President of the United States, in which, at the election, Mr. Hazlett's vote was challenged. He had, at this time, exercised the privilege of an American voter for thirty years without challenge; he, of course, acted in good faith, and believed he had the right to vote, but, under the naturalization laws, his vote was rejected. His political friends were naturally indignant at the rejection of his vote; but he himself, with a keen sense of justice in the premises, and a high regard for the prerogatives of an American citizen, took no umbrage, and was only sorry that he had so long unwittingly violated the law. Before the next election, without opposition from either party, his disability was removed.

The Patton Brothers, Samuel and John, were closely identified with the earlier days of Canton. Samuel kept a tavern stand in a frame building on the corner of Court and Tuscarawas streets. Several years later, he took charge of the Stidger House on the ground now occupied by the St. Cloud Hotel. Here he died. John was a teacher, and held school in a frame building on Market street, south of the old Oberly corner. He is said to have been a man of fine personal appearance, and very popular among the ladies. He afterward removed to Bolivar, Tuscarawas County, where he died some years ago.

Thomas Hurford, father of Alexander, still living among us, was born in Chester County, Penn., where he learned the milling business. He worked for awhile in a mill belonging to Bazaleel Wells at Steubenville; then rented the mill and ran it in his own name. During the time, he took a flat-boat loaded with flour to New Orleans, and, on this venture, cleared $2,500. With this money he came to Canton, and entered a quarter-section of land just south of the present city limits; he was so closely identified with Canton from his social disposition, and the frequency of his visits to town, that he was always considered as one of the early residents. He built the mill yet standing, but for many years no longer in active use, just southwest of Oak Grove. Though the sound of its grinding has for many years not been heard, it is still in the old place—one of the remaining monitors of times long past and gone. Mr. Hurford was very fond of company, and particularly fond of discussions on religious matters. He, having been born and reared in Chester County, Penn., a region of country almost entirely occupied by Quakers, the followers of William Penn, the founder of the State of Pennsylvania, and in the very vicinity of Philadelphia, the City of Brotherly Love, was very naturally under Quaker influences in his earlier years. He tells his own story of the reasons which caused him to doff the habit of his religious faith and early training. Having been sent to Winchester, Va., at an early day, on business for his employers, he was assailed, while passing along one of the streets, by a cry from an upper window, as he supposed, "You're a Quaker," but looking up he could see no one from whom the insulting language, as he construed it, had come. He went on, but after a few steps, he heard the same cry repeated. Naturally indignant at what he considered an insult to his religion, he angrily turned round to discover the impudent assaulter, but no one was in sight on the street or at the windows. Several hours after this, as he was passing the same locality, came a third time the cry, "You're a Quaker," when, turning quickly, he discovered the guilty party to be a parrot exposed in a cage at an upper window. This trivial circumstance so much annoyed him, that he took off his Quaker dress immediately upon his return home, and never resumed it afterward. Upon such little things, sometimes, do the destinies of men and nations hang.

Jacob Sowers, grandfather of Percy Sowers, an attorney of the city of to-day, came in the year 1809, to Canton, from Maryland, and bought with him his two sons, Frederick and Eli. The old gentleman intended to make some investments in his own name, but not finding things in all respects to his taste, and, concluding to defer the matter to some future time, returned East, leaving his two sons here. Frederick was bound to George Crips to learn the trade of a potter. He liked neither his master, nor the trade, left without ceremony, and went back to his native State, where afterward he became a highly successful Baptist minister, but contracting a severe cold from immersing in the winter season, he died from the effects of it. Eli, the other son, was apprenticed to Alexander Cameron, to make of himself a practical carpenter. He served out his time, married a daughter of George Dunbar, and, for many years, carried on this business extensively and successfully, until, with the acquisition of a competency, advancing years admonished him to retire from active business. He was elected one of the Associate Judges of the county, and filled the position with credit for a number of years. The Judge often spoke of the great eclipse of 1811, when he, with others, was engaged in shingling the old Kaufmann House, corner of Ninth and Market streets. The sun gradually disappeared, darkness soon enveloped everything about them, and the men, one and all, precipitately abandoned the roof with the impression (bred of the want of knowledge and considerable superstition) that the world was coming to an end, or that some other dreadful calamity was immediately impending. The sun, however, soon brightened up again and the world still stands.

In these earlier days, and some of the later ones, people hereabouts, without fixing precise dates, would refer to things which happened before or after the war of 1812 with Great Britain. Hence the references above given of those who were here before 1812. There were, of course, many others, who either made no record, or, following the Westward course of rule and civilization, have entirely passed away from the recollections of men.

Many of the pursuits of former times have passed away, and a few words touching the arts that the improvement of machinery or greater facilities elsewhere have destroyed, are in place. In pioneer days, here as elsewhere, those pursuits which minister to man's immediate comforts and needs were the first ones started and longest continued. A young lady's outfit, in town as in country, then, always included a spinning-wheel and its accompanying reel. From the first settlement of the county, and for a couple of score of years thereafter, these articles were in great demand; at one time, there were no less than three establishments in Canton engaged in their manufacture, those, namely, of Joseph Handlin, Joseph Musser and Jacob Bucher. Handlin left first, Musser ran away with another man's wife, but Mr. Bucher continued in the business as long as there was anything to do, and amassed a very respectable fortune. But the music of "the one-stringed piano," as some one has facetiously called the spinning-wheel, no longer enlivens the dreary long winter nights, or the sultry late summer evenings. Tom Marshall, from Steubenville, where he had previously engaged in the same business, started a nail factory and continued it for a few years. He heated his iron-plate in a forge, and cut and headed the nails by machinery. His shop was on Tuscarawas street, about where the parsonage of the First Methodist Church now stands. He could and did make from fifteen to twenty pounds a day, which sold readily at 50 cents a pound. Messrs. Webb, Toller, Schroggs, Sweeney and Albert carried on the hatting business at an early day and for many years. Hats, at that time, were made only of fur and wool, both kinds, a stiff hat with a high crown. When a man or a boy wanted a hat, he went to the hatter and had his head measured, and the hat, made over the measure, would be finished in a month or six weeks. It was not a great while, however, before the merchants began to bring on hats and shoes from the East. The hatters and shoemakers, of course, considered this an intrenchment upon their prerogative, and they made common cause against the merchants; but the old fight of supply and demand, and of the right to buy goods in any legitimate way, where they could be bought for the least money, won the day eventually; the war ceased, the merchants had the trade, and the hatters and shoemakers were obliged to yield. The hatters finally left the field, and those of them who remained in town, went into other business. There have been as many as nine tanneries in different parts of Canton, mostly on or near Shriver's Run, and seven of the nine running at the same time; now there is none. The same might be said of the hatters, who, after the first fight with the merchants, were only known here by an occasional itinerant coming once in awhile, to brush up and renovate old hats; a year or two since, however, an old and experienced hatter from Philadelphia located in Canton, and though he does not pretend to cope with the older houses East or West, in making new hats, he has succeeded in establishing a good business in the renovating line. In the former days, there were Sterling's, Stidger's, Kroft's, Fogle's, Slusser's, Hazlett's, Christmas', Dobbs' and Kimball's tanneries, the last seven at the same time. As this circumstance indicates there was a very urgent demand for leather, so urgent indeed, sometimes, that people would take it away before the leather had been fully and properly tanned. V. R. Kimball, who started his tannery in 1832, at the corner of Cherry and Third streets, where Alexander's woolen factory is now located, ground his bark by steam-power, and as his was the first steam engine ever seen in Canton, it was a great curiosity, and attracted, for awhile, crowds of people eager to see this wonderful substitute of heat and water for horse-power. The engineer was named Albert Kugle, and the boys of the period considered him the greatest man in town. The stage driver, up to this time, was the man of most importance in the eyes of the boys, but he had to yield to Kugle. As game was then abundant, and every man and boy considered himself deficient in something essential to his manhood, if he had not a gun or did not know how to use one, and as emigrants going further West brought this part of their outfit here, the demand for guns and rifles was sufficient to keep three shops running. Adam Kimmel, John Clark and Jacob Danner engaged in the business, and they all made money out of it. Associated with the regular gun business, Mr. F. A. Schneider, the pioneer hardware merchant of Canton, started and kept in operation for some time, a gun-barrel factory on Fifth street, between Walnut and Cherry. The building was afterward diverted into other uses; it is still standing, but has been turned into a number of tenement houses. Among others of those who pursued in former years, what are now entirely or comparatively lost arts in Canton, George Faber, a man of decidedly inventive turn of mind, and a good citizen, manufactured for several years all kinds of cards, such as wool-cards, horse-cards and the like.

Although a distinct portion of the history of Stark County will be devoted to the medical fraternity, in which all the pioneer physicians will receive full notice, we deem it due to the history of Canton to revert briefly to the earlier doctors, who came here after Dr. Rappe, of whom, as the first one, a fuller notice has above been given. After him, the brothers John and Thomas Bonfield came and practiced in this city and neighborhood. Dr. John came first, and, though a man of decided ability, was somewhat odd in his manners and dress, and had a penchant for holding some public office, an ambition, however, which he was never able to gratify. Dr. Thomas S. came shortly after, and was in nearly every respect totally unlike his brother; he was a popular practitioner, a zealous member of the Methodist Church and a noted skater. After these came Dr. Thomas Hartford, who first engaged in the practice of his profession and afterward in merchandising. Highly successful in both callings, he amassed considerable wealth, which by his will, after making liberal provision for his widow during her lifetime, he bequeathed as a perpetual poor fund to the city of Canton. Dr. Hartford removed to Pittsburgh in 1832, and lived there in ease and comfort all the balance of his days. Dr. James Jerow was the fifth physician, a good practitioner, but a very decided and somewhat arbitrary man. He died in 1825, of a malignant fever. Dr. George Breysecker, the next, came from Germany, and settled in Canton in 1819. He was reputed a good physician and a very successful hunter. Drs. Gardner and Simons came here in or about 1820. The former died in Canton. The latter, about the year 1830, removed to Cincinnati, and afterward to St. Louis, where he died only a few years ago. Many of these older settlers have left historical reminiscences highly interesting and instructive. We will give a few of these which we deem of especial interest. John Shorb, who came here in 1807, was a native of Zweibrücken, in Germany, and when yet quite young, he came and settled in Baltimore, where he married Catharine Gross, a sister of Mrs. Andrew Meyer, from Neiderbronn, Elsass. Mr. Shorb had pursued different branches of business in Baltimore, and had made some money before he came to Canton. He kept store a few years, first in Leonard's building, and afterward in his own building. Giving up the store to his son John, he removed to his farm just northwest of the old city limits, now, however, nearly all within the city. When he went East in after years to buy goods, he invariably made the trip on horseback, accompanied at different times by his wife, a feat of horsemanship that but few women of the present day would dare to attempt. In 1815, he became President of the first bank in the town, called "The Farmers' Bank of Canton." He did considerable business also in real estate. He took an active part in public affairs, and was always ready to give a helping hand to his neighbors. An example will perhaps give some insight into this part of his character. It was customary in the early times for sea captains to bring over emigrants destitute of means, and, in order to pay their passage and expenses, to sell them out to service for a number of years. Sometimes whole families were thus sold out into this condition of white slavery. A Swiss, by the name of Imhoff, was one of this kind of emigrants. He came from Basle, and was a tailor by trade. He was sold to one of these "dealers in human flesh," who was instinctively a tyrant. Soon finding his condition unbearable, Imhoff took the first favorable chance, as many others in like positions did, and ran away, taking his family along with him. With other parties going West, he came first to Plain Township, and then to Canton. He had been pursued, and on the day of his arrival here, he was caught by his pursuers, together with his family, and they were in danger of being taken back to their slavery, and to suffer the punishment of whipping for running away. They were almost exhausted with weariness and the want of sustaining food, and the terrible fate awaiting them if they should be taken back to Philadelphia becoming known, many of the then residents of the town took compassion on them, and one of them, John Shorb, being in good circumstances offered to buy their freedom. The pursuers were at first unwilling to make any terms for the release of Imhoff and family, but they were soon brought to terms by the loud mutterings of the anger of the people, and the threats of lynch law if they did not quickly accept their money and leave. One who vouches for the truth of this transaction said: "The scoundrels took themselves off mighty quick when they heard of hanging." Shorb was a zealous member of the Roman Catholic Church, and one of the founders of the first congregation in Canton. He was injured while giving a helping hand in the erection of the old Catholic Church corner of North and Poplar streets, and on the 24th of July, 1824, he died from his injuries, at the age of sixty-five years.

Philip Dewalt was also one of the noteworthy pioneers of Canton, and came here in 1808. His parents came from Germany to America in the year 1761, and Philip was born on the vessel during the voyage over the ocean. The family went first to Hanover, York Co., Penn., next to Center County, and finally, to Stark County in 1808. The parents lived to great old age; the father, also named Philip, died at the age of one hundred and five years, and the mother at one hundred. Both were buried in the old graveyard on Plum street in Canton. The subject of our sketch first engaged in making "small beer" and "pepper cakes," but in the winter following, commenced keeping the "Spread Eagle" tavern; he did a good business. From 1809 to 1812, large numbers of people from the East came to look up and locate lands, and Mr. Dewalt had often as many as twenty guests passing the night with him. His son, Daniel Dewalt, now over eighty years old, still resides here and knows more about the early settlement of Canton, from his own knowledge, than any other citizen. At the end of twenty years, Philip Dewalt sold the Eagle Hotel to his oldest son, George, and built another tavern stand on the northeast corner of Tuscarawas and Plum streets. He died in 1844, aged eighty-three years. His wife Eva was called home some seventeen years before at the age of sixty-four years. They had a family of seven children, five sons and two daughters, of whom "Old Uncle Dan," tolerably hale and hearty, alone survives, one of the last links connecting the primitive age of Canton with the present. A history of Canton would be very incomplete without a more extended notice of "Uncle Dan." In the spring of 1809, he went to school to a Mr. George Geisweil, northeast of the present fair grounds, and received instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic, both in English and German. The tuition in this school was 50 cents per month. One Andrew Johnson, taught the first English school in Canton, in a log schoolhouse, erected in 1807 on the lot now occupied by the court house. Daniel Dewalt made fair progress in school, and afterward helped his father in the tavern. He attended to the horses in the stable and blacked boots for the guests, sometimes assisted by his mother, and frequently did not get done with his work until after 1 o'clock in the morning. He, however, pocketed all the cash paid for this service himself, and often drove a profitable trade. He took to horses naturally when quite young, and while yet a boy did some sharp trading, as early as the year 1812, when the last war with Great Britain broke out. About this time he owned, in his own name, a flock of sixty sheep, which found good and abundant subsistence on the rich plains near Canton. One day a farmer came to the Eagle Tavern, with a tolerably good horse, which he wanted to exchange for sheep. Daniel gave him four sheep and took the horse. A few days after, his father sent him on business to New Philadelphia, and he, of course, took his horse along with him. On the way he saw a very beautiful, dark chestnut horse, which took his fancy, and he traded his own horse and a gold watch, worth $30 or $40, for him. When he came home on his noble charger, he was a wonder to his father and all the people at the hotel. He traded this horse again a few days later to the soldiers, at that time encamped on the court house lot, receiving in exchange two other horses and $75 in money; one of these he sold soon afterward for $100. He, some years later, learned watch-making and jewelry business, but not finding this his particular forte, he has spent the greater part of his life in trading. He was generally successful in his ventures. In the summer of 1809, there was a great scarcity in horse feed in this neighborhood, and to meet the urgent demand, Philip Dewalt sent to New Lisbon, a distance of thirty-three miles. His two daughters, Mary and Nancy, aged respectively twelve and fourteen years, made the journey in two days. They rode horseback and leading other horses by the bridle, brought three sacks of oats on each horse. Those days developed hearty and brave women, as well as hardy and daring men, women who were in every respect helpmeets to their husbands in town and country.

Before proceeding to other early reminiscences it will be well to give a resume of the early settlers which, from a paper published a number of years since, we find ready to our hands, as follows, viz.: "The first white settler, not only in Canton but in Stark County, was James Leonard, who came here in 1805. The first white child was born a couple of miles north of Canton, on the Spangler farm, and was a daughter born to Hugh Cunningham, who, however, lived but a short time. The first marriage was that of James F. Leonard with Sarah Barber, in 1806. Leonard built the same year the first brick house, on the old Oberly corner. The first death was that of James Culbertson, in October, 1805. The first grist-mill was erected by Philip Slusser in 1807. The first saw-mill was set up the same year on the present site of Trump's Mill. The first tavern was started by Garret Crusen, on Market street, between Fourth and Fifth streets, in a log house. The first well in town was dug on this lot. The first store was opened by Abraham Kroft, corner of Market and Fifth streets, in 1807. The first blacksmith who did work here was John Bower, who built his shop and commenced business in 1809, on the court house lot. The first shoemaker was Barney Mayban, on Poplar street, between Fourth and Fifth, in 1809. The first tailor was Levi Jones, on South Market street, between Seventh and Eighth streets, in 1808. The first wheelwright and chair-maker was Joseph Handlan in 1807. The first wagon-maker was Jacob Strine, in 1818. The first cabinet-maker was Peter M. Bainbridge, on West Tuscarawas street, in 1815. The first house joiner was John Hanna, in 1809. The first brick-layers were James McMahan and Stillinger, partners in business, in 1812; they also followed stone-cutting and plastering. The first tan-yard was started by Abraham Kroft, in 1808. The first lawyer was Roswell Mason, in 1810. The first Doctor was Andrew Rappee, in 1808. The first teacher was Andrew Johnson, in 1808. The first resident minister of the Gospel was Rev. Anthony Weier, in 1812. The first drug store was opened by Jacob Sala in 1820, though drugs were extensively sold in Canton by other parties before this time. The first hatter was George Stidger, on the St. Cloud corner, in 1809. The first tinner and copper-smith was John Buckius, East Tuscarawas street, in 1811. The first saddler was John Read, in 1814, who occupied a shop in common with a tailor by the name of Parker. The first gunsmith was Adam Kimmel, in 1816. The first watchmaker was Alexander Wilson, in 1814. The first butcher was James Matthews, in 1809. The first brewery was built by Thomas Hartford and Samuel Coulter, near the East Bridge, in 1820, and was operated by John Cake. The first barber shop was started by William Baker in 1820. Previous to this time the citizens of Canton shaved themselves. The first gravestone cutter was Joseph Trout, who came here in 1809. The first printing office was started by John Saxton in 1815; this is still in existence, and is carried on by his son, Thomas Saxton, and is well known as the Repository establishment, on Court street. The first portrait painter was John E. Dunbar, in 1827. The first church edifice, a low frame building, was erected by the Lutherans, on the lot upon which the Presbyterian Church now stands, corner Tuscarawas and Plum streets, in 1810. The first regular schoolhouse was built on the opposite corner, where the West school building now stands, in 1811. The first steam engine was brought to Canton by V. R. Kimball, in 1833, and put to service in grinding bark at his tannery on the corner of Cherry and Third streets."

As connected closely with these varied business interests of early Canton, we here give a brief history of the first bank. In the year 1815, a meeting of the business men of the town was called for the purpose of organizing a bank. The population at this time was about 500. There were seven stores, and several flour-mills drawing trade to Canton from a great distance on all sides. At the close of the war of 1812, a new impetus was given to business; immigration from the East, which, during the war, had nearly ceased, set in again, and there soon arose a demand for greater facilities in the way of furnishing an adequate supply of circulating medium, and in making transfers of funds. Wooster, thirty miles west of Canton, began to loom up as a rival town, and, what at this time appears rather laughable than otherwise, the contest for superiority was almost entirely based upon the relative advantages of Killbuck and Nimishillen Creeks for future purposes of navigation. The meeting called, as above stated, was considered a good stroke of policy to gain other advantages. Five Trustees were appointed viz.: John Shorb, William Fogle, Samuel Coulter, Thomas Taylor and James Hazlett, with instructions to take initiatory steps at once to compass the end desired. In the month of April a notice was published in the Ohio Repository for a meeting at the Eagle Tavern, of Philip Dewalt, to hold an election for nine Directors of a bank to be called "The Farmers' Bank of Canton," the word "Farmers" being adopted at the suggestion of Dr. Fogle. At this election, Thomas Hartford, John Shorb, John Myers, William Fogle, Winans Clark, James Hazlett, Philip Slusser, Jacob Myers and George Stidger were chosen directors. John Shorb was made President, and William Fogle, Cashier. Subscription books were immediately opened to raise stock for the new bank at Canton, at Tallmadge, at Stow and at Cleveland. In the summer of 1815, a banking house was erected on Lot 28, which is no longer standing, and in the fall of the same year it was occupied as such, and the bank went into operation. They at once issued notes for circulation and sent them out upon their mission for good or for evil. At that time, there was considerable opposition to a paper currency, and, at the February term of court in the year 1816, an indictment was found against "John Shorb, President of the Farmers' Bank of Canton," for "signing and making bank notes without being, by law, authorized to do so." George Tod was President Judge, and John Hoover, Samuel Coulter and William Henry, Associate Judges of the Common Pleas Court at the time. At the trial, however, the sympathies of the community must have been largely with the bank, and that they wanted it sustained, was evident from the fact that the jury, after hearing the case, returned a verdict of not guilty, without even the formality of retiring to make up their verdict. Jeremiah H. Halleck represented the prosecution, and Messrs Wright and Tappan the defense. But this decision, prompt and decisive as it was for the bank, did not relieve it from all its troubles in this direction. During the same year, Henry Swartz, who owed the bank $800 on his note, resisted its payment, on the ground that the bank had issued paper money in violation of law. This case was argued at length by J. W. Lathrop for the bank, and by John M. Goodenow for the defendant. The court, however, again gave judgment in favor of the bank, and the legality of this branch of its business seems to have been thus finally established. The bank also issued fractional currency to a considerable amount, of which counterfeits soon made their appearance. The Repository of that date warns the public against them in this wise: "They are from 75 cents downward, printed on deep fancy pink paper, with larger type than the genuine, and dated May 3, 1816." It seems that a publisher of a newspaper near the center of the State, manufactured with impunity a considerable amount of this fractional currency, and escaped prosecution on account of the fear of being able to prosecute him successfully for any penal offense. John Sterling and Thomas Alexander were elected Directors of the bank in 1816. James Drennan was Cashier in 1817, and gives notice that "a dividend of 4 per cent on the capital stock actually paid in, will be paid to stockholders, or their legal representatives." From a bank statement published in December, 1818, there was capital stock paid in, $33,710; notes in circulation, $20,398; debts due, $18,000; deposits, $3,112; bills discounted, $75,162; specie on hand, $1,969; notes of other banks, $1,406. A financial crisis was approaching, and the bank soon began to feel its effects. They struggled on and endeavored to weather the storm until November, 1818, when as many other banks had already been compelled to do, they suspended specie payments, but gave notice that they would continue "to redeem their notes in good chartered paper." In January, 1820, in compliance with an amendment of a law then in force, the board of Directors was increased to thirteen. Renewed efforts were made to sustain the bank's credit and its life; but the reserve forces were insufficient, and in March, 1821, the bank building and lot, and the office furniture were sold at public auction. The first "Farmers' Bank of Canton" was dead. It was afterward resuscitated, but its later history is not so closely identified with the purpose of our work, and we do not deem it necessary to pursue it any further.

We find the following interesting biographical sketch of one of the first Board of Directors of the bank, and the last of them all to pay the last debt of man to nature was Mr. Jacob Myers: "He came to this county in 1810, finding it only a wilderness. Though they were few and far between, the hearty old-fashioned hospitality of the early pioneers was a topic on which Mr. Myers loved to dwell, and he was himself one of its best exponents. In the fall of 1811, he returned to Hagerstown, Md., and, while there, he built a wool-carding machine. In the spring of 1812, he returned to Canton, where he ever afterward resided. He brought his carding-machine with him, it being the first erected in this part of Ohio. It was put into operation on the site known as Roland's Mill. Both mill and carding-machine having been burned out, he bought a lot in Canton, southwest corner of Market and Eighth streets, rebuilt his shop on the same, and ran it by horse-power. Mr. Myers was once the owner of part of the land on which Massillon now stands, near the confluence of Sippo Creek with the Tuscarawas. On this he built a saw-mill and a powder-mill, on a site on Sippo Creek, a short distance above where the Sippo Mill now stands. This was the first and only powder-mill in Stark County. At the time of which we speak, the Indians had a camp on the high bank west of the Tuscarawas River, now partly occupied by the site of West Massillon. In 1815, Mr. Myers sold his Massillon property, including the land and the saw and powder mills, to Folger & Coffin. He also sold his Canton town property, and, in 1816, leased the tract upon which he built his mill, just south of Canton, on Cherry street, and where he lived, until his death, fifty-seven years. He leased the land because being school land it could not be sold; but it afterward became his by purchase. He afterward erected a distillery, the foundation of which still remains, though the superstructure has long since disappeared. Grain at that time was a drug, as there was more raised than was required for home consumption, and there was no foreign market, at least no means of transportation. Wheat was 25 cents a bushel, and rye from 15 to 20 cents. Much of the surplus crop was converted into whisky, and Mr. Myers soon had a large quantity on hand. For the purpose of disposing of it to the best advantage, he, in company with Daniel Slanker, who had a mill in Jackson Township, and had a lot of flour on hand, built a boat on the Tuscarawas River, at a point known as the "Old Bridge," a short distance above the present stone bridge. This was in 1823, at a time when our forefathers anticipated great results from the navigable qualities of the Nimishillen and Tuscarawas. This boat, loaded with 300 barrels of flour, pork and whisky—Slanker furnishing the flour and pork, and Myers the whisky—started for New Orleans, where they expected to find ready sale for the cargo. The crew consisted of five. In addition to the owners, who accompanied the craft, there were John Brown, of Bethlehem, and Eli Myers, of Osnaburg, who were the steersmen. There was another, whose name is forgotten, who, anxious to see the world, gave his services as a sort of roustabout for the passage. They floated with the current and tied up at night. All went along smoothly until near Zanesville, on the Muskingum River; there they ran against a raft of logs, tore off a side plank, and, notwithstanding every effort at the pump, the boat sank. To raise the vessel, it was necessary to unload. After it was raised, repaired and reloaded, the parties engaged a man by the name of Kincaid, who had considerable experience as a river-man, to take charge of the vessel and cargo, dispose of it to the best advantage, and make due return. Slanker and Myers returned home; Kincaid, instead of going to New Orleans, went up the Cumberland as far as Mussel Shoals; there sold out, and vamoosed. He was pursued, caught in Kentucky, and lodged in jail at Louisville. The parties, finding the trouble and expense of prosecuting him likely to cost more than they could recover, abandoned the suit. The same year, Dr. Andrew Rappee, of Canton, loaded a flat on the Tuscarawas River with like commodities for New Orleans; but they ran aground near Zoar, and the enterprise was abandoned. During Mr. Myers' long residence of two generations in Canton, he always sustained the character of an honest, upright citizen. He was a man of decided and independent opinions, kind of heart and open-handed to the poor. In his intercourse with his neighbors, he practiced the golden rule—he made it a point to do unto others as he would be done by. He took his share of the privations, and sustained his part in life as became a good citizen from first to last, during the long life, which measured in its span the growth of this great nation. In October, 1863, he had a stroke of palsy in his right side, and he was quite feeble ever afterward. In October, 1872, he had a stroke which partially paralyzed his left side; the ultimate result of these severe attacks being his death at the advanced age of nearly ninety years."

Forty or fifty years ago, as is incidentally mentioned in the above sketch of Mr. Myers, much of the surplus grain raised hereabouts was manufactured into whisky; in those days lager beer and other beers were unknown among the people in this Western world; whisky was used to some extent in almost every family; the morning bitters were as regular as the morning meal; and places where liquor was sold, were the taverns under a stringent license law, to do a lawful business, and to keep a decent and respectable house. While drunkenness was probably not as prevalent then as now, there was, however, enough of it to awaken attention, and to cause measures to be taken for its suppression. Modern temperance movements were in their infancy, and were to a great extent entirely unknown in Canton. Occasionally, however, measures were taken for the cure of drunkards, by citizens, which though not always strictly within the law, were at times quite effective. We find a vivid description of the application of one of those methods in print, headed, "Crusading in Ye Olden Times," which is as follows; "Forty years ago, or thereabouts, when whisky sold at three cents a glass, and drunkards were made according to law under the old license system, they had a summary way of reforming toppers, that often proved more effective than moral suasion. It was in the days of the old apprenticeship system, when Canton, with a population of less than two thousand inhabitants, contained more of that class of boys than can be enumerated at the present time, notwithstanding it boasts five times the number of inhabitants. To a considerable extent they constituted of a class of themselves, isolated from the society of others. They were mostly from the country, removed from the paternal influences, and ready for almost any kind of deviltry. When a "greeny" came to town, they were sure to take him through a process of hazing. There were no police in those days, and they generally managed to keep out of the way of the Constables. There are many yet living who remember how these young fellows got after the drunkards. If caught on the streets after night, they were sure to be taken through a process that may be called the hydropathic and motorpathic system, the modus operandi of which will be described in the case of Seth Godder. Seth was a shoemaker by trade—a clever, social man—who fell into the ruinous habit of indulging in strong drink. It was not long before his family came to want, and then his wife, a good, industrious woman, was compelled to take in washing and work out in order to keep the wolf from the door. She bore with her husband's weakness as long as patience was any virtue, then reasoned with him, entreated and threatened, all to no purpose. Finally, she concluded to let the "Regulators" take him in hand. She talked with John Caskey, an apprentice in the Repository office, and a ringleader among the b'hoys of that day; she told him she had exhausted all her resources in trying to reform her drunken husband and failed; and now she wanted the boys to take him in hand and do anything they pleased with him, only not to take his life. As several toppers, caught on the street after night had already been taken in hand, Godder, to avoid similar treatment, had taken the precaution to wend his way home before dark. On the evening of the day upon which the event we are about to chronicle occurred, Godder came home drunker than usual, and, if possible, made himself more disagreeable to his family than ever before. Mrs. Godder lost no time in notifying Caskey of the condition of her husband, and requested that he be taken in hand forthwith. The company was summoned. There were John Hoover, Sam Cove, John Mobley, George McNabb and a lot more of choice spirits, including, if we remember rightly, George Haas and John Buckius. They repaired to the house of Godder, found him quite demonstrative, and asked him to take a walk. He at first declined, but finding it useless to resist, at last apparently yielded. They led him to the town pump, then on West Tuscarawas street, set him under the spout, and held him there, while two or three of the boys did the pumping, and it was effectually done to the extent of drenching him completely. Meanwhile a fence-rail had been procured, astraddle of which Seth was assisted, and securely held by one on each side, while two stout boys carried the rail on their shoulders. As they moved off singing "Jim Crow," Godder joined in the sport, but as the rail-bearers would give him an occasional bound and gyratory movement, the treatment became somewhat painful, and he began to protest. They asked him to quit drinking, but he refused. They renewed the march, and the rail movement. He swore worse than the "army in Flanders." On North Market street, at the public pump, they gave him another dose more copious than the first. The night was somewhat cool, and the patient became chilled. Remounting him on the rail, the march was resumed. It continued until Godder became apparently quite subdued and helpless. Speaking to him without obtaining an answer, a halt was ordered, and on lowering the rail it was discovered that he was apparently dead—cold, clammy and speechless. Terribly frightened, the boys hastily bore him to his home, while one of their number summoned Dr. Brysecker. On being placed in a warm bed, by the application of mustard to the extremities and hot peppermint tea internally, he gradually revived, but the shock to his nervous system confined him to the house for several weeks. He became a sober man. Never again, as long as he lived in Canton, did he drink intoxicating liquor. He secured the respect and esteem of the community. We have often thought the same treatment would be more effectual in curing our most notorious drunkards of the present day, than fines and imprisonment."

In that earlier day, there was also among many of our young people a desire to add improvement to amusement, and the history of facts concerning the earlier theatrical performances in Canton should also have a place here. These performances, it must be remembered, were given by home talent exclusively. The first effort of the kind was on Christmas Eve, in the year 1817. It was rendered in the long room of John Patton's tavern, standing on the lot now occupied by the St. Cloud. The performances, as advertised, were "The most interesting parts of the celebrated tragedy of Pizarro, to which will be added patriotic, sentimental, moral, humorous and comic dialogues and single speeches." On the evening of July 3, 1818, at the same place, "Douglas, or the Noble Shepherd," was performed, and on the evening of the 6th, a repetition of "Pizarro, or the Spaniards of Peru," was given. As there are none now living who have any distinct recollection of the particulars, the names of many of the performers and patrons of this early drama have gone into unmerited oblivion. Among them, however, were Samuel Buckius, John P. Coulter, Joseph Alexander, Lewis Barnes, James Sloan, Jacob Rapp, Samuel Penniwell, John Shorb and Adam Fogle; Christian Palmer, a violinist of some note and pretensions in that day, led the orchestra. In the winter of 1822-23, the "Thespian Society of Canton" was organized. William Reynolds was one of the most active in getting up this organization, and to his efforts its success was largely owing. Their first performance was in the south part of the Eagle Tavern, then owned and occupied by George Dewalt, now also among the things of the past. The main play first presented on this occasion, was the tragedy of "Barbarosa, or the Usurper of Algiers," this was followed by an after-piece, called "She Stoops to Conquer," from Goldsmith. The male performers were William Christmas, James Beggs, James Allen, Frank and Jeff Reynolds, James Graham, Harmon Stidger, Dr. Jerome, Val. Buckius, Lewis Fogle, and the two Coulters. Dr. Thomas Bonfield, F. J. Myers, Madison Reynolds and Lewis Fogle performed the female parts in these plays. William Reynolds acted in the double capacity of prompter and stage manager. The scenery, made of curtain calico and wall-paper, exhibited considerable taste and ingenuity. The next play rendered was "Othello," in which James Allen represented the Moor, and Frank Myers, Desdemona. Although the stage decorations and scenery were necessarily of a rustic character, and the wardrobe scant and only improvised for the occasion, all accounts agree that these entertainments were quite attractive and successful, quite as much so, indeed, to that generation as the more pretentious, but certainly not more creditable performances of to-day often are. And there was one beauty about them from which the modern theater, especially when some celebrated "star" is to be on the boards, has gone far away, the admission fee was 25 cents, and no reserved seats. There was but this one season of performances in the Eagle Tavern. When our native talent next came to the front, it was at Trump's Tavern, a two-story brick, on the corner of East Tuscarawas and Cherry streets. Among the plays rendered here with great success, were "The Robbers," "Damon and Pythias," "Servant with two Masters," "The Review, or the Wag of Windsor," and "Robin Rough Head." In the play of "Coriolanus," Andrew Myers took the place of the leading character. Besides the persons already named, the performers at Trump's included William Bowen, Dwight Jarvis, Henry Dickinson, Adam Bowers and Thomas and Joseph Blackburn. The last-named afterward became a popular clown in a traveling circus, and was performing in England at the time of Queen Victoria's coronation. There were about the same time, also, some performances at the house of Jacob Wareham, on West Tuscarawas street, where Mr. George Althouse resides. About the year 1828, Joseph Shorb, who kept store in a one-story frame building, erected another story upon the same building and had it fitted up expressly for theatrical entertainments. The stage fixtures, scenery and accommodations for the audience were at that time considered very good. The house was usually well filled, and the receipts at each performance amounted to $25 or $30. Performances were given in this place about once a week for five or six successive winters. The principal actors, some of whom as jurists and other professional men attained great celebrity at a later day, were Hiram Griswold, G. W. Belden, Andrew Myers, John Rappe, Isaac Steese, William and Henry Myers, Henry and John Buckius, William Clark, O. P. Stidger, William Fogle and Jacob R. Palmer. A few of these as respected and honored citizens are still residing in Canton. Isaac Hartman, James Cameron and Daniel Burgert are remembered as the principal representatives of female character. "The Broken Sword" was a popular piece played here, as was also "Bombastes Furioso," a very laughable farce. Dan Meeds, commonly known as "Black Dan," led the orchestra. The Shorb property changed hands about the year 1834, and after this a new company was organized, and the upper rooms of the old academy, known as the "Salt Box," were fitted up for their accommodation. A German artist by the name of Schweighoffer, painted the scenery, which was considered very good. Performances were given here every week or two for several winters. Among the more notable new actors, who here appeared upon the scene were S. P. Hulihan, Sol Stout, John Taylor, Isaac Hartman, H. P. Dunbar, Eli Sala and James Armstrong. Among the boys acting female parts were William Mathews, F. L. Carney, John L. Saxton and George Dunbar, Jr. Since the close of the performances at the "Salt Box," some forty years ago, there has been no effort, we believe, to organize the home talent, except upon a few special occasions, in this direction. At the expiration of the academy performances, one of the most pleasant of the enjoyments of the olden time came to an untimely end.

Horse-racing was also one of the popular pastimes of the pioneer period. A horse-race excited general interest and attention, and always drew a crowd. At the first sale of lots in Canton, then competing with Osnaburg for the county seat, Bezaleel Wells, the proprietor of the town, arranged for a race in order to draw the people together from a distance, and succeeded. Our old and esteemed friend and fellow-citizen in Plain Township, Judge Loutzenheiser, was present, and is authority for the statement that there was a great crowd, and also for the additional one, that the people were more interested in the racing of the horses, than they were in the sale of the town lots. The race-course was on Market street, from North to Tuscarawas streets, which was especially prepared for the occasion by the grubbing and the clearing away of timber and underbrush. Canton, if not exactly born of a horse-race, commenced with one under the auspices of the father of the town, and though, perhaps, not one of her peculiar institutions, the horse-race was a popular institution with the pioneers of this as of nearly every new town then growing up in the West. "Like parent, like child," holds good for towns as well as for people. For a generation and longer, nearly every town and village in this part of the country boasted in the possession of a horse never beaten on the turf. Not only the owner of such a horse, but with him every man and boy was willing to back up the town's favorite by bets of money, or whatever else of value they happened to possess down to a bull-eye watch, a dog-knife or tin-whistle. Betting in those days was very general, whereas now it is confined almost entirely to professional sporting men. There were, however, also, in those days, men who made it a regular business to travel the country with running horses, and who were ready to match them for a consideration, with anything that offered. There was another set of fellows, owners of horses, well calculated to take in the unwary and too eager betters on horse-flesh. Their horse was a kind of "Sleepy Davy," and they went round in disguise pretending to follow some other business, by which ruse they frequently threw people off their guard. An adventure of theirs with Cantonians of two generations ago, will well illustrate their method of proceeding. On a warm summer day, a stranger might have been seen leading a horse up Tuscarawas street. He was clothed in the style of the day, but his clothes were somewhat the worse for the wear and exposure they had undergone. He wore a dilapidated stove-pipe hat, and a swallow-tail coat mounted with brass buttons. The horse had on a riding-saddle loaded with tinware. The man and his horse moved along as though they were tired, and as they approached Cherry street, a lot of boys playing there caught sight of them, and at once began poking fun at them. The man paid no attention to the boys, but moved along unconcernedly until he reached the Bell Tavern, now the American Hotel, then kept by Hahn, where he stopped and hitched his horse to the sign-post. At that day, Canton received the mail but twice a week, and newspapers were rarely seen; the coming of a stranger never failed to draw a crowd eager to learn the news from the outside world. The old man, however, paid but little attention to them, but kept on talking about the assortment and prices of the tinware he exposed for sale, until some one in the crowd made an ironical remark about his horse, upon which the owner, being quick to see and to improve his opportunity, offered to run him against anything there was in town. Jess Raffensperger, who was then carrying on blacksmithing at the corner diagonally opposite, was the owner of a little gray that, in several competitive trials, had given proof of good racing qualities, and Jess was of the opinion that he was hard to beat, and had intimated his desire to match him against any horse that came to town. John Rex, then a boy of some twelve years of age, was present and heard the peddler's banter to run his old horse against anything there was in town, and he at once ran over and told Raffensperger that there was a man over at Hahn's who wanted a race. Jess immediately dropped his apron and went over to the tavern. When told that the horse hitched to the sign-post was the one it was proposed to run against his little gray, he considered himself badly sold by some one, so mopy and unlike a racer did the old horse appear—like his master, he was playing his role well. But when Jess was convinced that the peddler was in earnest, he felt inclined to humor what he regarded a good joke, and asked the peddler how much he wanted to wager on the race. The latter, taking out his wallet and counting over his money (all in silver) very deliberately, replied, that he had $5, which he was willing to stake on the result. "Oh," said Jess, somewhat contemptuously, "I wouldn't run my horse for less than $25. If you can raise that amount, I'll show you how easy it is to part a fool and his money." That was more than the peddler could raise, he said, but if any gentleman in the crowd would loan him $20, he would give the horse, saddle and tinware as security. By this time, the crowd were getting eager for the race, and were thrown entirely off their guard; so that when another stranger, who had joined them without being observed, stepped forward, and just for the fun of seeing the race, accepted the peddler's security, and advanced the $20, not the least suspicion was aroused, and the stakes were at once put up, and preparations made for the race. The peddler stripped his horse of the tinware and saddle, and sought among the boys for some one to ride his horse; but the old horse's movements were so awkward that the boys, fearing he would stumble and fall, placed too high an estimate on their own necks to accept the position, and the old man was obliged to ride his own horse. Eli Sala rode Raffensperger's horse. The race track, at this time, was just south of town as it was then, from Coulter's house to Frederick's hill, or as it would now be known, on Market street, from the Melchoir

Bros. to the residence of Mr. Peter Housel below the railroads. To this place all parties repaired; judges were selected, and all things were made ready for the race. In the meanwhile the stranger, who had advanced the $20, took all the bets that offered. When the horses were about to start, the peddler's horse exhibited so much spirit that it required two men to hold him until the word was given, and at the word, "Go!" he dashed out like a streak, soon took the lead, and came out at the end several lengths ahead. The Cantonians were badly taken in, and no one more so than Raffensperger himself; his remark about the ease of parting a fool and his money was indeed verified, but "the saddle was on the other horse." He and other citizens, for a long time, were shy of traveling racers, especially of the "sleepy" kind.

In the summer of 1834, a company of enterprising and liberal minded citizens of Canton, had a circular track constructed immediately west of town on land owned then by John Harris, now part of the estate of Simon Miller, deceased. There were races daily, distance from one to four miles and repeat. The horses entered were all blooded stock, and brought here from a distance, the majority of them from West Virginia. The most notable feature of the enterprise, and one that will be longest remembered, was the new gambling devices for the first time introduced into this community known as "ronlette" and "sweat cloth," by which many of our people both from town and country were inveigled into a trial of their "luck;" some escaped with only a slight scorching, while others lost all they had. This track was kept up two seasons, when by a coöperation with parties at Massillon, it was removed to grounds midway between the two towns, and continued there one season more, but as the patronage was not sufficient, the enterprise was abandoned.

Before concluding this chapter on the early settlement and reminiscences of Canton, nothing seems more proper than to give a history of the Oberly Corner, which from the beginning till within a very few years past, has played so important a part in the history of the city. We give it almost verbatim from an article in the Repository of a couple of years ago, and signed by the familiar letters, L. S. It says: "The lot on which the building stood, was sold by Bozaleel Wells, the proprietor of the town, to James F. Leonard, in 1806, the year the town was located. The deed names the consideration $1, from which we would infer it was a gift. Leonard (an uncle of William Barber), was a surveyor and land-jobber, and laid off and platted the town, and was in a position to render Wells' service, and the probabilities are, that the gift was made either for favors received or expected. At this time it was 'hip and thigh' between Osnaburg and Canton, which should be the county seat. This consideration may have been the agreement of Leonard to improve the lot, and put up a building upon it at once. At any rate, the bricks were made the same summer, just outside the original town plat, near where the Schaefer Rink was until lately. As early as the weather would permit in the spring of 1807, work was commenced, and the building was completed and ready for occupancy in the fall, being the first brick house erected in the county. There was no cellar under the house, for the reason that no walling-stone could be procured within a reasonable distance. The first occupant was John Shorb. He came from Maryland that year, and brought with him a small stock of store goods. He remained in it but one year, when Samuel Coulter, from Washington County, Penn., rented it for a tavern. Before the expiration of the year, Coulter bought the property of Leonard, for $600, and put up a frame addition, intended for a dining-room and kitchen. Under this part was a cellar, walled only on two sides, with bowlders. This was the second tavern in Canton, then known by the traveling public as "Coulter's Tavern, sign of the Green Tree." In the winter of 1808-09, a post office was established in Canton, and Coulter was appointed Postmaster. There was but one mail a week, and that was carried on horseback to and from New Lisbon, in Columbiana County. Canton was then on the western border of civilization. All that country west of the Tuscarawas River was given up to roving bands of Indians. The upper story of Coulter's building was partitioned into three rooms. The way up was by a ladder, through a trap door in the floor above. The reason for adopting this mode of ascent does not appear. In this upper story, County Court was held for several sessions. The Hon. Calvin Pease, then President Judge, a resident of Warren, was in the habit of walking from one county seat to another in the discharge of the functions of his office. It was out of the question to travel with a vehicle, and the probability is the Judge preferred walking to riding on horseback. The hole under the frame building was used as a jail. In it there must have been several incarcerated, for there are those still living who remember one imprisoned for debt and one for stealing corn. The County Commissioners also held their sessions in this building. At the April sessions in 1809, it was "ordered that for every wolf or panther scalp, under six months old, 50 cents be paid, and for every one over that age, $1." They also "ordered that Samuel Coulter be paid $3 for the time each session of court was held in his house." John Harris, then a young man of energy, was engaged in teaching school, and doing odd jobs of surveying. He was, also, a fine singer, and at the solicitation of friends, he started a singing-school in the court room of the Coulter tavern. For a time it flourished, but the difficulties and embarrassments encountered by the female scholars in their efforts at climbing the ladder to the second story, deterred them from going, and the school was finally abandoned for want of the female accompaniment. The organization was turned into a debating society. Here they met weekly to discuss "Which affords the greater pleasure, the pursuit, or the possession of an object," or "Which was the greater man, Hannibal or Julius Cæsar?" Sometimes their discussion took a metaphysical turn, and then they had the question, "Is there such a principle in the human mind as disinterested benevolence?" The principal disputants were Samuel Coulter, John Harris, John Patton, uncle of Thomas Patton, Daniel McClure, Roswell Mason, Moses Andrews, William Reynolds, father of John Reynolds, Dr. Stidger, Dr. Jerome and Jeremiah H. Halleck, afterward President Judge of this district, and John Sloan and Col. Gibson, then connected with the land office in Canton. It was in this debating society that John Harris developed that forensic ability, which, in after years, distinguished him as a prominent member of the bar, the compeer of Tappan, Wright, Goodenow, Loomis, Silliman and Tom Ewing, Sr., with all of whom he came in contact. Coulter continued his tavern until 1820, when he concluded to relinquish the business.

He had a farm below town, the same land which is now occupied by several thousand people, known as South Canton. On it he had built a frame house, the one formerly occupied by Mr. Peter Housel. Coulter rented his Canton property to Dr. Thomas Hartford, who came to Canton that spring from New York State. Dr. Hartford was a man of large heart, kind and benevolent. As an instance of his generous feeling, here is an advertisement, copied from the Repository of June 12, 1820:

"Mr. Thomas Hartford HEREBY informs such as are in indigent circumstances, in the county of Stark, that in cases of sickness advice and medicine will be given to them gratis." Imagine a physician of Stark County of the present day, offering to the poor of the county advice and medicine gratuitously. Such examples, however, were no more characteristic of that day than of the present. It is in proof, that a cotemporary physician, for three visits in a case of fever, took the only cow a poor man had. Then no property was exempt from execution for debt, and rather than have her levied upon by the Constable, and sold for what she would bring, he gave her to the rapacious doctor. There is no doubt that Dr. Hartford was sincere in making this proposition, that it was in good faith, and not for "buncombe" or to advertise himself. It is well known that his heart went out in charity for the poor. His munificent bequest to the poor of Canton, which they are enjoying to-day, is only one of the many evidences showing his benevolent disposition. In 1821, Dr. Hartford bought the property from Coulter for $2,000. The price was considered high, but it was in a time of general prosperity, and prices had become inflated. The Doctor had a drug store in the lower room in connection with his practice. In a few years after, his nephew, John Titus, came from the East, and assisted him as clerk. With drugs, he also kept dry goods. There are many still living in Canton who will remember John Titus, from the sport they had as boys at his expense. In 1830, Hartford sold the south half of the lot to Luther L. Foote, his brother-in-law, for $600. As the number of physicians increased in Canton, Dr. Hartford gradually withdrew from practice. He continued his store, and would prescribe for all who applied without charge. He was then in good circumstances, owning considerable real estate in and around Canton. He never had any children. Mrs. Hartford was much like her husband, and was a very estimable lady, highly esteemed by all who enjoyed her personal acquaintance. Lawyer Metcalf, of Canton, a particular friend of Dr. Hartford's, removed to Pittsburgh, and in a year or two after induced the Doctor to follow him. Following the Doctor's removal, the property was occupied by different parties as renters. Canton at that time was flat, Massillon taking the lead, and the rent was merely nominal. Among the different occupants remembered was Joe Parker, a tailor, with a wooden leg, who for several years was bell-ringer. At that time a town ordinance required the court house bell to be rung at 8:30 A. M., at 12 M. and at 9 P. M. The ringing at night was the signal for the stores to close, work to cease in the mechanic shops, the boys to leave the streets, and everybody to retire to their virtuous couches. The apprenticeship system was then in vogue, and men in the mechanical arts worked fifteen hours a day. There were no saloons. Topers kept their whisky at home, or got it at the taverns. The only luxury to be had in town was spruce beer and gingerbread. But we are wandering from the text. Dr. Hartford sold the corner half, including the brick house, in 1839, to John Bauer, for $1,500. Bauer opened a grocery, which, in after years, partook of the character of a saloon. Bauer was County Recorder from 1843 to 1845. In 1849, he sold out to a company composed of Henry Somers, David and John Garber and Abram Richards. They rented the property to Christian Oberly, who purchased it in 1861, for the same they gave. During the time Mr. Oberly occupied the old brick and its back addition, and the property adjoining it on the south he has used it as an eating house and saloon. In the year 1877, Mr. Oberly sold twenty-three feet front and two hundred back to the alley in the rear, to Sherrick & Miller, for $10,000. During flush times he could easily have had double that amount. Sherrick & Miller, one of our best established hardware firms, both of them gentlemen of great business capacity, of great experience particularly in their line of business, and of strict integrity and morality, tore down the old corner building, the old time-honored brick that had weathered the storms of more than seventy years, and erected in its place their splendid three-story brick building, twenty-three feet by one hundred and eleven, in the year 1879, and as soon as it was finished removed their business into it. The building is both a credit to them and an honor to the city. The old one had a checkered experience, and was equally honored in its day; but all old things must yield to the progressive spirit of the age.

Everything almost of a tangible nature having reference to the original incorporation of the village or town of Canton has been lost, and, so far as we have been able to learn, after the most diligent inquiry, there is no one now living among us able to give definite information on the subject. But from an act passed by the General Assembly, entitled "An act to incorporate the town of Canton," in March, 1838, when C. Anthony was Speaker of the House of Representatives, and George I. Smith was Speaker of the Senate, in Section 18 of said act, we find a repealing clause referring to a preceding act for the same purpose, as follows: "That the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the town of Canton, in the county of Stark,' passed the thirtieth day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-two; and the act entitled 'An act to amend the act entitled, An act to incorporate the town of Canton, in the county of Stark,' passed February ninth, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, be, and the same is hereby repealed." As early as the year 1822, therefore, Canton was an incorporated town or village; from some later public action, it seems that incorporated town and incorporated village were at that time treated as synonymous terms. The act of 1838 provided for a division of the town into four wards, bounded precisely as the four wards of the city are at this time. It provided for a Town Council consisting of the Mayor, Recorder, and two members of each ward, and into the hands of this body "the government of said town, and the exercise of its corporate powers" were vested. In August of the same year, 1838, the names of John Myers, Mayor, and of Arnold Lynch, Recorder, appear upon the ordinance book. In May, 1839, from the same source we find that Jacob Rex was Mayor, and D. A. Agnew, Recorder. On the old ordinance book we find the last ordinance of the Town Council, entitled "An ordinance to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors and for other purposes," passed Aug. 14, 1852, attested by Benjamin F. Leiter, Mayor, and J. B. Estep, Recorder, and then two blank pages evidently left for recording some other ordinances, which for some reason or other was never done, and the next ordinance recorded is in the name of the "Incorporated Village of Canton," passed in July, 1853, and is attested by John Lahm, Mayor, and J. B. Estep, Recorder. The explanation of this apparently anomalous change of names is probably found in the fact that after the adoption of the new constitution of the State, in 1852, the Legislature, early in 1853, passed an act whereby a new classification of towns was ordained, and Canton, under the law, became an incorporated village. About this time, viz., July, 1853, with a change in the name of the corporation, there seems to have been a general overhauling of the older ordinances for the direction of the Mayor, the Recorder, the Marshals and the Treasurer, and prescribing their duties, as well as ordinances regulating the liquor traffic and providing against offenses of various kinds opposed to the public morality. The village organization, however, continued only about one year, when, under authority of the same law by which she had become a village, an act of the Village Council, March 22, 1854, changed Canton into a city of the second class; and under the present classification it is in the third grade of second class cities. John Lahm at this time was still Mayor, and James B. Estep, Recorder. After this time, the ordinances were attested by the President of the Council, and the Clerk of the city. Thomas Goodman was the first President, and James B. Estep, the first Clerk under the new organization. This organization of Canton continues substantially the same to the present time.

THE war of 1812 greatly interfered with immigration Westward, and the tide did not set in again with much vigor until some years after it was over. Still, quite a number of families, many of whose descendants are still residing here, came in after the war, and before the year 1820. Among these may be enumerated the Buckins, the Dunbar, the Rex, the Saxton, the Myers, the Sherrick, the Danner, the Kitzmiller, the Hanes, the Trump, the Hippy, the White, the Sprinkle, the Smith, the Bucher, the Webb and the Whipple families, with others whose names have not been learned. When immigration commenced again, Canton had the steady and gradual growth characteristic of most other Western towns at the time. One of the greatest hindrances in the way of progress was the lack of facilities for carrying to market the surplus products of the surrounding country. At that time there were no railroads, there was no canal, and the ordinary roads in poor condition and impassable for heavily-loaded teams a great part of the year. Consequently, such articles as butter and eggs brought only a nominal price, and even wheat, oats and corn were extremely low. The ordinary prices of these things were before 1830 as follows: Eggs, 4 cents a dozen; butter, 6 cents a pound; wheat from 25 to 30 cents a bushel, and corn and oats from 12 to 15 cents, and that not in cash, but in trade. Of course every navigable stream was regarded as an inestimable feature of the country through which it passed; Canton, in the forks of Nimishillen Creek, was at the head of navigation. Boats, called pirogues, capable of carrying a ton, were in common use for ordinary transportation, and flat-boats for flour, bacon and whisky. These started just below town, and their usual destination was New Orleans. In the earlier days, before the country was cleared up, the usual stage of water in the Nimishillen and Tuscarawas was much higher than after, and this made navigation, at least part of the year, possible for light craft; but at the best it was difficult, and attended with much risk to property. The pirogue and flat-boat furnished a partial relief, but by no means all that the wants of a rapidly developing country called for. The completion of the Ohio Canal, in 1830, gave a new impetus to general business and the farming interest of the country far and wide, but it was a severe blow to the commercial interests of Canton. The Ohio Canal was eight miles distant, and on its bank a new and rival town sprang up, and soon became the center of trade for fifty or sixty miles around. Massillon's prosperity and rapid growth worked great disadvantage to the interests of Canton for many years, and excited a jealousy between the two towns which was not removed for a great while. To offset the advantage of the canal to Massillon, a number of enterprising citizens of Canton projected the Nimishillen and Sandy Slackwater Navigation Company, for the purpose of building a canal along the Nimishillen Creek to connect with the Sandy and Beaver. Work was commenced and considerable was done toward constructing this branch canal, in anticipation of the great impetus it would give again to business; there was a temporary revival, and in view of immense profits to insure speedily, much property at high prices, changed hands; but, alas! for human hopes and expectations. A panic followed, when work had but rightly commenced, and the enterprise was abandoned; those who had bought property at high figures a short time before suffered loss. The failure of this project put even a greater damper on the prospects of Canton. For twenty years there was but little improvement, if there was not indeed an actual retrogression. Massillon became noted as the wheat city, and went rapidly forward, and Canton stood still. So it continued until the year 1851, when the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad was located just south of the town, as it was at that day; this road went into operation in the early part of 1852, as far west as Massillon. The railroad company did not always act in the most favorable way toward Canton, nor did they assist any by offering special facilities in building up her interests; it is even claimed by some that there was a constant disposition to discriminate against her, until when, within a very few years, the opening up of the Valley Railroad to Cleveland gave a new outlet East and West to Canton industries. In view of the early completion of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, nevertheless, Ball, Aultman & Co., determined to remove their works from Greentown to Canton to avail themselves of the advantages of the new railroad, secured lots on the line of the road, erected their buildings, and, in the latter part of 1851, they brought their tools and fixtures from Greentown to Canton, and a brighter day began at once to dawn upon this city; the gloom and depression of many years gradually removed, and Canton again entered upon the march of progress, which has gone on steadily forward ever since, with but little interruption, and that but temporary. As the removal of this business to Canton is the date of a new era, it will, undoubtedly, be of great service to the younger portion of our citizens, and to after generations of Canton's children, as well as eminently just to the memory of the honored members of the firm, to put in permanent form a complete history of the rise and progress of these works in Canton, as we find it in the Chicago Commercial Advertiser, of February 26, 1880, which is acknowledged as accurate and satisfactory, as follows:

When it is considered that within the brief period of a quarter of a century the wonderfully effective mowing-machine of to-day has been brought to its present stage of perfection by the pre-eminent genius and skill of American inventors, the mind dwells upon the fact with unstinted admiration, heightened by the thought of how completely this marvelous aid to the husbandman has revolutionized the methods of agricultural pursuits. The model and progressive farmer of the present day may well look back a couple of decades and wonder how he possibly could have accomplished his harvesting by the tedious processes then commonly employed—how he ever could have garnered his crops with the old-fashioned scythe, sickle and grain cradle. Certain it is that were it not for our labor-saving agricultural machines, this country would not now enjoy her proud position of being the principal grain-producing and world-feeding nation, whereby her wealth is augmented by hundreds of millions of dollars annually. The mechanical facilities thus supplied have within a few years given a surprising impetus to the development of our agricultural resources, and by their great economy in gathering the crops, have enabled us to beat the world in producing cheap breadstuffs, as our gratifying export statistics plainly indicate. The invention and perfection of American harvesting machinery, then, may rightly be regarded as one of the chief promoters of our country's rapid development and remarkable prosperity; and in the light of this fact, it seems almost incredible that the original introduction into use of these now indispensable auxiliaries to the successful cultivation of the soil was attended with very serious obstacles, not the least of which was the strong prejudice and opposition manifested by farmers and farm laborers to the employment of these "new fangled" devices. Deeming that a concise and accurate history of the mowing machine and kindred farm apparatus would prove of interest to many people, and in view of the fact that the city of Canton is the recognized headquarters in this line of production, we have devoted considerable time to collating information upon this interesting subject.

The opening of this historical sketch takes us back to the year 1848, when in the little rural borough of Greentown, a village of some 300 souls, situate about nine miles north of Canton, Mr. Cornelius Aultman, who had learned the machinist's trade, made the patterns and built on his own account five of the old Hussey Reapers—the first machines of the kind ever made in Ohio, with the exception of a few made at Martin's Ferry, opposite Wheeling, in the year previous. Mr. Michael Dillman, a progressive farmer with ample means, living near Greensburg, Summit Co., had purchased and used one of these machines during the season, and was so well pleased with its work that he proposed joining Mr. Aultman in his new undertaking, and accordingly, in the spring of 1849, they both removed to Plainfield, Will Co., Ill., where they constructed these machines for two seasons—some thirty-seven in all—and the neighboring farmers came to their shop and bought them readily. The Hussey was a one-wheeled machine, adapted only for reaping purposes. In the spring of 1850, Mr. Hussey, of Baltimore, Md., the inventor of this machine, but who had done very little toward manufacturing and introducing it, learning that it was being successfully produced in the West, concluded that it was worth looking after, journeyed to Illinois and informed the makers that he held patents on the machine, and claimed royalty on all that had been turned out. They finally settled the matter by paying him $15 on each machine.

After the close of the harvest season, in 1850, Mr. Aultman sold out his interest at Plainfield, and returned to Greentown in December of that year. The manufacture of the Hussey machine was continued at Plainfield for a time, and the business was subsequently removed to Joliet, Ill., where the same machine was manufactured for a number of years, and afterward the Bell machine, until about 1858, when the proprietors there secured a license to build the Buckeye machines. After Mr. Aultman's return to Greentown, Mr. Ephraim Ball, manifesting much confidence in him, wanted him to buy an interest in the foundry located there, then run in the name of Wise & Ball. Mr. Aultman had contemplated returning again to the West, but said if Mr. Ball would consent to move the establishment, within three years, to a more eligible locality, he would take an interest therein. This was agreed to, and he thereupon, about March 1, 1851, purchased the one-third interest of Michael Wise, and a like interest of Lewis Acker, in the foundry. Shortly afterward, Mr. Aultman transferred a one-sixth interest to his brother-in-law, David Fouser, one-sixth to George Cook, who was a wagon-maker by trade, and one-sixth to his stepbrother, Lewis Miller, leaving Mr. Aultman one-sixth interest, and Mr. Ball one-third. The firm now became Ball, Aultman & Co., and they at once proceeded to enlarge their business. For the season of 1851, they turned out twelve Hussey machines and six threshers, all of which were sold to farmers in the vicinity. But the firm did not have absolute "plain sailing" in disposing of their machines, inasmuch as there was a strong feeling of prejudice existing in the minds of farmers and farm hands against the radical "innovation." In this connection, many things occurred that were positively amusing, while other situations were equally perplexing. But these prejudices and hard feelings gradually wore away, and after two or three years had elapsed, and the farming community generally had begun to properly appreciate the valuable aid furnished by harvesting machinery, the bitter contest well nigh ceased. The Hussey machine, as we have said, worked well as a reaper, but could not be used as a mower. A demand sprang up for a device that would meet this want, and in answer thereto, the Ketcham Mower was invented, and placed on the market, in 1851, and in 1852, quite a number of these machines were put into use. About the same time, the Allen Mower, made in the vicinity of New York City, was introduced. Both of these were one-wheeled machines, and did not meet with marked success.

After the harvest of 1851, the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne and Chicago Railway, having then been graded, and soon ready to be opened to Canton, Messrs. Ball and Aultman came to the latter place, and looked over the ground, with the view to securing better manufacturing and shipping facilities. They selected three lots on the line of the new railway, each 45x40 feet, being a part of the present site of their works, returned and reported to their associates what they could do, and thereupon, they unanimously decided to remove to Canton. The committee immediately came here and consummated the purchase. Mr. Aultman, who was recognized as manager, moved to Canton, on the 16th of September following, and put up brick buildings—wood-shop, 40x60 feet; finishing-shop, 55x40 feet; and molding-shop, 65x40 feet, the former two, of two stories, the last, of one. In December, 1851, they transported their tools and fixtures from Greentown to Canton, and commenced operations. A stock company was then formed, each partner putting in what he could, and sharing the profits in ratio thereto. At this juncture, Mr. Jacob Miller, farmer, and brother of Lewis Miller, became a copartner, contributing to the capital the sum of $1,000. An inventory of the tools, etc., was taken, and each of the five copartners (Ephraim Ball, Cornelius Aultman, George Cook, Lewis Miller and Jacob Miller) was credited with his proportionate interest. The total capital of the company, when they started in Canton, including material, property at Greentown, and estimated value of "good will," was $4,500. For the harvest of 1852, they built twenty-five Hussey Machines, with six-foot iron finger-bars, to be used as mowers, being intended for combined machines. They worked satisfactorily as reapers, but, for several reasons, they failed as practical mowers. In the fall of 1852, up to which time Mr. Aultman had done the buying and selling, and keeping books for the concern, he went to Illinois, and there made the acquaintance of Thomas R. Tonner, who was known as a good book-keeper, and being favorably impressed, prevailed upon him to come to Canton, and keep their books. When Tonner arrived here he had just a dime in his pocket. He proved a valuable man, as he was very systematic, and regulated things generally. He was made the Cashier, and the partners had to go to him when they wanted money. Before that, they were in the habit of helping themselves, when there was cash in the till, each one charging himself with whatever sum he appropriated. When clerking in Pennsylvania, Tonner had got accustomed to the ways of that region, one of which was a trifle unbusiness-like, to wit, when a note fell due, it was not considered as a compromise of credit to allow it to go unhonored for a week or so. He started out in Canton with this notion clinging to him, but Aultman said they must take care of their notes, in order to maintain their credit, to his mind a very important matter. Tonner soon saw this in the same light, and looked well after the notes, even if by so doing, the firm were obliged to do without pocket-money for a time. To this well-established credit, they attribute their successful weathering of the panic of 1857, as, had it not been for their reputation for commercial honor, they could not have passed through that trying ordeal unscathed. The business of the company so rapidly increased, that it was found necessary to procure additional clerical assistance, and in 1855, Mr. James S. Tonner, brother of Thomas, was employed as book-keeper, after which, the latter was enabled to devote more time to the general business. A few weeks after T. R. Tonner came here, in 1852, Mr. Aultman bought out Fouser's one-sixth interest, and turned it over to Tonner, thus laying the foundation of the handsome fortune he amassed before his death. For the harvest of 1853, they built twenty-five Hussey Reapers, and also twenty-five of the Bell Machines, the latter intended for both mower and reaper. In 1853, having abandoned the idea of making a combined machine, they turned their attention to the work of devising a practical single mower. In that summer, the Ketcham machine, having achieved some measure of success, a committee of three, consisting of Ball, Aultman and Lewis Miller, were appointed to get up a mower. Ball was a pattern-maker by trade, and made the patterns for the concern. The committee put their heads together, and as the result of protracted consultation, study and experiment, they constructed in the same year, a mower, a light, small affair, and subjected it to a practical test, but it did not prove a success for all kinds of grass. They kept busily at work, nevertheless, and originated another one-wheeled machine, somewhat different from the first, and it seemed, on the initiative trial, to be entirely satisfactory. Accordingly, they built eight or ten of this pattern, and sold six or eight of them in 1853. But their fortune was not yet assured, for the machines were found too weak; they all broke down, and were returned as worthless. Some of the company got discouraged, but Mr. Aultman said, "try again." Before it was ascertained that the machines were an absolute failure, the harvest of 1853 was over. The committee was continued, and during that fall, Mr. Aultman made a drawing for a two-wheeled machine, the first attempt ever made to devise such a mower. This drawing was submitted to Ball and Miller, who made some suggestions as to modifications therein, and from that drawing, after some months of patient effort, was at length evolved what was known as Ball's Ohio Mower. The first machine of this style was built in the summer of 1854. Mr. Ball was the pattern-maker, and Mr. Aultman, the superintendent. The model was made and the patents applied for in the fall of 1854. Interference was eventually declared between Ball's application and one made by Jonathan Haines, of Pekin, Ill., which was contested. Haines proving priority on some of his claims as presented at the Patent Office, a patent was granted to him, in August, 1854. Thereupon, Mr. Aultman went to Pekin, and bought of Haines the right to manufacture for the State of Ohio.

In the spring of 1855, Ball, Aultman & Co. commenced to build some twenty-five of the Ohio machines, and had everything ready to erect, when, on the 5th of May following, fire destroyed their main buildings and contents, including all the machines. Just as the company were in a fair way to establish a flourishing business, this disaster not only robbed the firm of their all, but left them deeply in debt. Right here, the firm realized the advantage of taking care of their credit, and of promptly meeting their obligations previously. Having good credit, fortified by a reputation for strict integrity, they progressed with the buildings, and by the 1st of August, in less than three months after the fire occurred, the new works were completed, the machinery was set up, and everything in readiness for a fresh start. While the shops were being rebuilt, they put wood benches into a shed that had escaped the conflagration, and by dint of hard work, they turned out, by hand, five mowers and twelve Hussey reapers for the harvest of 1855. On the 1st of August, they started up the works, and ran night and day. Fortunately for them, the harvest of that year was an abundant one, and consequently, the demand for machines was active. Farmers were so anxious to secure them that they would come in and engage machines not yet constructed, and pay for them in advance. This proved quite a godsend to the struggling firm, as it aided them materially in tiding over their existing financial stress. After starting up, they built some twenty threshers before the season was over, and could have disposed of a much larger number. The next winter, they went courageously to work, and constructed 500 Ohio Mowers, fifty Hussey reapers, and fifty Pitts threshers, for the harvest of 1856. Aultman and Miller, desiring to get up a more simple machine than the Ohio, went to work, and devised the first Buckeye Mower (called originally the Aultman & Miller machine), a two-wheeled rear-cut implement, and in June, 1856, secured a patent on a double-rule hinge, which allowed the finger-bar to be raised vertically, thus facilitating transportation to and from the field. Only one of the rear-cut machines was built, and in the fall of 1856, it was changed to a front-cut, an approved principle that has ever since been adhered to. For the harvest of 1857, they built 1,000 Ohio machines, some six or seven of the new Buckeye, 100 threshers, and fifty Hussey reapers. In July of that year, both the Buckeye and the Ohio were practically tested in a competitive field-trial, at Hamilton, Ohio, and the Buckeye came out ahead. Encouraged by this success, one of each, of the Buckeye and Ohio machines, were taken to the famous field-trial at Syracuse, in the same month, held under the auspices of the United States Agricultural Society. When the trial came off, every spectator was greatly elated with the easy, neat work of the Buckeye, and the judgment was in its favor, corroborated by the award thereto of the highest prize, the grand gold medal. In February, 1858, Ball sold his interest in the firm, and then went to work and put up his own buildings, in the same year. In 1859, he placed the Ohio Mower on the market, in competition with the Buckeye, continuing to build it up to about 1865. When Mr. Ball retired from the firm of Ball, Aultman & Co., the style of the house changed to C. Aultman & Co., under which it has won its enviable honors the world over, and this title has continued ever since. In the fall of 1857, they had enlarged their works 40 by 120 feet, a three-story brick structure, thus doubling their capacity, so that they were well prepared to take advantage of the "boom" they felt sure they were to experience, by reason of the splendid success of the Buckeye at the fairs of that season.

For the season of 1858, Messrs. Aultman & Co. built not far from 1,500 Buckeye mowers and 150 threshers. In this year, they commenced to make a practical success of the combined machine, with reaper attachment. In the fall of 1858, this machine was exhibited very generally all over the country, and also participated in almost innumerable field trials, sometimes at three or four at the same time in different sections, and it almost invariably took the first premiums.

In June, 1858, patents were granted on the front-cut Buckeye, application having been made therefor in the fall of 1857. This was a transfer from rear to front-cut, requiring a radical change in the organization of the machine; the most important feature of improvement inhering in the folding of the cutter over the front of the frame, allowing it to lie flat, securing unequaled convenience in transportation, and giving the Buckeye the pronounced lead over all competing harvesting machines. "It shut right up like a jack-knife," and was propelled on the road as easily as a two-wheeled cart. Aultman & Co. retained control of this valuable improvement, and no other make of machine could adopt it.

They continued to sedulously experiment, making improvements from year to year in minor details, upon which they secured patents, taking out some twenty different patents, exclusive of those granted in 1858. For the season of 1859 they turned out 1,800 Buckeye mowers and reapers and 150 threshers, which number would have been considerably increased had it not been for the killing frosts in June of that year. They had licensed to build the Buckeye for certain territory. Running out of machines at Canton, they bought a number from the licensors and sold them in their territory. They invented an attachment to the Buckeye whereby the binding of grain was done by two men riding on the machine, of which they built but a few and only for that season. Their machines continued to be exhibited at fairs and tested at field trials, coming off victorious in every honorable contest. This extraordinary success greatly stimulated popular demand, and for the harvest of 1860 they constructed about 2,300 of the Buckeye and over 200 threshers. For 1861 they turned out 2,600 Buckeye machines and some 260 threshers. Notwithstanding the augmented production and the breaking out of the war, the demand was in excess of the supply, as the crops of that season were excellent. The means of the firm accumulated, so that they were now able to pay cash for their materials. For the harvest of 1862 they built over 3,000 of the Buckeye and upward of 300 threshers. Their trade now extended over a large territory, even to California, and into all parts of the Union, except that portion of the South which the war shut out from our commerce. In 1863, they constructed no less than 3,600 mowers and reapers and nearly 400 threshers. This was to them a very busy season, for they again greatly enlarged their works. In the fall and winter of 1862-63, their present commodious office building was erected, and during the summer of 1863 the capacity of their blacksmith shop was doubled, and a large molding shop, more than three times the size of the former one, was built. They also put in a fine 125 horse-power engine and a full complement of improved machinery. The demand for their agricultural machines had increased so rapidly, and their shipping facilities at Canton were so poor (fortunately, this drawback will not exist much longer), that they recognized the necessity of "branching out," and having carefully looked over the ground they finally determined to locate a branch establishment at Akron, that point seeming to afford the requisite additional advantages for their manufacturing purposes. Accordingly, in the fall of 1863 they commenced putting up their buildings in that city, and got out there 500 machines for the harvest of 1864. Lewis Miller removed to Akron and became superintendent of the establishment there. These works have since been materially enlarged and improved, until they now turn out from 11,000 to 12,000 machines per year, employing at the present time nearly 500 mechanics.

In 1864, the firm built about 4,500 mowers and reapers and 425 threshers, and in 1865, they built both at Canton and Akron about 8,000 Buckeye machines and 500 threshers. In March of that year, Mr. Thomas R. Tonner, one of the partners, died. He became an invalid in 1859, and was not able thereafter to confine himself closely to business. The decedent had constructed a will making liberal bequests to relatives, and turning over the residue of his estate to Mr. Aultman for management.

In the fall of 1865, for the better organization of their immense business, both concerns were incorporated separately, under the State laws. The incorporators at Canton were C. Aultman, Lewis Miller, Jacob Miller and George Cook; and those at Akron were C. Aultman, Lewis Miller, John R. Buchtel and George W. Crouse. The original capital of the corporation at Canton, which was continued under the style of C. Aultman & Co., was $450,000, which in 1870 was increased to $1,000,000, and about three years ago to $1,500,000. The first officers of the corporation of C. Aultman & Co. were: C. Aultman, President; John Tonner, Secretary; James S. Tonner, Treasurer; Jacob Miller, Superintendent. The original capital of the Akron concern was $300,000, and about three years ago it was augmented to $1,000,000. This establishment was incorporated under the style of Aultman, Miller & Co., with the following officers: John R. Buchtel, President; George W. Crouse, Secretary and Treasurer; Lewis Miller, Superintendent.

About the year 1871, they commenced to export machines to European countries, and the foreign demand for the world-famed products of this establishment have since largely increased. They have won many honors at exhibitions and field trials abroad, and the "Buckeye" reaper and mower, "Sweepstakes" thresher and Canton Monitor engine are coming to be approximately as well known and highly appreciated across the Atlantic and Pacific as they are at home.

At the present time, no part of the original buildings of C. Aultman & Co. is remaining, as at different times they have been rebuilt. In 1868, a considerable portion of the present colossal structures was put up, and from time to time they have continued replacing the old with the new, making extensive enlargements and modern improvements, until now they are entitled to the credit of having the largest agricultural machine manufactory in the world. A brief summing-up of the merits and advantages and most notable triumphs of the several Buckeye machines, followed by a sketch of the works of C. Aultman & Co., fitly concludes this article.

Ever since the famous national field trial of mowing machines at Syracuse, N. Y., in July, 1857, when the "Buckeye" was awarded the highest prize, the grand gold medal, over all competing machines, its onward march in popular world-wide favor has been marked by a succession of brilliant triumphs in numerous competitive field trials with all other makes of mowers, not only on this continent, but in foreign countries as well—winning the laurels of victory in every fair and honorable contest.

The frame of the Buckeye mower is made of cast iron, in one piece, braced with wrought iron. It is strong, stiff, and not at all liable to get out of line. The gearing is still constructed on the same admirable plan that was originally adopted for this machine. The system, one set of bevel gears to give the first and slower motion, and the spur gears to give the last and accelerated speed, is universally conceded to be the best, simplest, safest and most durable and perfect ever devised. Rival manufacturers have long cudged their brains in desperate efforts to bring forth a system of gearing or some original motion which would approach the Buckeye in simplicity and efficiency, but they have been compelled to give up in despair. The summing up of the principal advantages of the Buckeye comprehends its scientific simplicity and perfection of construction, superior strength and durability, thoroughness of work, lightness of draft, facility of operation and immunity from danger of serious accident to the driver. The new automatic side-delivery reaper is one of the greatest inventions of the age, and is built and sold only in connection with the Buckeye mower. The pronounced superiority of this apparatus, as compared with the so-called "reel-rake," is clearly manifest in its admirable operation. It will cut nearly 14 per cent, or about one-seventh, more grain per day, than any reel-rake having the same length cutter-bar, the horses walking at the same rate. Moreover, the Buckeye is guaranteed to have no equal in lodged and tangled grain, as is proven by the testimony of many practical, reliable farmers who have thoroughly tested its admirable qualities under the most adverse circumstances.

The Buckeye dropper is a prime favorite with the farmers who do not raise very large crops, because it is the simplest form of reaper; the easiest to handle and operate; its work is equal to the best, and it is the least expensive. With the Buckeye as a dropper, the driver is enabled to drop the gavel at the proper time, which obviates scattering the grain, and being a front-cut machine, the platform is immediately under the driver's eye, thus relieving him of the straining and wearisome effort of constantly looking behind to ascertain the size of the gavel, while his attention should be upon the team and watching for obstructions. Taken in connection with the Buckeye, this is unquestionably the safest, simplest, most economical and reliable harvesting machine ever produced.

The Buckeye Harvester is on every hand acknowledged to be the leading light-draft harvester in the field. In cutting with this machine, the cut grain falls directly upon a traveling endless apron, transmitting it to the double canvas elevator, which deposits it all upon the binding table. Two men bind the sheaves, laying the bundles upon a slatted table, until half a shock is gathered, when all is dropped ready for shocking. It is claimed that with regard to perfect proportions, superior material and workmanship, simplicity and strength, ease of management, excellent finish and great capacity, the Buckeye harvester stands without a peer. These harvesters are so made that a self-binding attachment can readily be affixed subsequently, should it be desired. The many advantageous conveniences of this popular machine need only be seen to be appreciated.

The Buckeye self-binder machine did not enter the competitive field as early as some others, but in the few seasons that it has been in the market, its success has been such as to win the highest encomiums of praise from all who have given it a fair trial. Messrs. Aultman & Co. promise for the harvest of 1881 a self-binder with important improvements, placing it as to intrinsic merit in advance of anything in this line ever brought before the public. In construction, it is singularly simple, and therefore not at all liable to get out of order, while in all its working parts the most ingenious devices are adopted to secure the most satisfactory results from its use. It is a wonderful labor-saver, requires but little attention in operation, and is destined to triumph over all competition. It uses less wire than any other binder; the tightness of the band is regulated by a tension, speedily adjusted, and this tightness is limited only by the strength of the wire. The grain saved by the binder will pay for the wire consumed. A host of those who have used this admirable device testify that it proves all that is claimed for it in every description of grain.

For the long period of twenty-nine years the incomparable Sweepstakes thresher has been manufactured by Messrs. C. Aultman & Co., and they have spared neither effort nor expense to bring it to a state of absolute perfection. The practical record of the Sweepstakes exhibits a series of magnificent successes that is altogether without a parallel, and it is such as to afford the purchaser the most emphatic guarantee of entire satisfaction in its use. Great improvements have been made from year to year, and sufficient time has elapsed to thoroughly test the threshers, as now built, in all conditions of grain, as well as in flax, timothy, clover and rice. No other thresher has been so severely tested, and the grand result fully justifies its manufacturers in claiming for the Sweepstakes the championship of the thresher family in America.

The needs of threshermen for a better engine than had ever been built had long been pressed upon the attention of the manufacturers of the Buckeye machines. Forced by these requirements upon them, in the centennial year they commenced the construction of the "Monitor" engine. The best skilled advice and the ripest experience of the most practical threshers and mechanics were brought into requisition to aid them in making the portable engine which would be pronounced nearest perfect. After fully consulting every plan presented, they made choice of the vertical engine and boiler, of the model upon which the Monitor is built. It was exactly adapted to a special field of operations, and the satisfaction rendered by it has been so perfect that it cannot be overstated, and its decided advantages over other engines are attested by the emphatic and unsolicited approbation of all who have used it. Every year, so far, the number required of them has been greatly in excess of the manufacturing capacity of the works, and this has compelled them to make a large addition to their shops, which will double their facilities for turning out these universally approved engines.

Parties who have experimentally tested the Canton Monitor Traction Engine, and those who have had it in use during the last two years, speak in unqualified terms of its extraordinary working qualities, pronouncing it a perfect success in all respects. For propelling, threshing and machinery operating purposes it stands without a rival. A farmer who has thoroughly tested it says: "It has so far answered every call upon its resources, and is always ready for use. I have a Taylor & Chandler muley side-cut saw-mill, and your 10-horse engine drives it at the rate of 400 to 500 strokes per minute, and the thing works like a charm. I am now running a full line of flax machinery, consisting of a roller gang break, beater, picker, etc., and have abundant power. I prefer the Monitor because the number of flues gives a greater heating surface. The boiler being perpendicular, the action of the fire comes directly upon the heating surface. It requires less fuel and also a shorter time to raise steam. The cylinder, placed between the steam chest and the heater, is protected from the cold atmosphere—therefore there is less condensing in the cylinder and less bilging; and being perpendicular, it is not liable to become untrue through the wear of the weight of the machinery, as is the case in a horizontal engine. As a traction or locomotive engine, I consider it superior." The compound or "jack-in-the-box" gear is a very ingenious device, whereby one wheel may be made to revolve independent of the other, so that in turning, the wheel going the faster receives the greater power, thus enabling the engine to be headed in any desired direction with great facility. No other portable engine has this admirable feature. The independent steam pump for supplying and emptying the boiler, which can be run with or without the main engine, is also a most advantageous adjunct. A massive sprocket chain running over sprocket wheels communicates the power from the fly-wheel to the counter-shaft, which is much stronger, more direct and reliable than the bevel gearing ordinarily used. Among the latest improvements is the link motion, similar to that of the locomotive, whereby the engine can be propelled forward or backward without stopping. The speed on the road is regulated by a governor, while the starting and stopping, reversing and steering, are under perfect control of the engineer without leaving his seat. It is fitted up with all necessary steam engine connections, and the gear is encased in order to exclude all dust and dirt. The whole engine rests on rubber springs, preventing concussion, and all in all it is the most complete and successful traction engine ever invented.

This colossal establishment took its start in Canton in the year 1851, with a working capital not exceeding $4,500. The original proprietors were Cornelius Aultman, Lewis Miller, Jacob Miller and George Cook, the latter now deceased. They and their associates were the original inventors and patentees of all the Buckeye harvesting machines. The more recent additions to their list of successful manufactures are the Buckeye Self-Binding Harvester, the Canton Monitor Engine, and the Traction Road Engine, all of which are well calculated to conserve the exalted reputation of this house for producing the most celebrated and efficient agricultural machines in the world. The works embrace the following named structures: Building for threshing and wood-working machinery, brick, 400 by 50 feet, four floors. Reaper warehouse, brick, 181 by 60 feet, four floors. Iron machinery building, brick, 147 by 60 feet, four floors. Iron finishing building, brick, 70 by 60 feet, three floors. Core, pattern and engine house, brick, 150 by 60 feet, two floors. Engine shop, brick, 302 by 50 feet, two floors. Molding room, brick, 125 by 75 feet, one floor. Blacksmith shop and iron room, brick, 313 by 41 feet, one floor. Five acres of wooden structures, comprising wagon shop, boiler works, testing house, paint shops, store-rooms for thresher and engines, etc. These structures have a total floor area of 459,528 square feet, or upward of ten and a half acres, being some three and a half acres larger than the next largest agricultural implement works in existence. This mammoth establishment has eleven distinct departments, giving employment to an aggregate of 550 skilled workmen, the monthly pay-roll amounting to $25,000. The motive power comprises two engines each of 120-horse power, and one engine of 50-horse. Their products find a ready and expanding market in both hemispheres. While at the works, we noticed a shipment of their world-celebrated machines to Algiers, Africa. They have branch offices and supply depots at Paris, France, London, England, Baltimore, Chicago, Cincinnati, and other leading distributing points, while they also have general and local agents in all the agricultural sections.

Agricultural machinery has revolutionized the pursuits of the farmer throughout the civilized world, and Canton may justly be proud of the pre-eminence which the success of C. Aultman & Co.'s works have achieved for her. Their growth and development have been coincident with her own, and in the past history of Canton they have been a very great part of that growth. But, in addition to the above described works, and the brief history of the Ball works included therein, the citizens of Canton are equally proud of her other manufacturing interests that within the past few years have assumed such large proportions. The history and description of those that follow we glean from the same source as that which precedes. And first we call attention to the Peerless Reaper and Mower, which was invented and originally brought out by Mr. W. K. Miller in the year 1857, and put on the market by Russell & Co., of Massillon, Ohio. It was the third successful two-wheeled mowing machine with flexible finger-bar, being preceded in its introduction by only Ball's Ohio and the Buckeye. The distinctive and patentable feature in the Peerless was the manner of connecting the finger-bar and cutters to the main frame. The original patents were issued to Mr. Miller, the inventor, in 1857. The Peerless was the first successful two-wheeled reaper, in this, that it was the initial introduction of a practically operative flexible reel. Formerly, the two-wheeled machine had carried the raker on the main truck, who reeled in the grain by hand and discharged the sheaf on gavel in the rear of the platform; or placed him on the platform, so that the gavel was discharged with a hay fork—both of which plans were objectionable. But in the Peerless the reel was made to conform to the inequalities of the ground, as did likewise the finger-bar—these parts acting independently in their up and down movements of the main truck, while in their progressive course they were controlled by the truck upon which the raker was seated, who discharged the gavels at one side of the platform, with an ordinary hand rake, leaving room for the machine on its return cut. The Peerless was the first machine to adopt the valuable device whereby the finger-bar could be successfully folded and carried in a perpendicular position, thus facilitating transportation. In the year 1871, commodious brick buildings were erected in Canton by the new firm of C. Russell & Co., and the manufacture of the Peerless machine was thereupon transferred from Massillon to this city. The Canton firm comprised the following members: Clement Russell, N. S. Russell, Joseph K. Russell, Thomas H. Russell, George L. Russell, James S. Tonner and W. K. Miller, who continued to improve and manufacture the Peerless up to and including the year 1878, at which time the machine was thoroughly re-formed in all its parts, except in the devices used and manner of arrangement for giving motion to the cutters, which in previous protracted use had proved practically perfect and all that was required. This last re-organization was effected, not so much because of defects in the mechanism, but only to modify the machine to existing requirements demanded by the modern popular fashion. A large request had been made for smaller and lighter machines which should possess the features of greater simplicity, reduction in number of parts, superior convenience, accessibility and durability. Hence, with a view to satisfying these demands of progressive farmers, the new Peerless was invented and introduced to the public for the harvest of 1879, embracing all its old, long-tested and well-established characteristics, with the addition of a newly-organized sweep-rake, patented by W. K. Miller. This highly approved rake differs from that upon the old Peerless in these important particulars: It is divested of about one-half its former weight of material; is located near to the cutters and point of vibration; requires no adjustment for different kinds, qualities or conditions of crops—harvesting with equal ease and perfection the shortest barley or the tallest rye. This greatly improved rake is entirely under the facile control of the driver, who can make the sheaves as frequently as desired, accommodating its operation to any condition of grain, whether light or heavy; or it may readily be arranged to work automatically altogether. The cutting apparatus with rake and platform attached are also under easy control of the driver, who can raise or depress the cutters and rake, for the purpose of gathering up short, tangled or fallen grain, thus preventing all waste.

The Peerless Reaper Company, successors to the firm of C. Russell & Co., was organized December 1, 1879, having been duly incorporated under the State laws thirty days before. Officers: Isaac Harter, President; W. A. Creech, Treasurer; W. K. Miller (inventor of the Peerless Reaper and Mower), Superintendent. Their works in Canton are finely located, directly on the line of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway, and in all their arrangements they are specially adapted to the peculiar business carried on therein. The main building, a substantial brick slate-roof structure of four floors, including basement, measures 225x50 feet, with an "L" 60x210 feet, a part with two floors and a part (the foundry), one floor and a center spur 40x150 feet, one floor, containing the engine room and smith-shop. The engine is of 80-horse power, and the battery of two tubular boilers, 120-horse. The works have a fine equipment of modern improved machinery and every needed facility for systematic and economical production. Their present annual capacity is 5,000 machines, employing 200 hands. The Peerless Mowers and Reapers have found a ready market all over this continent, and have been considerably introduced in France, Germany, Belgium, Norway and Russia.

The Canton establishment of the noted corporation known as the Whitman & Barnes Manufacturing Co. is a branch of the Akron and Syracuse houses, and was put in operation in November, 1878, in the works formerly occupied by Ballard, Fast & Co. Mr. George A. Barnes is the efficient Superintendent. Here are manufactured for the local harvesting machine companies superior mower and reaper knives and sickles, the works turning out some 50,000 "sections" per month, and 3,500 knives. The power is supplied by a fine 90-horse power engine. Forty hands are employed, to whom the sum of $1,300 is disbursed monthly for wages. The premises have a frontage of 320 feet on Walnut street, 200 feet on the railroad, a depth of 138 feet, and a rear measurement of 170 feet.

Officers of the Whitman & Barnes Manufacturing Co.: George Barnes, President; A. L. Conger, Vice President; George E. Dana, Secretary; I. C. Alden, Treasurer; W. W. Cox, Assistant Treasurer. The excellence of the goods produced by the vast corporation under notice has secured for them the patronage of the largest and most reputable mower and reaper manufacturers, both in America and Europe. In their several establishments, they employ a total of 400 skilled workmen, while their aggregate annual production, which is steadily increasing, already reaches the sum of $650,000.

The Torrent Light-Power Boiler Feed-Pump, manufactured by E. E. Miller & Co. is attracting much attention among engineers, experts and the class of manufacturers who have occasion to use steam-pumps, by reason of its novel and ingenious mechanism, and its practical efficiency, wonderful convenience and unequalled economy in service. This model pump is the result of long and patient study on the part of its inventors, E. E. and C. M. Miller, of this city, and they are entitled to great credit for their signal success in devising and perfecting so useful an adjunct to the steam engine, and which has been accorded the highest encomiums of commendation by the many who have put it into practical use. This pump supplies a want long felt by those employing light steam power; and it is especially designed and adapted for use in connection with threshing, traction, sawing, portable and small stationary engines, as it combines all the requisites which go to constitute a successful independent boiler-feeder, that can be run irrespective of whether the main engine is in motion or not. Being entirely independent of the engine, as it takes the steam direct from the boiler, it can be located at any convenient and advantageous point in the boiler or engine room. It can be run fast, slow, or stopped entirely, as desired, thus relieving the engine proper from the constant friction and wear of an attached pump which must be kept in operation while the engine is running, whether needed or not. It will work perfectly under any given pressure of steam, requiring not the least regulating or attention.

The lifting power of the "Torrent" is greater than that of any inspirator or injector, and it can easily be run by hand with the same power when there is no steam. Using the expansive steam, it effects a material saving of steam over all pumps without fly-wheels, and the so-called injectors, etc. It is impossible to burst the feed-water pipes, when by carelessness or otherwise the water is shut off between the pump and boiler, as by the excessive pressure on the plunger the Torrent will be immediately stopped.

Mr. C. M. Miller, one of the inventors of the Torrent pump, is also the inventor of the celebrated "Canton Monitor Engine" and "Traction Engine," manufactured by C. Aultman & Co., of whose engine and boiler departments he is the efficient general superintendent. The Torrent independent pump is used on both these engines, with the best results. The fact that it is adopted by the above-named firm is a first-class indorsement of its merits. Although in the market but a short time, it is rapidly superseding the ordinary attached pumps and injectors long before the public, which is sufficient evidence of its excellent work. There is not a State in the Union where this pump has not been introduced, while in Chicago and the Northwest, it has already had a large sale, and where it is in constantly increasing demand.

The success of the firm of Joseph Dick & Bro. is something noteworthy. They commenced business here some five years ago, in the manufacture of hay, straw and corn-stalk cutters, splitters and crushers, small horse-powers, etc. The first year they made just seven cutters, while last season the number turned out was over 400, and this was considerably less than the number ordered. This remarkable increase is indicative of the fact that they have been fortunate enough to hit upon the most practical and effective device for the given purpose ever contrived—the ingenious invention of Mr. Joseph Dick. These approved machines have been shipped to all parts of the Union, as well as to Australia, and wherever introduced and operated they give complete satisfaction, on account of their strong and simple mechanism, easy and rapid working, and perfection in cutting, splitting and crushing. These machines are made of different sizes, the largest having a capacity for cutting from 3,000 to 5,000 pounds per hour, according to material and length of cut. They are suited for either steam or horse power, and so arranged as to cut on both sides of the main shaft, thus cutting from two boxes instead of one. The shear-plates are made adjustable, and are independent of the working parts. All the working parts are encased. The advantages claimed for this apparatus are that it will cut hay, straw, etc., in a superior manner; also that it will cut, split and crush corn-stalks with or without the ears on; that the splitting and crushing device will not destroy the tender parts of the stalks, while reducing the coarse portion to a proper grade of fineness; besides other meritorious features previously enumerated.

Messrs. Dick & Bro.'s one to six horse-powers are in extensive use for driving their feed cutters, etc., with or without a belt or jack. Their band-jacks, of two sizes, are similar to the ordinary jack used for threshing purposes, with the exception of being arranged to hitch the coupling on either shaft, so that the line-shaft can be attached direct onto the pulley-shaft if desired, and a slower speed attained than if the line-shaft is attached to bevel gear wheel shaft. This firm likewise manufacture Joseph Dick, Jr.'s, patent combined hand and foot power attachment. Mr. Dick has devoted much time and study to devising a plan whereby the hand-crank can be combined with an oscillating foot-treadle so as to obtain a power from both devices simultaneously by one operator. He has succeeded in perfecting this valuable improvement, by which greatly increased power can be obtained over the ordinary vibrating treadle. This admirable arrangement can be applied to a great variety of hand-power machinery, and needs only a trial to be highly appreciated. All the aforementioned appliances are meeting with splendid success.

A look through the extensive and finely-equipped Red Jacket Plow Works of A. Ball & Co. presents a scene of great activity and industry, affording the beholder an idea that something is made here which is in popular request. This is found to be the famous "Red Jacket" Plow—an implement which has gained wide renown over a large portion of the Western country. This plow is indeed "a thing of beauty," as well as utility, economy, strength and durability. The beam is made of the best quality of wrought angle iron, by means of a novel and ingenious device invented and patented by Mr. Ball, which forms and perfects the beam at a single operation, and without the use of which this peculiar beam could not be constructed. It is the only beam ever contrived that forms a direct attachment and support to every part of the plow, while its curved shape insures the greatest strength and rigidity, certainly superior to any wood or cast beam. Its unapproached lightness, firmness and durability, as well as adaptability to various conditions of soil, combine to render the "Red Jacket" a most desirable, economical and easy working plow. That it is in high favor with the farming community is demonstrated by the fact that the demand therefor is constantly in excess of the supply, thus necessitating a large addition to the works this season, whereby their producing capacity will be increased fully one-third. No traveling men are employed, as these superior implements sell readily on their merits.

While Messrs. Ball & Co. make the Red Jacket Plow their leading specialty, they also manufacture some fifteen other kinds and styles of plows, to suit different soils and conditions, including the favorite "Tornado" brand, all of which find appreciative patrons in the various sections of country, to the requirements of which they are best adapted.

The Red Jacket Plow Works are as well and substantially built shops as any in the State. The main building is of brick, two stories, with dimensions of 70x100 feet; the blacksmith and molding shop, 100x40 feet; the grinding and finishing department, 36x50 feet; the engine room, 36x20 feet; the warehouse 30x140 feet. These works are very conveniently arranged, and supplied with every modern mechanical device calculated to facilitate and economize the manufacture of the several styles of plows here produced. The number of hands given regular employment is thirty, and the total value of implements turned out in 1879 was $50,000, which aggregate will be considerably exceeded this year. The Red Jacket and other plows made in this establishment are well known and in extensive use throughout the States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Western Pennsylvania, and the demand therefor is steadily augmenting. Messrs. A. Ball & Co. have been proprietors of these works some three years, and by superior skill, indefatigable efforts and excellent management, they have carried this industry forward to a condition of substantial prosperity.

Bucher, Gibbs & Co. also manufacture plows on a large scale, at their extensive works on East Tuscarawas street, which have a widespread and well-deserved reputation. They are an old company, well situated, and their work is well done and well known over a large extent of country. They have done much to build up and establish the building of Canton on a firm foundation. They employ between seventy and eighty hands, and turn out about $120,000 of work annually.

The Chieftain Hay Rakes are also manufactured in Canton in great numbers, and are widely and favorably known, never failing to give satisfaction where they have been introduced, and that is in every direction, both far and near. They are always in demand, and meet with a ready sale. The business was carried on by Mrs. J. B. Wilson, admirably and successfully, for several years after the death of her husband, who started the business many years ago. Her father, Adam Koontz, deceased, was an excellent business man, and she seems to have inherited much of his business ability. There was probably no business in Canton carried on more systematically, energetically or successfully than hers. A short time, about a year, ago, she disposed of the business to several parties, who, under the title of the Chieftain Hay Rake Company, have since carried it on.

The inventor of Ney's Patent Lever Hay Elevator and Conveyer, having for years been engaged in building and putting up hay elevators, found that most of those in use did not properly perform their work, and failed of giving satisfaction to the farmers employing them. He therefore set at work to invent an elevator that would embody all the advantages and avoid the defects of those heretofore in use; one that would give entire satisfaction. This he claims to have done in the invention which we describe in this article.

This invention, as set forth in the inventor's application for letters patent, relates to the controlling of the carriage and the operation of the elevating-head in that class of elevators in which the load is elevated by means of a head or block operated by a rope and pulleys, to a carriage or frame which travels back and forth on an elevated track, and carries the load held by the head to any desired point within the limits of the track; and it has for its objects to simultaneously lock the elevating-head and release the carriage when the load has been elevated, and to simultaneously release the elevating-head and lock the carriage when it is returned after the load has been deposited, both of which operations are performed automatically, to prevent any accidental movement of the devices by which the locking and releasing are obtained, and to guide and operate the elevating-head so as to insure its engagement with the locking devices and attachments to the carriage or frame; and its nature consists in providing a stationary disk having a concave face, and locked at one end of the track, and arranged to engage with a locking lever, or arm, and hold the carriage or frame while the load is being elevated, and release the elevating-head when the carriage is returned, for which purpose the lever, or arm, is provided with a projection, which engages the concave face of the disk; in providing a spring located on the locking lever, or arm, for preventing any accidental movement of the arm; in providing a hook or latch pivoted or connected to the arm, or lever, so that the movement of the arm, or lever, will operate the hook or latch as required, for engagement with or disengagement from the elevating-head; in providing a bell-shaped guide, located on the carriage or frame beneath the engaging hook or latch, and having an opening into which the point or latch projects, through which opening a slatted point on the elevating-head can pass to engage the locking arm, or lever, and operate the lever to throw the latch or hook into engagement with the elevating-head.

The attachment of the lifting rope is such that it cannot twist, and even if it did it would be all right before the lifting-head had reached the locking arm or lever.

However formidable may seem the description of this new invention, it is but proper to remark that its operation is simple and perfect. In short, as a labor saving device, it is a pronounced success. These elevators are manufactured by Messrs. Ney & Kinney, at Canton, Ohio.

The great corporation, known as the Diebold Safe & Lock Company, operates the second largest industrial establishment in Canton, and has accomplished much in the direction of disseminating and conserving the fair fame of this city's products for positive excellence in style, quality, finish and durability. The business, of which this vast concern is the outgrowth, was originally established many years ago in Cincinnati by the firm of Diebold, Bahman & Co., who were succeeded by Diebold & Kienzle. Their business so rapidly increased that in the course of time their manufacturing facilities proved inadequate to meet the augmenting demand for their superior safes, and consequently they concluded to seek another site for the erection of new and greatly enlarged works. Finding in Canton an eligible location for this enterprise, they determined to remove their establishment from Cincinnati to this city, which change was effected in the year 1872. To accommodate their expanding operations, they had erected extensive brick workshops, especially designed and adapted for the requirements of this particular industry, and in its admirable plan of arrangement, convenience in every department, and facility and economy of manufacturing operations, the firm brought to bear their combined skill and experience, thus developing and completing the model safe works of the world. This is the only safe manufactory on the continent specially built and arranged for the purpose to which it is devoted, and unquestionably its facilities for the rapid production of safes, if equaled, are unsurpassed.

Since these works were first erected, it has been found necessary, in order to answer the growing popular demand for their product, to considerably enlarge their capacity, so that the structures now occupied are of such magnitude as to constitute one of the most conspicuous objects in this thriving industrial city. The main building is of brick, with slate roof, 50 feet in width, having a frontage of 400 feet on Mulberry street; 250 feet on the line of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, and 150 feet south on the alley. This series of mammoth buildings, forming three sides of a hollow square, is of two stories. The brick attachments or spurs, each of one story, running east from the Mulberry street section, comprise the filling room, measuring 100x40 feet; the brass foundry, 75x40 feet; the engine room, 25x30 feet, and the smith shop, 45x75 feet. There are, besides, several frame buildings in the rear, used for the storage of materials. The buildings are heated throughout by steam. Each department is supplied with a full equipment of improved machinery and appliances requisite to the expeditious performance of the work in its several stages, and there is no device or convenience which the test of science and experience could commend as advantageous which has not been adopted by this enterprising and progressive concern. Their arrangements for receiving materials and shipping finished product are all that need be desired. A siding from the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad runs right by the doors of the works, and connection is also had with the new Valley Railway, so that the raw materials can be unloaded just where they are wanted, and the ponderous safes, which are shipped to all parts of the country, are "skidded" directly on to the cars for transportation, without expense for handling or drayage. The present capacity of the works is thirty complete safes per day.

In the year 1874, the style of the firm changed to Diebold, Norris & Co., and in 1876, a joint stock company was organized and incorporated, under the name of the Diebold Safe & Lock Company, and the business has since been conducted by this corporation, who, with ample capital, thorough equipment and perfect system, fortified by long practical experience, are enabled to successfully compete with all other makers of safes. The officers of the company are W. W. Clark, President; John W. Norris, Vice President; D. Tyler, Secretary and Treasurer. The gentleman last-named has general charge of the works and their products.

Branch stores and warerooms of the company are established at 57 State street, Chicago, under the management of Mr. John W. Norris, Vice President; at 312 California street, San Francisco; 27 Canal street, New Orleans; 103 Superior street, Cleveland; 291 Broadway, New York; 56 Sudbury street, Boston; 89 Main street, Houston, Texas. At all these distributing depots a full line of these safes is carried. There is no occasion for hesitancy in stating that the manufactures of this establishment, which are to be found in almost every place of any importance on this broad continent, have withstood the severest tests from fire, and the desperate attempts of burglars, with more uniform success than any other make of safes on the market.

The great fire in Chicago fully demonstrated their splendid heat-repelling qualities. No less than 878 of the Diebold safes were subjected to that terribly trying ordeal, and the record shows that they preserved their contents intact and uninjured. Had they never been thus tested in any other instance, this single striking fact would be amply sufficient to convince every one of their strictly fire-proof qualities; but in thousands of cases have they been tried with equal severity, and with equally successful results. Hence there is now no question raised on this score. Quite as important, however, is the assurance of a safe being absolutely burglar-proof. That this can justly be claimed for the safe under notice is evidenced by brief reference to its approved scientific principle of construction. The entire surface is of solid steel of a quality and temper best capable of resistance to hammering and drilling. The improved tenon and groove employed renders these safes air-tight and prevents the introduction of wedges or explosive compounds; while by the use of the Burton cut-off spindle, which this company exclusively controls, angular connection is made with the lock, thus obviating direct entrance. The lock itself is thoroughly protected by alternate layers of iron and steel, which are perfect protection against both powder and drill. Thus is this usually most vulnerable part of the safe rendered absolutely impenetrable. Another of the notable improvements adopted by this company is a patent round-cornered door, of which they are the sole manufacturers, protected by patent issued in 1877, whereby the strength and inaccessibility of their safes are greatly promoted. All in all, it can advisedly be claimed that for reliability, durability and mechanical perfection, the Diebold Safe & Lock Co.'s safes are without an equal in the market.

Their line of manufacture comprises bank, store, office and house safes, safe-deposit vaults and vault doors, express boxes and railroad safes, jail and other wrought-iron work wherein superior strength and safety are factors.

A safe-deposit vault for the German-American Bank, St. Paul, Minn., has recently been completed by this company. This burglar-proof work has outer walls of solid metal two and a half inches thick, constructed of one slab of the Chrome Steel Co.'s five-ply metal, one of Park Bros. & Co.'s five-ply, one of Anderson & Co.'s five-ply, a fourth of Park Bros. & Co.'s three-ply, and one layer of charcoal iron inside. The corners are perfectly solid—the steel being specially angled for the purpose, so that the would-be burglar has no advantage from a corner seam or joint to start with.

The method employed for making the metal for safe walls may be briefly described as follows: If for five-ply, then three pieces of iron are set in the ingot mold at the proper distance apart, and the intervening spaces filled with molten steel. The ingot is then rolled into slabs, and is ready for the safe-maker's use. When three-ply is to be made, the same process is followed, except that only one piece of iron is set into the mold. This company make all the locks for their safes and vaults of the combination pattern, and they are pronounced unexcelled in point of safety, it being actually impossible to pick them, or to throw back the bolts without knowing the combination.

Their largest piece of work was the San Francisco Safe Deposit Company's vaults. The vault of this magnificent safe has dimensions of twenty-seven feet in width, thirty-two feet in length, and fourteen feet in height. Its walls are of the best welded wrought iron and steel, three inches in thickness, and compactly knitted together by double rows of conical bolts. The sides, floor and top are overlaid with nine inches of fire-proof cement, with an outer layer of iron—the whole adjusted in heavy masonry. The vault is provided with double doors at either end, the outer ones being six inches thick, each made inaccessible to the unauthorized by two of the Diebold Safe & Lock Co.'s Peerless Burglar-proof Locks. The interior of the vault has 4,600 compartments, varying in dimensions, 3,000 of which are furnished with key locks, separately and distinctly operative, and the remaining 1,600 have superior combination locks. This wonderful product of mechanical ingenuity and skill was awarded to the Diebold Company, in competition with about a dozen bidders, and was completed to the entire satisfaction of the parties for whom it was constructed, at an expenditure of $100,000. Some idea of the magnitude of this contract may be formed when it is stated that no less than forty-seven cars were required to transport these colossal vaults in sections across the continent. The manufacture of this monster specimen of mechanic art may well be denominated one of the signal achievements of American skill and enterprise.

The Merchants' Safe Deposit Vaults, owned and controlled by the Merchants' National Bank of Chicago, are probably, next to the San Francisco vault, the largest in the country, and were constructed by the Diebold Co. This magnificent vault is one of Chicago's objects of interest, and is inspected by visitors with many expressions of confidence in its impregnability, and the utility and convenience of the safe depositories. These vaults have a capacity for over 4,000 safe deposit boxes. A large majority of the banks and corporations of Chicago use the Diebold safes, as do also the American and United States Express Companies, the North-Western and other railroads, and the leading merchants, prominent among which are Field, Leiter & Co.; C. M. Henderson & Co.; Hibbard, Spencer & Co.; W. W. Kimball, and hundreds of others. The Palmer House has a strong and at the same time beautiful and unique safe, made especially for Mr. Palmer, upon plans furnished by the company. But it would be impossible to give a list of all the patrons of this company. Suffice it to say, that where contracts are awarded on the opinions of disinterested experts, the Diebold safe generally gets the preference, for then all the strong points receive due consideration.

The numerous new uses to which steel is now being put, as is indicated by the rapidly-increasing demand for this metal, go to prove that we have already crossed the threshold of the "steel age." Stimulated by this augmenting demand on every hand for fine grades of steel for almost innumerable purposes, the enterprising and progressive steel manufacturers of this country have of late years perfected and introduced new and improved productive processes, whereby they are enabled to make a far better quality of steel than they were capable of producing ten, or even five, years ago. So great has been this improvement, that latterly the finest grades of the output of American steel works have received the unqualified indorsement of the most experienced and exacting users of this metal in their industrial operations—those who, a few years since, had really believed it to be impossible for our home manufacturers to make such a quality of this article as would compare favorably with the fine Sheffield and other long-time famous foreign steels. But what is the situation in this regard at present? The answer is a most gratifying one. To-day our manufacturers of saws, tools, cutlery, and many other products requiring the highest grade of material, are employing exclusively steel of American make, as it proves fully equal to the best foreign product, and, consequently, has almost entirely supplanted the latter in the domestic market.

Canton enjoys the credit of having one of the most complete manufactories of steel in the country—the Canton Steel Works—of which Messrs. Bolton, Bulley & Co. are the proprietors. The premises occupied by these works have an area of about two and a half acres, very conveniently situated on the line of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway, with switch-track connection with both that and the Valley Railway, and will have direct connection with all the railroads now under construction to this city, thus affording them first-class receiving and shipping advantages in every direction. Their buildings comprise an iron-clad rolling-mill, sixty-four by two hundred and seventy feet, with an addition sixteen by one hundred and fifty feet, used as a boiler room. The open-hearth melting-shop is thirty by eighty feet, crucible shop thirty by sixty-five feet, and warehouse thirty-six by eighty-five feet; open-hearth shop twenty-nine by seventy-one feet, machine-shop, laboratory and other adjuncts admirably adapted for the successful prosecution of this industry. The motive power is supplied by four steam engines, with combined capacity of 700 horse. The mechanical equipment is of a superior order, embracing all the modern improved appliances needful for the expedite and economic production of the finest steel. There are two mills, one twenty-inch and the other twelve-inch, with a solid foundation composed of 165,000 brick under the twenty-inch mills and engines. Three steam hammers, one and one-half, one-half, and one-fourth tons, are employed, together with many ingenious and expensive tools and devices for the varied processes required in the several stages of manufacture. Among these is a Pratt & Whitney (Hartford) Hollaway's machine for cutting shafting to exactly uniform lengths—a very valuable apparatus. One of the notable conveniences of this model establishment is a system of tramways traversing in all directions the mills and yard, upon which the raw material, product in process of manufacture and finished goods are transported with great facility. The capacity of the melting-shops is fourteen tons every twenty-four hours, double turn. There is a well-appointed machine-shop for performing necessary repairs, and in every department a scene of the most intense activity is presented. The reporter took a tour of inspection through the shops, and was impressed with the perfect convenience of arrangement apparent on every hand, and the thorough system established throughout the works—important factors in the successful management of so extensive an industry as is here carried on. The fine laboratory of this concern is under the immediate charge of Mr. R. H. Bulley, one of the firm, who is an expert chemist, and possesses an intimate knowledge of the science of steel working. They have the most approved appliances for making both crucible and open-hearth steel, but are at present producing only the latter, as by this process they are enabled to manufacture a quality of steel which excels the crucible in every particular.

Mr. Ogden Bolton, of this firm, has secured letters-patent upon an important improvement in the manufacture of steel by the open-hearth process, the same consisting in first charging the carbon on the bottom of the open hearth, and charging the blooms or soft steel or any part of them on top of the carbonaceous matter previous to fusion, so that the iron may melt on the surface of the carbon and become carburized as it percolates through it. By this process the carbon is packed in boxes or canisters and charged on the bottom of the open hearth, and then the blooms or soft steel thereon. When the mass is melted, after or at the time molten metal is tapped from the furnace, ferro-manganese or spiegeleisen is added. By this new method is attained the production of high grades of steel, suitable for tools, etc., for which the more expensive crucible steel has heretofore been exclusively employed. It is a carburizing, not a decarburizing, process, whereby a grade of steel is produced equal in quality to the best English tool-steel. Messrs. Bolton, Bulley & Co. manufacture the various descriptions of the fine cast-steel, including patent rolled machinery steel, oil and water tempered spring steel, round and square edged tire steel, gun-barrel and set-screw steel, and tool steel, making the latter a specialty, as also patent polished machinery steel of superior quality and finish. All these goods have achieved an enviable reputation wherever they have been used, and are in constantly increasing demand. This firm produce several grades of steel, uniformly tempered for special purposes, designated by colored labels. The "Canton" brand (yellow label) is best suited for the hardware trade, answering for machinists, blacksmiths, etc. The "Canton Soft" (blue label) is adapted for oil-well jars, and tools subject to constant concussions. The "Canton Hard" (dark red label) is only required for taps, dies, reamers, lathe tools, and other work necessitating a strong, hard edge. The "Canton Extra Hard" and "Canton Choice" are designed for specific purposes. Their warehouse is pronounced to have the most convenient and advantageous storage facilities of any similar concern in the country. There is a systematic arrangement and classification of the different grades and brands produced, so that they are enabled to supply orders with perfect accuracy and great dispatch. Here they keep in stock some 150 to 200 tons of well assorted finished product. The present capacity of these works is 3,000 net tons per year, giving occupation to 140 skilled mechanics. Their annual output on present basis of operations reaches $400,000 in value. They have an extensive trade in all sections of the country, especially in the West, selling a large amount of goods in Chicago. Their superior spring steel is used by four of the largest manufacturers of springs in the West. A warehouse list of their varied product, containing full directions as to ordering any required descriptions of steel, is furnished at request.

The Canton Wrought Iron Bridge Company, a large and successful establishment, was originally put in operation about fifteen years ago, and was a partnership concern up to 1871, when it was incorporated under the State laws, with a capital of $106,000. This company have built more highway bridges since they started than any other works in the country. They have erected about 3,300 spans, varying in length from 20 to 301 feet, and in width from 6 to 120 feet, aggregating over 33 miles in length. This work has been erected in twenty-five different States and the Dominion of Canada, and includes nearly all forms of truss, arch, swing and plate bridge and iron piers. The material they use in the construction of bridges is specially manufactured for them under the most rigid specifications, as to tensile strength and quality, and is critically tested on its arrival at the shops. Their bridges are built on scientific principles, approved by long and thorough experience, and the utmost caution is exercised in their erection. In all the work they have executed, there has not been a single case of failure or accident, under protracted usage for road travel or excessively trying tests. Such an exceptional record is certainly worthy of consideration.

Their facilities for accurate and reliable work are unequalled by those of any similar establishment, and enable them to complete contracts with great dispatch. The skilled working force of the Canton Wrought Iron Bridge Company average 150 men, and their product last year aggregated $500,000. Officers: D. Hammond, President; J. Abbott, Vice President and Chief Engineer; C. H. Jackson, Treasurer and Secretary.

Mr. P. P. Bush, proprietor of the well-known Novelty Iron Works, is a practical machinist of long experience, and was formerly established in business in New Haven, Conn. In 1871, concluding to locate at a point easy of access to the great Western markets, he fixed upon Canton as an advantageous place for the prosecution of his industry, and in that year removed his tools and fixtures to this city, taking the shops formerly occupied by the Canton Malleable Iron Works, where he has ever since transacted a successful business. At these works are constructed in the most faithful and scientific manner, several styles of stationary engines, mill machinery, and architectural iron work, for which the shops have admirable facilities and appliances. In these lines they supply chiefly the local trade, selling largely to the towns and cities in Stark and adjoining counties. Mr. Bush owns the largest stock of patterns in Northern Ohio, and hence his peculiar advantages for executing with dispatch every class of work in the stated departments. He is now putting iron fronts into two new buildings in Canton, and is kept quite busy on first-class contracts, giving employment to an average of thirty-five skilled mechanics. His product in 1879 amounted to $65,000. The foundry has a measurement of 60x160 feet, and the machine shop 60x60 feet. These buildings are situated in close proximity to the railroads, thus affording unsurpassed shipping facilities. The most widely-known of Mr. Bush's manufactures is the "Imperial" job printing press, which possesses some important features of advantage over any other press in the market. Its peculiarities of construction and mechanism are: All the working parts are built upon horizontal steel bars, capable of sustaining a tensile test of fifty tons each, without liability to fracture. The impression is made with a powerful toggle, giving a dead dwell on the impression, while the entire force of the impression is exerted upon these steel bars. No springing of the platen or bed is possible, and a square, uniform impression is insured, the power being applied directly behind the bed, thus obviating all slurring. The tension of the rollers is easily regulated by a single nut on the spring, so that the pressman can adapt the pressure to any sized form. The press runs easily and smoothly, and can be speeded according to the dexterity of the feeder. Its superior simplicity, strength, power, ease and economy of running, and facility of making-ready, are recommendations which every practical job printer will appreciate. A novel feature about this press is that there is not a cam in the entire mechanism; the first and only jobber ever made on this principle. The device for giving motion to the inking-rollers is also new. All the motions are direct, there are no springs, nothing likely to get out of order, and the press is the acme of simplicity. The fraternity will do well to correspond with Mr. Bush regarding this wonderful and most successful invention.

The proprietors of the Canton Spring Works, Messrs. D. Cobaugh and H. L. Kuhns, have met with signal success during the past two years in the manufacture of carriage, wagon and seat springs of unsurpassed quality and finish. They succeeded to the spring business of Ballard, Fast & Co., and by dint of incessant perseverance, practical skill and good management, have built up a trade of which they have reason to be proud, and which redounds to the credit of this thriving, industrial city. They employ only the best quality of material, with thoroughly experienced workmen in every department, and every requisite mechanical device to secure the most economical and perfect production of their uniformly excellent goods. The importance of the proper strength and safety of vehicle springs is generally appreciated, and in this connection we have to say that the Canton Spring Company practically and critically tests every spring before it leaves the shops, thus making sure that no faulty or defective goods are ever placed on the market by them. The Canton springs have attained an extended celebrity, and are in such active demand that it is found difficult to keep up therewith, rendering it necessary to increase the producing capacity of the establishment in order to supply the rapidly growing wants of their patrons, who are located as far West as California, east to Baltimore, throughout Ohio, and in all parts of the Northwest and Southwest. Everywhere that these goods have been introduced and put into practical use, there is only one expression in regard to them—that they possess great tensile strength, elasticity and durability, and are equal to the best in regard to quality, style and workmanship. These works employ eighty skilled artisans, and produced last year springs to the amount of 135,000, which at current prices would foot up to about $200,000. In 1879, they used between 1,300 and 1,400 tons of steel, a large portion of which was made in this city, it being of unsurpassed quality for this purpose. The main building has dimensions equivalent to 300 by 40 feet, and there is a switch track running into the yard, affording first class facilities for receiving materials and shipping product to all parts of the country.

In a long time we have not seen a more convenient and useful contrivance than the patent revolving book-case manufactured of different styles and patterns by Mr. John Danner, of this city. During the last five years he has made these cases, and so highly appreciated and popular have they become that a large and finely appointed establishment is required to produce them in sufficient quantities to supply the ever increasing demand from all parts of the continent and even foreign countries. Already over 6,000 of these serviceable and beautiful articles have been sold, and are in constant use by lawyers, clergymen, physicians, business men, public and private libraries, courts, public institutions, reading rooms, literary and musical societies, public offices, etc. These revolving book-cases are far more convenient than the ordinary book-case, occupy but little space, and hold more books than any other receptacle of equal proportions ever devised. The books on either of the four sides are readily accessible to any one sitting at a table, or before the fire, without moving his chair or rising. These cases revolve on an entirely new principle, whereby a slight pressure of the hand will bring either side to view. The mechanism is so simple and durable that it is not at all liable to get out of order, while the case is so substantially constructed that it will last a lifetime. These artistically finished cases are made in the most faithful and workmanlike manner, of the best selected Western ash and black walnut, and are an ornament to any library or parlor. The cases are made of any desired size and style of finish, with wood or marble top. Mr. Danner exhibited one of his elegant revolving cases at the Paris International Exhibition in 1878. On the top of the case was a large model of an American schoolhouse. The exhibit was made under the auspices of the National Bureau of Education, and nothing in this department was so much admired for its beauty and utility. Its appreciation is shown by the fact that it was honored with the award of a gold medal.

For a long period of twenty-one years the reputable firm of H. W. Werts & Co. have been engaged in the manufacture of fine carriages in this city. For this purpose they occupy two spacious buildings—a neat and substantial brick structure, corner of Seventh and Poplar streets, of three stories above the basement, with dimensions of forty-five by one hundred and fifteen feet, and the wood department, of two stories, frame, thirty-five by seventy-five feet. These works are fitted up with all the modern conveniences and mechanical devices calculated to facilitate manufacturing operations on an extensive scale. The basement of the main building is used for storing finished work. On the street floor is a tastefully fitted up business office, leading off from which is a commodious repository, where may be seen on exhibition a fine stock of light carriages of graceful proportions and elegant finish. In the rear part is the smith shop, and on the next floor above is the trimming department and a large storage wareroom. The third story is occupied for painting and finishing purposes. In all their work they use only the most carefully selected materials, consulting especially the requisites to that degree of lightness, which is compatible with proper strength and great durability. With this desirable end in view, they employ steel axles, steel tires, the best stock for wheels, English and French upholstering cloths that will not fade, and never any split leather. All their trimmings are first-class, and the paint and varnish used are the best and most durable the market affords. It is not sufficient for them to turn out goods that look well on the surface; but the work all through, even to the smallest particular, is performed in the most painstaking manner, with the greatest care that nothing shall enter into the construction of their vehicles which shall prove in service otherwise than the finest and best. By this means Messrs. Werts & Co. have succeeded in establishing a reputation of the highest order, which they are assiduous in permanently maintaining. They give employment to some twenty-five workmen, most of whom are thoroughly experienced in their respective trades, so that while all the material used is of the best quality the workmanship is correspondingly excellent. Their average annual production of fine carriages is about 130, valued at $30,000.

The well known concern, the Canton Cutlery Company, is busily at work turning out the fine cutlery for the production of which it is deservedly so widely noted. The line of goods here made embraces a great variety of pocket cutlery of approved styles and the most perfect finish. While so many other establishments have retrograded in the quality of their product and flooded the market with cheap and well-nigh worthless goods, the company under notice have strictly adhered to their original standard quality, using only the best Jessup's steel and employing the most skillful workmen. Hence they can safely warrant all their goods to be of uniform and superior quality. These works have been in operation since 1872, and are now producing about $35,000 worth of goods annually, employing thirty five hands and three traveling salesmen.

One of the prominent and thriving industries of Canton is the manufacture of soap, which business is prosecuted on a large scale by Mr. Joseph Biechele, successor to the firm of C. Biechele & Bro. This establishment was founded by C. Biechele, in 1847, and the business was carried on in a small way until 1858. Meanwhile, the reputation of the fine quality of Biechele's soaps had rapidly spread, and the steadily increasing demand therefor necessitated the enlargement of the works and the improvement of their manufacturing facilities. Consequently, in 1858, a larger factory was erected, modern appliances were introduced, and at the same time the present proprietor became a partner in the concern. The works were successfully operated for about ten years by C. Biechele & Bro., when, in 1868, Joseph bought out the interest of his brother, thus becoming sole proprietor. The constantly growing popularity and sale of his product called for another enlargement of the works, which was accomplished in the year following. New kettles, steam boilers and all other approved conveniences were adopted, having in view the rapid and economical production of the several famous brands of soap made here. By this means, Mr. Biechele found himself able to successfully compete, in regard to both quality and price, with the largest soap manufacturers of Chicago, Cincinnati, Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia, and his trade expanded steadily over a wide area of territory, both East and West. It has been his undeviating aim and purpose to make the best soap that can be produced by the exercise of constant care, skill and long practical experience, and hence he uses only the best selected materials to be obtained, employs thoroughly trained workmen, and conducts every manufacturing operation under painstaking personal supervision. Herein lies the secret of his marked success. Mr. Biechele is not content with having established a far-reaching reputation for the excellence of his goods, and then, as is too often the case, gradually deteriorating the quality, with the vain expectation that former fame will serve in lieu of present merit; but, on the contrary, his laudable endeavor is to produce better soap to-day than it was possible for him to make yesterday, and thus to maintain for all time the credit his goods have so honorably achieved.

Mr. Biechele is now manufacturing some twenty different brands of laundry soaps, the leading of which are the California, Pure White, White Laundry, Pearl, Best Family and Banner. These well-known brands find ready sale throughout the country, and, indeed, the demand so rapidly increases as to render the present capacity of the works too small to meet it. This being the situation, arrangements are making to enlarge the factory next spring, whereby its producing capacity will be materially increased. The present dimensions of the building are 150 by 52 feet, and it will be enlarged to 175 by 100 feet, two stories high. Biechele's Pure White Soap is strictly pure, and manufactured chiefly from vegetable oils, giving it medicinal properties. It is excellent for both toilet and laundry purposes. His Magic Soap is highly commended, and will do its work well without the use of a wash-board, if directions are followed. The toilet soaps made at this establishment are noted for their fine quality and delicate perfume. Among these are the Palm, Domestic White and Mottled Castile, Magnolia, White Lily, Turkish Bath, Glycerine, etc. Four traveling agents are constantly employed in selling Biechele's soaps, which have become the favorite of every good housekeeper over a vast area of territory.

Canton boasts, also, of two woolen mills, which, though not so pretentious as some of the larger mills in the East, do a domestic business quite as important for people in this part of the country. The Canton City Woolen Factory of L. Alexander & Son is one of these. They manufacture cassimeres, satinets, cloths, jeans, flannels, blankets, stocking yarn and all kinds of woolen goods. They use a thirty-horsepower engine in propelling their machinery; ten hands are regularly employed at a weekly expense of $100. Their trade, already large, is constantly on the increase, and is derived mainly from Stark and the adjoining counties. The other is the Eagle Woolen Mill of Robbins Brothers, which furnishes employment to some twenty persons, whose aggregate wages is about $300 per month. This firm works two sets of machinery, and use the self-acting spinning mules. They manufacture goods about like the other mill, and, besides a large home trade, they find good sale for their goods in the West, to which part of the country they ship a good many of them.

There are also two box factories here in active operation. The one run by Mr. J. C. Lantz, with a force of twelve workmen. They manufacture wooden boxes, largely for the Biechele Soap Works, bee-hives and faucets. This establishment is in a flourishing condition. The other establishment, of Mr. Charles E. Wrigley, manufactures paper boxes exclusively, in making which they are now consuming about a ton of paper a week. He employs seven hands. He makes all the packing boxes for the malleable iron works in Canton, and one thousand every week for a druggist firm in Louisville, Ohio. The malleable iron works just referred to is a new concern, but recently located in Canton. These works are under the firm of Ebel, Gilliom & Co., and do an extensive business. They already employ, though in operation here only a few months, over one hundred and fifty hands, and are continually increasing their force. When they get into full operation, they will employ two hundred and fifty. They are at present paying their hands about $1,500 a week. This establishment manufactures all kinds of saddlery hardware, which they sell immediately to wholesale jobbers.

Among Canton industries, prominent and well established, is the paper mill of Bachert, Silk & Co. This mill has been in existence for about a quarter of a century, and has been under its present management for seventeen years past. The original structure, which was a two-story brick building, 33x100 feet, has been enlarged, until now it covers an area of 150 feet square, and contains two stories and a basement. They manufacture every kind of manila, wrapping, tea and tissue paper. The capacity of the works is about three tons per day. They employ thirty-five hands, with a monthly pay roll of $1,200 per month. Their paper goes to the Cleveland Paper Company at Cleveland and Chicago. This firm stands among the most reliable in Canton, and is doing a very satisfactory and successful business.

There are many other branches of business carried on in Canton, which, though apparently small when viewed in detail, do a great part toward promoting the success of Canton's industries. As a sample we may here remark, that not less than fifty hands are employed in making cigars by the different manufacturers in the city. So too, it is in many other branches of trade.

From the above exhibit of the multiplicity and varied character of the manufacturing interests in this city, growing up and strengthening themselves under many adverse prospects in the past, there now appears glorious promise for rapid growth and increase in future, inasmuch as Canton, naturally so well situated for building up and fostering manufacturing interests, will soon be in commercial communication with all parts of the country by means of the several railroads about centering in this city.

But the business importance of Canton, even at this time, is not to be seen alone in her varied manufacturing interests. Her wholesale and retail establishments, in every line of trade, are worthy also of consideration. Our space will not permit us to notice them all in detail, and we will, therefore, be compelled to notice only a few of the older establishments in different branches of business. There are several wholesale houses doing each of them an extensive trade. Prominent among them is the wholesale grocery house of B. Dannemiller & Sons. There are few houses in any large metropolis which for extent, convenience and fullness of stock are superior to that of this enterprising firm, as the following sketch will set forth: This business was originally founded by Kimball Brothers; and, in 1869, the present firm succeeded them, at 36 South Market street, and subsequently removed to the corner of Market and Tuscarawas streets. Their trade steadily increased in volume, until it was found necessary to secure more commodious quarters. Accordingly, last year the firm erected the present elegant and spacious brick building on Market and Fifth streets, very eligibly located, having a frontage of 30 feet on Market street, 140 feet on Fifth street, and a wing 50 feet deep in the rear. There are four floors in one department and five in the other, fitted up with every convenience for the storage and handling of the immense stock of goods here carried. One of Crane Brothers' (Chicago) improved elevators, with a capacity of 3,000 pounds, 6x7 feet in size, runs from the basement to the top floor, rendering each department equally accessible. Having windows on three sides, ample light is admitted to all the rooms, so that not a single gas jet is needed until some time after sunset.

There are entrances on both streets into the fine, large office and sample room, measuring 28x30 feet, tastefully fitted up, and lighted by six French plate-glass windows. The stock comprises a full line of general groceries, wooden ware, brooms, cigars, tobaccos, teas, coffees, canned goods, sugars, sirups, oils, soaps, fish, candies, crackers, and everything else usually carried in an establishment of this character.

W. A. McCrea's wholesale house of small wares, the only one of the kind between Pittsburgh and Chicago, does, perhaps, the next business to Dannemillers, in Canton. This establishment is in the Herbruck and Kaufman block, on East Tuscarawas street. Mr. McCrea's trade lies principally in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and five traveling salesmen are regularly employed by him. He carries a stock of about $35,000 and his annual sales aggregate $120,000, with a healthy increase from year to year. Besides these wholesale establishments, there are three wholesale liquor stores in Canton, all doing a good business, viz.: the stores of L. J. Miday & Co., in their own handsome three-story brick building erected last year on North Market street, with annual sales amounting to $65,000; of Schalm Brothers, on north side of East Tuscarawas street, with annual sales amounting to $75,000; and of Mr. S. Bear, who opened his store in the Wernet Building, south side of East Tuscarawas street, and is also doing a thriving business. The retail business in dry goods, groceries, clothing, drugs, furniture, boots and shoes, etc., is also fully represented in the city. Among the many only a few can be noticed briefly here: As far back as the year 1815, Mr. Jacob Rex started a tailor shop in the present Rex Building, corner of Tuscarawas and Rex streets. Mr. John P. Rex learned the trade with his father, and in 1840 succeeded him in the business, which has been continued on the old site ever since. The boot and shoe firm of J. C. Bockius' Sons is one of the oldest established houses of the kind in Ohio, perhaps the very oldest. Mr. J. C. Bockius, the father of the present proprietors, opened a shoe shop on the 5th of May, 1820, in an old frame building which stood on the site of the court house. This building was removed, with the shop, in 1822, to the site of the Bockius property on South Market street. In 1836, it was moved one lot north, and in 1845 back again, where the brick building now stands. In 1836, the first stock of Eastern machine-made boots and shoes were brought to Canton by Mr. Bockius, and these goods were then quite a novelty. Previous to that time, men would go to the tannery, buy their own leather and then have shoes made for the whole family by the shoemaker. Shoemakers were then scarce, and as all the work was done by hand, it was necessarily slow; sometimes there would so many orders on the books that families would have to wait as long as four or five months for their shoes. To avoid such delay, many persons were accustomed to order a supply some months before they were actually needed. The introduction of shoes from the East already made, therefore, wrought quite a revolution in the business. In 1851, Mr. Bockius bought the ground upon which the store is now located, on the east side of the public square and erected the three-story brick building in which it is. In October, 1848, Mr. L. V. Bockius, and in 1870, Mr. Ed. Bockius became members of the firm, and after their father's death only a few years since, they continued the business. Mr. E. Bockius' death, this spring, left the elder brother, L. V. Bockius, as sole surviving partner. Three persons are given constant employment on custom work, and four are employed as clerks in the store. The stock carried along varies from $8,000 to $10,000, and about $25,000 worth of goods are sold annually. In the dry goods line, John Schilling, identified with the business in Canton since 1846; Zollars & Co., of which firm Mr. Zollars has been engaged in this line of trade for some thirty years and more, and A. Herbruck, for twenty years associated with Mr. Schilling, and since 1874 doing business in his own name, deserve honorable mention. Zollars' store was for many years before 1846, and afterward on its present site, conducted by Mr. Isaac Harter, deceased, a man of great business capacity, administrative ability and the strictest integrity. Mr. Zollars, a young man of limited means, entered his store in 1846; in the year 1852, he was taken into the business as a partner; Mr. Harter sold out his interest to Samuel Bard in 1862, who only remained eighteen months in the new firm, when Mr. Zollars succeeded to the entire business. In 1865, Mr. Peter Barlet was taken in as a partner, and he has been in the firm ever since. Mr. Harter, soon after retiring from the dry goods business, went into the banking business, and was the founder of one of the safest and best conducted banking institutions in the State of Ohio. Strict integrity and honorable dealing made Mr. Harter's name respected and his bank a trusted one far and wide. To his credit be it said, no trust reposed in him was ever betrayed. His sons, since his death, have continued the banking business upon the same substantial basis, as that upon which their honored father built up an established business and a fair fortune. Zollars & Co.'s store employs seven clerks, and they do an immense business, which is yearly increasing. Besides dealing in dry goods and carpets, in which his sales amount to $30,000 annually, Mr. A. Herbruck also engages in wholesaling timothy and clover seed, of which he handles about $30,000 worth every year. Mr. Schilling carries a full line of dry goods, is widely and favorably known all over Stark County and is doing a thriving business. He is a safe business man, and from an humble clerk in V. R. Kimball's thirty-five years ago, he has gone gradually onward and upward, until now he ranks among the best and most successful business men of the city. The jewelry establishment of Mr. Joseph A. Meyer's is one of the oldest business houses now remaining in Canton. Mr. Meyer himself is of old pioneer stock, and is highly respected by all who know him socially or in business. His establishment was originally started in 1837, by Mr. Samuel C. Fry, who sold out to Mr. Meyer in 1858. He carries a full assortment of watches, clocks, solid and plated ware, spectacles and jewelry of all kinds. Mr. M. Ruhman, still doing business in the Harter Block, is the pioneer merchant in ready-made clothing. He commenced his business in Canton, nearly on his present site, in the year 1851, and in his thirty years' residence in Canton has built up a character for honesty and fair dealing among a wide circle of friends and customers. These are brief sketches only of some of the establishments which started business in Canton

when it was yet a village, and before it began to put on the habiliments and airs of a city. With the development of the rich resources of the surrounding country, and the growth of the town, business has multiplied an hundred-fold, and Canton's trade in every branch of mercantile business has kept pace with the demands of the times. There is probably not a city of the same size in the West, whose business is in every respect upon so sound and firm a basis; and when, in panicky times, business houses all over the land have been going by the board by the thousands, scarcely a ripple of the wave of destruction has been felt among the business firms of Canton.

As the manufacturing and mercantile interests have become so varied and so extensive, exchange and banking facilities were naturally demanded by the business interests of the growing town. Notice has already been taken of the first bank in primitive times. This was resuscitated in after years, and served the public necessity for a long period. Incidentally also the starting of the First National Bank and of Mr. Isaac Harter's Savings Deposit Bank has been mentioned. For many years the Stark County Bank of Mr. James A. Saxton did a good work in meeting the needs of the public, with these other banks. In later years, Mr. George D. Harter started his bank, on Tuscarawas street, east of the public square, which from the first received the confidence of the people. The Farmers' Bank was started a few years ago, and is also upon a substantial foundation, and doing a good business. A year or two since, the City Bank of Canton, which had done business a little while, and then dissolved by the mutual agreement of the stockholders, was again started up under a new management, as the City National Bank, with Dr. P. H. Barr, the popular druggist in the old and well-established drug store of Dr. C. J. Geiger, deceased, as President, and Henry C. Ellison, a former Auditor of Stark County, as Cashier. Thus Canton is supplied with five banks at this time, all in good condition, and doing an extensive business.

From 1852 until within the past two or three years, the only shipping facilities enjoyed by the merchants and manufacturers of this city were furnished by the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad, which were for the most part not as liberal to her interests, nor, as one would think, to the interests of the company itself, as the good of a growing city, with well-established and successfully conducted business, and in the midst of resources which gave promise of much grander development and increased importance, seemed to demand. Competition is said to be the life of trade, and probably railroads, as well as other branches of business, are all the better for a little healthy competition. But the dawn of a better day in this regard also, is breaking upon the business interests of Canton. She already enjoys the advantages of cheap coal and cheap living, and the chief remaining factor to secure increased success to her industries, in the way of cheap transportation, is rapidly being provided. Already the effect of the opening of the Valley Railroad to Akron and Cleveland, in the beginning of the year 1880, is favorably felt. This road had been projected several years before, and was pushed chiefly by capitalists of Cleveland; but the citizens of Akron and Canton did not fail to appreciate the benefits which would accrue to themselves in its construction, and they, in company with the people of other smaller towns along the line of the road, gave a helping hand, until at last it was, after the usual delays, trials and tribulations, an accomplished fact. Since its operation, it has been doing good business, much better, indeed, than most new roads at so early a period in their history. What it needs now to insure its greater benefit to both stockholders and the people on the line of the road is an extension southward from Canton to bring it into connection with the coal and iron of the southern portion of the State. This undoubtedly will soon also be accomplished. So far as Canton is concerned, the Valley road has already brought the business transportation of the city away from the monopoly of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad Company, and this last-named corporation now gives better terms to shippers than ever before. The Valley Railroad has located the main passenger and freight depots near the crossing of the Fort Wayne road, in the southwestern part of the city, but recently, for the convenience of passengers, a neat and commodious passenger depot has been fitted up on West Tuscarawas street, which makes it more convenient for passengers from the hotels and the greater part of town than the main depot. The Connotton Valley Railway Company continued its road last year to Canton, and it has been completed this year already to Kent, and before the end of the season will probably be in full running order to Cleveland. But the railroad history is more fully given in another chapter of this work.

A late writer says of the people's social life : The citizens of Canton are not given to display. They are a quiet, order-loving people. None of them have a boastful spirit. It might be well for the town if some of its people were given to "blowing their own horn." But they do not seem to be so inclined. Hence we feel assured that the subjoined statistics of industrial enterprise here for the year 1879 are within proper limits :

	Employees.	Product.
C. Aultman & Co.....	550	$2,000,000
Diebold Safe & Lock Co.....	250	1,000,000
Wrought Iron Bridge Co.....	150	500,000
Canton Steel Works.....	140	400,000
C. Russell & Co.....	70	275,000
J. Biechele.....	26	180,000
Canton Spring Works.....	80	135,000
Bucher, Gibbs & Co.....	75	125,000
Whitman & Barnes Mfg Co.....	40	70,000
Novelty Iron Works.....	35	65,000
A. Ball & Co.....	30	50,000
E. E. Miller & Co.....	30	50,000
Canton Cutlery Co.....	35	35,000
John Danner.....	20	30,000
H. W. Werts & Co.....	25	30,000
Canton Saw Works.....	15	30,000
J. Dick & Bro.....	7	10,000
Flouring Mills.....	80	900,000
Woolen Mills.....	65	350,000
Brewery interest.....	30	100,000
Minor Establishments.....	225	275,000
Lumber yards.....	80	225,000
Grand total.....	2058	$6,830,000

We may add that upon personal inquiry we find the above figures far below the actual facts, at this present time, in many of these establishments, as they are probably in nearly all of them. In the above table, for instance, the Peerless Reaper Company, which appears as C. Russell & Co., in 1879, employed only seventy hands, and put out $275,000 worth of work. Last year, they had eighty hands, and built over fifteen hundred of their popular machines, and were unable to supply the demand. This year, their working force has been increased to 125 hands; they intend making, the present season, 2,500 machines, and the value of their production will not fall short of $375,000, an increase in two years of nearly 50 per cent.

A very large increase of working force and of manufactured material has also been made the present year, by the Aultman Co., by the Diebold Lock & Safe Co., by the Bucher & Gibbs Plow shops, and doubtless in nearly all the other establishments. In few or none, on the other hand, has there been any decrease, showing a constantly increasing demand for Canton manufactures.

A very satisfactory test of the business importance of a place to those who are interested in statistics and figures is furnished by the post office transactions. For the following facts in this line we are indebted to Mr. Charles S. Cock, Deputy Postmaster of Canton. The money order department of this office amounted to over $50,000, and the postal receipts to more than $20,000, leaving a net revenue to the Postal Department of the country of $15,000. This shows an increase over the previous year of nearly 25 per cent. Thirty thousand, or thereabouts, three-cent stamps and stamped envelopes are sold now per month, 12,000 or 15,000 postal cards and 20,000 one-cent envelopes are also sold each month, mainly to the business and manufacturing firms of the city; the demand is constantly increasing. It is estimated that the receipts in the post office business of the city proper will be this year several thousand dollars in advance of last year. This is certainly a good showing, and will secure for the city a free delivery within a very short period of time.

Another item of interest denoting progress is furnished by the census reports, and these will show a most remarkable increase in the city of Canton within the limits of the present generation. Before railroading, and with Massillon, by means of her canal facilities, in the ascendant, the total population of Canton City in 1850 was 2,603; this was also previous to the removal of the mower and reaper works from Greentown to Canton. The population ten years later, in 1860, was 4,041, an increase of 55 per cent. In 1870, the population had gone up to 8,660, an increase in ten years of 114 per cent. By the census of 1880, just completed, the population is 12,258, an increase in the past ten years of 41½ per cent, which, if Canton authorities had done as many other towns in the State, similarly situated, had done, would have been much greater than the data show to be the fact. There are in all directions outlying additions sufficient to increase the figures on population at least 1,000 more, which for all business purposes are part and parcel of the city, and ought in justice to be brought within the municipal corporation. The population of Canton Township, exclusive of the city, for the same periods, stands as follows : in 1850, 1,719; in 1860, 1,764; in 1870, 1,952; and in 1880, 2,615. We have not the figures at hand to give the population of the city and township anterior to 1850.

Previous to the year 1869, some action had been taken by the City Council to utilize the water of Meyer's Lake, as a permanent water supply for Canton, both for domestic and manufacturing use, and for protection against fire. The committee of the former City Council had decided, on examination, to adopt the Holly system, and J. L. Pillsbury, an experienced civil engineer, had made surveys and estimates which clearly indicated the practicability of the work. In the organization of the City Council in 1869, Messrs Louis Schaefer, Jacob Hawk and Daniel Worley became the Water-Works Committee, and, at a later day, were, under the law, elected the first Board of Trustees of Water-Works. Under their management, aided by the wise and experienced counsel of Mr. Pillsbury, the work was pressed forward rapidly; the citizens of Canton, by vote, authorized measures for raising the necessary funds; and by February, 1870, the works were in successful operation. On the first public trial of the new water-works Feb. 22, 1870, the District Court was in session, and the Judges were specially invited to witness their working. Upon the recommendation of the civil engineer, a majority of the committee on water-works had adopted the cement pipe for mains through the city. These had hardly dried long enough for any test. The day was cold and windy.

Everything, however, went off well, until engineer and trustees became infatuated and consented to an undue increase of the pressure, which blew out a waste at the West Creek. There was a hurrying and a flurrying among Trustees and engineer until the exact locality of the trouble had been discovered. This was on a Saturday, and by the following Sunday evening, everything had been put again into good running order. The cement pipes in this soil did not prove a success, and they have been gradually replaced by iron pipe, which with the extensions made from year to year, gives Canton to-day one of the best systems of protection against fire to be found anywhere. The larger manufacturing establishments have not only introduced the water for ordinary use, but have also connections for emergencies from fire by which they can almost entirely save themselves from the ravages of this king of terrors. With regard to the next great want of Canton, a system of complete sewerage, not so much can be said favorably. The following remarks of another in this connection are very much to the point, and in the hope that the early future history of the city may record the suggestions therein contained as an accomplished fact, they are introduced at this place.

While Canton is well located there is no doubt as to the susceptibility of its improvements in a sanitary sense. Its vital statistics go to prove that malaria infects its atmosphere. What it needs is a thorough system of drainage. The project is quite feasible, by reason of the favorable topography of the city. A fall of four inches to the hundred feet is ample, and Canton, because of her magnificent location, is capable of this advantage. An incline of three inches is better than many places enjoy.

CHAPTER XI.*

THE CITY OF CANTON — EDUCATIONAL AGENCIES — THE PRESS — JOHN SAXTON AND JOHN MCGREGOR, THE VETERAN EDITORS — PRESENT NEWSPAPERS — CANTON SCHOOLS — CHURCH HISTORY — SECRET AND BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS.

MAN is composed of mind and matter. In his individual development, and in the developments of civilization and progress, both factors deserve careful recognition. Mind controls matter, while, on the other hand, material influences have great weight in directing the operations of the mind. It is not, of course, the province of the historian so much to discuss philosophical problems as to make a fair presentation of facts in a somewhat logical manner, so that the philosopher may afterward, from the study of the facts, be prepared the better to speculate on the probabilities of the future. We have thus far presented almost exclusively the material aspects of the growth and development of this city and township; but we have not lost sight, by any means, of the most important of all facts that mental culture is of the highest importance in every true and real progress of any people or community. To his credit, it may be truthfully said, that the founder of Canton, Mr. Bezaleel Wells, recognized this fact in the beginning, and donated in the platting of the original town of Canton, one lot for school purposes and one for church purposes. The old Union School building on West Tuscarawas street, and the Presbyterian Church directly opposite, are now upon the sites of the donor, a living proof of his high estimate of education and religion as essential factors in the prosperity of any town. And imbibing the spirit of the founder, the great body of the people of Canton, from the beginning until now, have always been the friends of liberal education, and of the moral influences of the Christian Church. In modern times, also, the press has become a very potent lever in the same direction. Admitting that its influence has not always been used to promote the best interests of the people, it is nevertheless true that the press does much for the education of any community, whether, on the whole, it be for good or evil, though we may here express our own private opinion that it is generally for good rather than evil. In discussing the educational agencies of Canton, we shall, therefore, first present a brief history of journalism in this city, and some reminiscences of the pioneer newspaper men of the earlier times. The following general history of the Canton press was prepared by one in the business for many years, and may be accepted as accurate:

The newspapers of Canton represent the social, moral and material interests of the city and county with unusual journalistic enterprise and ability. Moreover, the gentlemen who give dignity to the noble calling of journalism here, are genial, whole-souled men, whom it is a pleasure to meet, and to whose good qualities of heart and brain we bear cheerful testimony.

The Canton Repository was the first newspaper in Canton or Stark County, and one of the first five or six in Ohio, the first number of which was printed March 30, 1815, by John Saxton. The paper is still in existence as the Canton Repository, and until 1871, the time of his death, the original proprietor was connected with the paper in the capacity of owner or editor. The files of the Repository have been carefully preserved. The veteran editor, in his inaugural sheet, pledges that "truth shall be his guide, the public good his aim," and lays before his readers the latest foreign news; the report of A. J. Dallas, Secretary of the Treasury, to the Committee of Ways and Means, upon the state of the public credit, the circulating medium, etc.; the proceedings of the Thirtieth Congress, among whose acts was one fixing the army list at 10,000 men; news from the war with Algiers, and local intelligence.

tered the business and remained several years. He then removed to Urbana, and began the publication of the Citizen and Gazette, where he still lives. His retirement from active newspaper work took place only a few months ago, having been proprietor and editor of one journal for forty-two years. In 1851, Thomas W., John Saxton's son, was taken in as partner, and in 1871, the Repository, with Thomas as sole proprietor, was consolidated with the Republican, published by Josiah Hartzell. In 1874, W. T. Bascom purchased Hartzell's interest, and the paper took the name of the Canton Repository. Mr. Bascom died in 1877. In February, 1878, a daily edition of the Repository was begun, and is still continued. It is the only daily in Stark County, and is an almost indispensable medium of intelligence to the people of Canton. It is conducted with ability and energy by Mr. Thomas W. Saxton, the sole proprietor, assisted by a competent corps of writers and reporters. The job printing department is one of the most complete in Northern Ohio, and turns out large quantities of work for the great manufactories of Canton.

The Ohio Volks-Zeitung, eight pages, 15x22, was established by the Ohio Volks-Zeitung Company, January 23, 1879, and is the only German paper printed in Stark County. It has a large circulation in Stark and the neighboring counties as well as throughout Ohio and the adjoining States. As early as 1820, the German population of Canton and Stark County had largely increased by emigration from Pennsylvania, Maryland and Europe, so that in October, 1821, Edward Schaefer, a German printer from Frankfurt-on-the-Main, established in Canton the Westliche Beobachter and Stark and Wayne County Anzeiger, being the second oldest German newspaper published in the State of Ohio. In 1826, Schaefer moved to Germantown, Ohio, when John Sala continued the paper here and afterward took Solomon Sala and D. C. Lehmus into partnership. In August, 1831, Peter Kaufmann came from Philadelphia and bought out the paper, which by that time had taken the patriotic name of Vaterlands freund und Geist der Zeit.

In company with Franz Hawerecht and Carl C. Fink, Kaufmann published, in 1838, the first German almanac in Canton. In the course of time several changes were made in the ownership, until John Raeber came here in August, 1858, with a printing office from Holmes County, and established the Deutsche in Ohio, in place of which the Ohio Staats-Zeitung appeared on the 15th of September, 1873; this was sold to the Ohio Volks-Zeitung Company, on the 8th of November, 1879.

To give sufficient room for increased reading matter and advertisements, the Ohio Volks-Zeitung was enlarged to its present size, 31x45, December 4, 1879, and is now one of the leading German Democratic papers in the north-eastern part of Ohio. The paper is very ably edited and conducted, and reflects credit upon the enterprising community in which it is published.

The Stark County Democrat was established in June, 1833, by a gentleman named Bernard, who died of cholera after running it about six months. It was then taken charge of by William Dunbar, who carried it on successfully until about 1836 or 1837, when he sold out to Daniel Gotshall, who published the paper until April, 1847, when he sold to Messrs. Carney and Leiter. These gentlemen published it until May, 1848, when it was sold to John and A. McGregor. The former dying in September of that year, Mr. A. McGregor has continued as editor ever since, with the exception of about eighteen months in 1858 and 1859, when it was edited by Thomas Beer. The Democrat is ably conducted and has a large circulation. It has been and continues to be the organ of the party in this county; it being, in fact, the only English Democratic paper in Stark County.

John Saxton, as the pioneer printer and editor of Canton, a resident of this city for fifty-six years, a good citizen and a Christian man, has been so closely identified with the progress of the town, that more than a passing notice is due his memory. He was born at Huntingdon, Penn., on the 28th of September, 1792, and was the eldest of a large family. It is well known that in April, 1815, he started the Ohio Repository, on which he labored without interruption for fifty-six consecutive years. In 1815, he wrote and published an account of the battle of Waterloo, and the arrest of the first Napoleon. In 1870, he wrote and published an account of the battle of Sedan, and the arrest of Napoleon the third. It is believed that not another man in the United States has labored so long at one place on one newspaper. What an amount of work he has performed! What volumes of truths he has laid before his readers! His selections were always useful, always interesting, always inculcating pure principles. Nothing licentious or unclean ever found a place in his columns. No matter what party, school or creed to which a man might belong, he could always find either in editorial or selection, something which would afford pleasure and instruction. In his political views he was always sincere, and earnestly advocated what he honestly believed. Those views are so well known that in these brief notes we forbear to speak further. In matters of religion, he was a devout Presbyterian. In the winter of 1833-34, he united with the church then under the pastoral care of the Rev. T. M. Hopkins. He at once became an active, zealous laborer in the cause of his divine Master. There was no half way work about him. No looks of solemn sourness, and mere Sunday performance. His was a cheerful, happy, conscientious, loving, performance of religious duty. He was a Christian all over, in daily work, in heart and in purse. It was not a religion of constraint, but of freedom. He chose the true and right way because he loved it. He said of wisdom,

"Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all her paths are peace."

He preached religion in his daily life. He literally went about doing good. No one doubted his piety, for, like the Apostle James, he believed that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. He had the wisdom which was from above, first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy. His every-day work was planned for the good of others. He began and ended it with a careful reading of the Scriptures and with prayer. He ascertained who was sick and who needy, and had about as many patients for his daily visits as a physician in a moderate practice. It might be supposed that his increasing deafness would incapacitate him for such a work, but if he could not hear the voice of the patients he would go and see them, feel their pulse, give them the benefit of his sunny smile, and perhaps pray with them. Never obtrusively, but always so gently and kindly was this done, that in the circle of his acquaintance he was always gladly welcomed, and many a one would have felt as much disappointed if they had missed his visit as they would that of their physician. Nor was this practice ephemeral or spasmodic. It was a life duty with him. Not only duty, but he loved to do it. His church was the object of his special regard. He arranged his business and the day of publication of his paper with a view to being always present at the prayer meeting. At one time, he changed his publication day so that the issue of his paper should never interfere with his attendance at the prayer meeting. There was a time, many years ago, in which a season of spiritual declension had reduced the number of attendants to only four or five. Then it was unfashionable to be a Christian, and it was almost as well known before meeting as after, who would be there. His faith never flagged, his punctuality never remitted, he was always there. It is believed that in thirty-five years, unless absent from town, he never missed a prayer meeting. His deafness was a sore trial to him. He could only hear by means of a trumpet. That he always carried with him. The time came when even that did not enable him to hear, but his attention was not even then remitted. He would occupy his place. His minister gave him a memorandum of the hymns and lent him his sermon in manuscript to read. One great desire of his life was to see a new and commodious house of worship erected on the spot where the old inconvenient building stood; he lived to see it done, and hoped to hear the Gospel there. His son James, in order to enable his father to hear, visited certain churches in the East, where speaking tubes were constructed in such manner as to come to the ear by a flexible tube, and had one constructed for him in the new church; he was delighted with the prospect now before him, but as Moses on Pisgah's top could see the land of promise, but did not enter, so father Saxton saw the work complete, and just one week before the dedication, passed away without enjoying it.

His evenness of temper was remarkable. The writer has known him intimately for thirty-three years, for more than twenty of them lived side by side with him, had daily intercourse with him, and yet remembers only one occasion in which that temper was ruffled. For a man of so much decision of character, such clear and well defined views, and such earnestness in maintaining them, it furnishes a remarkable illustration of the power of his judgment over his passions. He had a great fondness for children. He recognized them, knew who they were, remembered their names, talked to them, often gave them his advice. His genial ways and loving smile so attracted their attention and won their regard, that they loved him.

In times when printing facilities bore no comparison to those of the present day, when information in regard to current events could only be procured by great labor, when mails were few and far between, when post-riders had to convey them over the mountains by painful and tedious work, often fording swollen streams and struggling through the mire in primitive roads and primeval forests, when the rude hand-lever press was the best printing machine in use, and when the ink was distributed by a ball-pad instead of a roller, it was no trifling task to get out a weekly newspaper with regularity. In an editorial written by him fifty-five years later, he thus alludes to his early labors :

It would be difficult for a person of this generation to imagine the forbidding aspect of this region in the year 1815. It was the year which was signalized by the conclusion of the second war with the mother country, and which firmly established our complete independence as a nation. The business affairs of the country, which had been prostrated, were made yet worse by the impoverished and worse than worthless currency of the period.

Canton was a village of three hundred inhabitants, and no paper was printed west of it. From 1815 to 1819, the Repository was printed in the building, and in the very room now occupied by Fessler's grocery. It was then removed to the Kauffman building, still standing, on South Market street, where it remained until 1822, when I removed it again to my own premises near by, where it had a home until the consolidation of the Repository and Republican, in 1868. My first article in my first paper, printed March 30, 1815, was a prospectus, which read as follows :

"TO THE PUBLICK.

"In a government where the blessing of Freedom is enjoyed and justly estimated, it is acknowledged by all that the dissemination of correct practical knowledge is of the first importance. The continuance of that freedom, the inestimable birthright of every American, must depend upon the Intelligence, Patriotism and virtue of the people. The establishment of Newspapers are the most easy and convenient means of gaining that correct information, respecting their political concerns, which will enable them to judge, with accuracy, the wisdom or folly of their rulers. Strongly impressed with these sentiments, the editor pledges himself to his patrons, that 'truth shall be his guide, the public good his aim.' In avowing his attachment to one of the two political parties which at present so unhappily divide our country, he is free in declaring that his is an attachment, not of party, but from principle; the result, not of interest, prejudice or passion, but founded on impartial investigation. It is an attachment to the principles avowed by the immortal Sages who declared our Independence—to the form of Government guaranteed by the Federal constitution, and a disciple of the school of Washington. A candid and fair investigation of political subjects is, undoubtedly, the sweet palladium of National Freedom; liberal and well informed men, of all parties, are invited to make it a Repository of their sentiments—the editor reserving on all occasions, the right of exercising a decided control over everything offered for insertion. He will reject everything which he may deem illiberal, unjust or impolitic, everything calculated unnecessarily to excite party prejudice or animosity, or to wound the feelings of individuals. Actuated by such motives, and guided by such tenets, he submits, cheerfully, the merits of his labors and his cause to an enlightened publick."

Such were the sentiments that gave birth to the Ohio Repository, and these were my promises made fifty-five years ago. But where are the then living witnesses who can testify in regard to my fulfillment of them? Alas! they have all gone before me to their final account. Their children and their children's children, one after another, have risen up. The few familiar names of that day are multiplied over and over again. The few rude traces of the improvements that then sufficed, disappear day by day. The village of three hundred is now a city of twelve thousand, and the wilderness about now "blossoms as the rose" with fruits and fields and homes that exhibit the highest efforts of modern civilization. During all this period, a merciful Providence has spared my life, and enabled me to participate in the working out of these wonderful changes. It has been my pleasure every week to witness the regular appearance of my paper, and to know that as an instrumentality of usefulness and power it has kept pace with the growth and expansion of the institutions of which it has been an index.

His newspaper longevity is strikingly illustrated by the fact that he recorded the final battles of both Napoleons—Waterloo and Sedan. The article in the Repository and Republican of September 9, 1870, setting forth this fact, was commented upon by editors all over the country. We reproduce this very extraordinary example here :

In turning over the leaves of the Repository files, back fifty-five years ago, we find in some pages striking points of similarity to those that we print to-day. Take the following examples :

PRUSSIAN ARMY "STARTS ON TO PARIS."

London, September 3.—A special correspondence of the Tribune telegraphs from the King's headquarters at Vendrest, near Sedan, Friday: The battle of Sedan began at 6 o'clock on the morning of September 1. Two Prussian corps were in position on the west of Sedan, having got there by long-forced marches to cut off the French retreat to Mezieres. South of Sedan was the first Bavarian Corps, and east, across the Meuse, the Second Bavarian corps. The Saxons were on the northeast with the Guards. I was with the King throughout the day, on the hill above St. Meuse, commanding a splendid view of the valley of the Meuse and of the field. After a tremendous battle, the Prussians, having completely surrounded Sedan, and the Bavarians having entered the fortifications, the Emperor capitulated at five o'clock and fifty minutes P. M.

In his letter to the King of Prussia he said: "As I cannot die at the head of my army, I lay my sword at the feet of your Majesty."

house within a few weeks torn down to make room for the extension of the new and beautiful post office building of Mr. James A. Saxton) for storing apples purchased for shipment to the Eastern market. He had bought and stored therein about 1,200 bushels, when he took out an insurance on them of $2,500. The name of the young man was J. W. Moyer, and he came from Pittsburgh. It is strongly suspected, and in the light of after events, reasonably certain, that, after taking out his insurance, he had procured carbon oil, and sprinkled barrels and boards with it, and then in the later part of the evening set fire to it. He was positively known to have gone into the cellar about 9 o'clock on that evening. It was soon after the close of the prayer-meeting at the Presbyterian Church, and Father Saxton had already retired for the night. Providentially the prayer-meeting at the Baptist Church on South Market closed somewhat later than usual, and parties on their way home from the church discovered the fire and gave the alarm, and it was put out before getting into full headway. Moyer was arrested and tried by the court, but by the superior efforts of able counsel was acquitted by the jury. It was currently reported at the time that having no money to hire counsel, he had secured the services of the gentleman who defended him, by executing a chattel mortgage to him on the apples which had not been materially injured by the fire, and that after being saved from the penitentiary by his attorney, he had endeavored to cheat him out of his fee in the sale of the apples. Moyer soon found public opinion too strong against him in Canton and went to other parts. He came finally, it is said, to an untimely end, a proof that "the way of the transgressor is hard." Mr. Saxton was a soldier in the war of 1812, between the United States and England. While in the service, upon garrison duty at Black Rock, near Buffalo, he partially lost his hearing by an accident. In the discharge of some duty he was under a large canon, when a soldier fired it off, paralyzing the organs of hearing. This was the greatest physical misfortune of his life.

Mr. Saxton commenced the publication of the Repository during the administration of James Madison. He belonged to the Republican party of that day. He was subsequently a Whig, but espoused the present Republican party upon its first organization. He voted for the Seldom is the active, business life of a man prolonged to such a period as has this one, the termini of which are marked by such startling events. As will be seen elsewhere, Mr. John Saxton, who enjoyed this rare good fortune, died on Sunday last, the 16th instant.

A man universally beloved by old and young, Mr. Saxton, made a very narrow escape with his life in the fall of 1868. A young man with a great show of outward piety, and one who made long and eloquent prayers at the prayer-meetings of the Presbyterian Church and was greatly beloved by the sisters of the congregation, rented the cellar of the house in which Mr. Saxton had resided for many years (the following Presidential candidates : James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, also for Henry Clay, in 1832 ; for Harrison in 1836 and 1840, for Clay again in 1844, Taylor in 1848, Scott in 1852, Fremont in 1856, Lincoln in 1860 and 1864, and Grant in 1868.

The biography of John Saxton, calls to mind the fact that Hon. Joseph Medill, now one of the editors of the Chicago Tribune, began his newspaper life with Mr. Saxton. In 1831, when Mr. Medill was about seven or eight years old—his parents then residing at Massillon, Ohio,—his father took him to Canton to attend a Revolutionary Soldiers' celebration, and subscribed for the Repository, which he continued to take until his death, in 1868. In the winter of 1838-39, the younger Medill began writing for Mr. Saxton's paper, upon education and kindred topics. During the campaign of 1840, he contributed almost weekly to the paper, many of his articles being used as editorials. Mr. Medill generally called at the office on publication day, when Mr. Saxton would press him into the service in "writing the mail," after which, the young man would be loaded down with papers for the subscribers on his route homeward. About 1840, Mr. Medill "learned the case," and frequently helped in getting out the paper. He continued to write for it until about 1845, contributing many articles during the campaign of 1844, when he was editing the Cleveland Leader. He relates that Mr. Saxton usually composed his editorials at the case, frequently doing this while engaged in conversation with his friends in the office. About the year 1858 or 1859, Mr. Medill's brother, the late Maj. William H. Medill, established the Republican at Canton, which, a few years afterward, was consolidated with the Repository. The Messrs. Medill's father was a warm friend of Mr. Saxton, and, during thirty years of his life, frequently contributed to the columns of his paper.

In leaving the record of Father Saxton, it is but appropriate to refer to the somewhat wonderful career of John McGregor, one of the original proprietors of the Stark County Democrat under its present management, which, from 1848 to this date, has been with but little intermission under the editorial control of his son, A. McGregor, a period of nearly thirty-three years. John McGregor made his advent in this city for the purpose of assisting his son, A.

McGregor, in a private school of the latter, in the early part of the year 1848. Soon after, the Democrat was purchased by the two, and has remained in the family from that time to the present. In taking control of the paper on the 24th of May, 1848, the new editors presented their position as follows : "The paper will be conducted as heretofore upon Democratic principles. We are, and always have been, opposed to a Bank of the United States, and to a paper currency in any shape, believing with Mr. Webster, that banking enriches the 'rich man's field with the sweat of the poor man's brow.' We are opposed to a protective tariff, and fishing bounties, believing that they will cripple commerce and tax communities, to benefit the manufacturer, the iron master, the sugar grower, and the fisherman. We are opposed to all monopolies, believing that all that is necessary to raise our country to the highest pitch of greatness and glory is 'a clear course and no favor.' We are in favor of an independent treasury, believing that the people are better qualified to take care of the public money than is any soulless corporation. We are in favor of electing all public officers, believing that the people are better qualified to choose their own servants, than any President, Governor, Legislature, or Court is of choosing for them. These are our opinions on the subjects mentioned, and these subjects we will discuss calmly and reasonably in the Democrat. We will not, knowingly, injure any man in reputation or feeling, and if, by inadvertence, anything should be inserted that is wrong or unjust to any individual, we shall always be ready, when convinced of the wrong done, to make the amende honorable. Having no personal feelings to gratify, with respect to any one—being under the control of no man or set of men, we shall avoid all personal altercations, and shall not allow others (through the Democrat) to malign, traduce, or abuse any man in the community, nor shall we be guilty of such conduct ourselves. Principles, not men, is our motto. While we wish 'to do unto others as we wish them to do unto us,' we shall, also, act upon the converse of the proposition, and exact from others such usage as we are willing to accord them. Guided by these principles and sentiments, the Democracy of Stark County will, at all times, find us at our post, ready to do our best in the cause of freedom, equal rights, equal burdens, constitutional reform, and the defense of our common country against internal and external foes."

John McGregor, the senior editor, died on the following 6th of September, at Wadsworth, Medina County, his place of residence in this State. He was born in Hamilton, Lanarkshire, Scotland, on the 28th day of June, 1796. At fourteen years of age, he removed to London, and was placed under the care of the Rev. Alexander Fletcher, preparatory to his entering college. After graduating, a few years later, at the University of Glasgow, he adopted the vocation of a teacher in his native town, Hamilton. By nature an ardent Republican, he engaged with ardor in the cause of freedom, and was a distinguished member of the Radical party of 1819, in Scotland. His talents and energy made him a conspicuous leader of the Rebels—they were called rebels in those days—and he was appointed to head the revolt in Hamilton. In the spring of this year, 1819, all parts of Great Britain were rife for insurrection, but whilst millions of men, in England, Ireland and Scotland, had "pledged their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor," to stand firm in the hour of trial, there was treachery somewhere, and the Government being made aware of the plans of the leaders, used its huge and mighty power to crush out the rebellion, and this was quickly accomplished. Of course, the leaders being known were marked as victims to satiate the demands of the offended and incensed rulers. John McGregor, as one of these, preferring liberty, at any price, to a sojourn in prison, fled to the mountains, and managed to elude those employed by the British Government to arrest the rebels, until the storm of governmental wrath had blown over, and pardon had been granted to all the leaders of the revolt who remained alive. Seeing that all hopes of establishing a British Republic were abortive, Mr. McGregor with his family, then consisting of his wife, his son, A. McGregor, and his three daughters born in Scotland, determined to emigrate to America. In 1827, he settled in Addison County, in the State of Vermont, where he resided until 1833, when he removed to Medina County in this State. At the time of his decease, besides the four children brought along from the old country as mentioned above, five other children had been added to Mr. McGregor's family. Mr. McGregor was somewhat known in Canton as a teacher of youth, before he assumed the more complex and arduous duties of an editor. In the strictest acceptation of the word, he was a gentleman. In politics, he was rigidly firm but courteous. As a scientific man, he, then, had but few equals. He died honored and respected by all, and without an enemy. His mantle has fallen on worthy shoulders, in the person of his son, A. McGregor, Esq., the present editor of the Democrat.

Besides the papers mentioned above, Canton has two papers of more recent origin, one the Canton Republican, yet in its first volume, edited and published by Robert C. Cassidy, advocating Republican principles from a proposed higher moral and social standpoint than is often taken by the political press of our country. The other, the Canton Courier, a paper devoted to the advocacy of the most radical and advanced views of the modern temperance reform, which is controlled and edited by R. C. Mosgrove. Both these papers are conducted with marked ability. Of those who have contributed freely and largely to the press of Canton, and who have had much to do in former years in shaping public opinion, and are yet of great influence in the community, the names of Dr. L. Slusser and Louis Schaefer, Esq., stand out prominently; indeed a large part of this history of Canton city and township is compiled from their contributions. That "the pen is mightier than the sword" has been instanced on very many occasions, and the history of Canton is no exception. Ignoring the fact that at times the political press has been severe, possibly unjust and abusive, it may still be said that the press of this city, without exception, has, as a rule, favored every movement looking to the material and intellectual improvement of the people, and the cause of true morality and religion has had but little, if any, cause to lament the power of a free and untrammelled press. And this is as it should always be in a free country.

Along back so far ago as the year 1837, the temperance movement commenced in Canton, as in other parts of the country. The Baptist Church seems to have taken the initiative several years before this time as the following action will show: "Regarding the evils of intemperance and its desolating effects upon the happiness of individuals, public and private virtue, and the welfare of the community, it was declared May 22, 1834, to be the strong and deliberate conviction of the church, that the time had arrived when no professed disciple of Christ could manufacture, buy, sell, or use ardent spirit as a drink without being guilty of immorality, and violating his profession as a Christian, and it was resolved that entire abstinence from the manufacture, use and sale of this article should be an invariable condition for membership and good standing." The historian's position will not allow him here to sit in judgment upon the wisdom and propriety of the positions taken in this action, and the same will hold true in regard to other temperance movements and organizations for other purposes. It is his province to state the facts, but he cannot help saying here, that in the absence of almost everything of a tangible nature, after his most diligent researches in regard to the rise and progress of the temperance movement in Canton, he is extremely gratified to be able to start his brief discussion of this part of the subject from this earliest action in that direction. Without being able to fix dates or furnish particular reminiscences, Mr. John Danner, an old resident, and a lifelong active and consistent temperance man, informs us that this movement in Canton has gone through about the same stages and the same experiences as in the other older settled parts of the country. The original temperance agitation, as appears in the above cited action, was directed solely against spirituous liquors, and no effort was made to prevent the use of malt liquors, wine and cider as a beverage. This made but little headway against the evils of intemperance, and it was not long until pledges were urged and taken also against the use of the latter. One of the more prominent movements against the use of all alcoholic beverages is known as the Washingtonian movement. The organization was specifically distinguished from all previous movements in this direction as the reformed drunkards' organization, and was carried forward mainly by the recital of experiences on the part of men who had been victims of the inordinate desire for strong drink, and had taken the pledge. These experiences, laughable at times and pitiable by turns, addressed as they were to men's emotions, ran like wild-fire throughout the length and breadth of the land. According to our friend Danner, the Washingtonian movement struck Canton before the year

1840. The Presidential campaign of this year was known as the "Hard Cider Campaign," and the effect of it upon "Washingtonians" was sadly demoralizing. Many went back to their cups and never rallied again. Following the days of Washingtonianism came the Sons, the Daughters and the Cadets of Temperance, organizations to some extent secret in character. While these still live in some places, they have long since been buried in Canton. Up to the time of these organizations, everything was ostensibly carried forward under the influence of "moral suasion," but while the Constitutional Convention of Ohio, which framed the present State Constitution, was in session, a strong pressure was brought to bear upon the members by the more radical temperance people of the State, to take away the prestige of selling liquor, by refusing license for its sale in the Constitution of the State. The convention yielded so far as to present an article on license to a separate vote of the people. A vigorous campaign followed; the constitution was adopted, but the article providing for license was rejected. The views presented against this article were that the sanction of the law made the business of selling liquor respectable, and that if this sanction were removed, it would soon cease to be so; that men would by the force of public opinion be compelled to desist from it entirely. But not so; instead of the licensed houses under penalties for violating the laws, there was free trade in liquor, and the traffic, at first open and public as before, multiplied tenfold, and finally took refuge in basements and behind green screens and painted windows. This was the beginning of the modern saloon business, and it may be styled also very appropriately the "transition stage" of the temperance movement, not only in Canton, but all over the State of Ohio. After this began the period of legal prohibition, which combined with various special movements to combine features of all the previous stages, have been going on for a period of nearly thirty years, but which are of recent origin and have hitherto been so unproductive of marked and permanent results that they can hardly as yet be considered historical. Among the present active, energetic temperance men of Canton, we give the names of Samuel J. Rockhill, for some years a teacher in the public schools, and Maj. Frank Baird.

There are two lodges of the Masonic fraternity in Canton. One of these, Canton Lodge, No. 60, held its first meeting on the 1st of March, 1821, under a dispensation from the Grand Lodge of Ohio. The officers were Moses Anderson, Master; James Dunnan, S. Warden; B. C. Goodwill, J. Warden, and J. W. Lathrop, Secretary. William Coolman was the first delegate to the Grand Lodge for Canton in December, 1821. The lodge was dedicated January 15, 1822, by Rial McArthur, Deputy Grand Master, and at this time received its charter. This lodge is now in a prosperous condition and is composed of 125 members. The present officers are Henry A. Wise, Master; Joseph Weaver, S. Warden; R. Bauhof, J. Warden; W. H. Wyant, Secretary; H. Bowen, Treasurer; and M. Frederick, now one of the oldest members, Tiler. Eagle Lodge, No. 431, was organized by members drawn from Canton Lodge. The first officers were Herman Meyer, W. Master; J. F. Bauhof, S. W.; G. W. Lawrence, J. W.; M. Ruhman, Treas.; A. M. Shane, Sec'y. This lodge had an auspicious beginning, and has prospered from the start. It has a membership at this time of seventy-two members. The present officers are C. F. Laiblin, W. M.; J. F. Bauhof, S. W.; A. J. Underhill, J. W.; M. Ruhman, Treas.; T. C. McDowell, Sec'y; M. Fulmer, Sr. Deacon; William Ball, Jr. Deacon, and M. Frederick, Tiler. Whether all its claims upon antiquity are well founded or not, Freemasonry is the oldest, most wide-spread, and in our judgment the most perfectly organized of all the fraternities. We are sorry, therefore, at not being able to present any interesting reminiscences of Masons in the early settlement of Canton.

Nimisilla Lodge, No. 39, I. O. O. F.—Was instituted June 9, 1845, O. P. Stidger, James Armstrong, George Miller, Ralph A. Ingersoll, and G. T. Clark having been the Charter Members. This lodge has been for years in a prosperous condition, and now numbers over 200 members. Stark Lodge, No. 513, was instituted May 15, 1872, by members from Nimisilla Lodge, and now numbers about one hundred members. Mannheim Lodge, No. 408 (German), was also instituted by members of the old lodge, August 27, 1868. Canton Encampment, No. 112, a higher branch of the order, was instituted August 3, 1868, and is prospering. All these lodges of the I. O. O. F. meet in the third story of Whiting & Poyser's Building, corner of Seventh street and the public square.

The Knights of Honor, Canton Lodge, No. 94—Was instituted March 15, 1875, with about fifty charter members, and Canton Council, No. 373, American Legion of Honor, was instituted December 10, 1880, with 156 charter members. These orders are both for the purpose of providing insurance for their members at a very low cost. Up to this time only one of the members has died in this city, and the amount of $2,000 was paid to the family of the deceased. We are indebted for the above facts relating to the fraternities mentioned, mainly to Mr. William H. Wyant, and express our regret at not being able to make them fuller and more explicit. There are undoubtedly other orders of a similar character, which deserve as honorable mention as those named, but our limited space prevents any further notice of them.

The early settlers in this township and city being mostly Pennsylvanians or native Germans, had a high regard, as a rule, for intelligence from their standpoint, and for a sound morality. It must be acknowledged by the writer of this part of the history of Stark County, himself a Pennsylvanian, that their estimate of intelligence would not answer the gauge of the present time, nor was it up to the New England standard; but, beneath it all lay the natural conservatism of the German character to "make haste slowly." "Try all things, and hold fast that which is good," is sound doctrine in many more things than in questions of religious doctrine and practice. Schools and schoolmasters, in German and English, though both partaking largely of the primitive type, were a part and parcel of the original settlement of this township and city. And one thing is to be said right here in favor of this old German conservatism, the schools here have never retrograded; though slowly, still advancing, they stand equal to the best in the whole country to-day. Radicalism, in any sphere of progress, makes many mistakes and blunders, which require time for their correction, while a progressive conservatism with fewer mistakes to correct, is likely to move forward more steadily and more successfully in accomplishing its object. Some of the earlier school efforts, reminiscences of teachers, and school experiences have been given in former chapters. Among the first teachers of Canton, besides those already mentioned, Capt. Darius Lyman may be mentioned with honor; he taught successfully in Canton, for three or four years about 1820-23, when he removed to Wadsworth, Medina Co., where he is still living, though over ninety years of age and quite feeble. Bradley C. Goodwill was also one of Canton's early and honored teachers. About the year 1830, William Dunbar taught school in this city. Before 1830 was also a Mr. Lyman. In and after 1831 came Dr. Barrick Michener, and Messrs. Monks, Timothy Hopkins, James Allen and Beck. Dr. Michener was not only a successful teacher, but also a distinguished one. He studied medicine, practiced some years in Massillon, and afterward removed to Illinois. Andrew Monks, priding himself particularly in teaching penmanship and figures, was a somewhat peculiar man. He was a very heavy man, with extremely large abdominal development, and withal, pretty fond of his toddy. One of the boys of the day, still living and honored in this city, states that it was almost his daily habit when school had closed for the day to repair to Clark's Tavern in the Fourth Ward and indulge with any boon companions he might chance to meet there. As Monks in liquor was very fond of discussion, he, on many occasions, provoked quarrels between himself and his friends, when, in accordance with the custom, "in such cases made and provided," all parties would adjourn to a neighboring tan-yard and settle the dispute by "a knock-down argument," in which Monks, from his great "weight," usually came off victor. Mr. B. F. Leiter, when he first came to Canton from the State of Maryland, taught school for awhile, afterward studied law, was first elected to the State Legislature at Columbus, where he occupied the chair in a heated contest between the two parties to get control of the House of Representatives, under peculiar and somewhat embarrassing circumstances, and was afterward, in 1854, and again in 1856, elected to the Lower House in the Congress of the United States. He continued to reside in Canton until his death. Mr. James Cowles, a graduate of Yale, opened a school in the old Academy building, but only remained a year or two. A. McGregor taught one of the public schools in the winter of 1842-43, Messrs. E. L. Carney and John Sheridan teaching with him during the same winter. Mr. McGregor afterward had a select school until 1848, having associated with him his father, John McGregor, during the last part of the time, when both became connected with the publication of the Stark County Democrat. John McGregor died the same year; A. McGregor still edits, as vigorously as ever, the Democrat. Ira M. Allen took the McGregor select school and continued it until 1849, when he became the first Superintendent of the Union School. A few years later, he took charge of the Charity School at Kendal, now a part of Massillon. Mr. Allen, after a lapse of some years, is again at this time in charge of that school. Before proceeding to consider the present school system of the city, this is the place to state that, in 1838, Rev. Mr. Goshorn and his wife opened a Female Seminary in the city, under the auspices of the Methodist Church, as will be seen under the history of the Methodist Episcopal Church, given further along in this chapter. They taught in the seminary quite successfully for a number of years, or until about the year 1845, when they left. An interregnum of a year or so occurred, when the Trustees, finding no one in the Methodist Church desirous or willing to take the seminary, authorized Louis Schaefer, Esq., to correspond with Rev. Mr. Mealy, and if possible, to secure him as Principal of the seminary. Some correspondence had already passed between Mr. Schaefer and Mr. Mealy with reference to another position, which, however, he had declined. The Trustees of the seminary offered the use of their building for one year free of rent, showing a very liberal spirit, when it is remembered that the institution was under Methodist auspices, and Mr. Mealy was a Lutheran Minister. He accepted the proffer made him, and at once removed to Canton with his wife and only daughter, who afterward became the wife of Louis Schaefer. Mr. Mealy continued in the seminary only one year. A few years later, he purchased the Witting drug store, the stand now occupied by Dr. P. H. Barr, so long and so favorably known, over most of the county, as the old Geiger drug store, on east Tuscarawas street. Mr. and Mrs. Mealy spent the remainder of their days in Canton; they are gone from among us, as is their daughter and only child, Mrs. Schaefer; but the remembrance of their Christian kindness and sociability remain fresh and fixed in the hearts and memories of many of the present residents of the city. After Mr. Mealy's retirement from the seminary, it remained unoccupied until it was sold and diverted into other uses ; it did a good work, though its life was short, and its memory is blessed.

A convention composed of delegates representing German citizens from all parts of the United States, was held at Phillipsburg, Penn., August 13, 1841, to promote the study of German and English classical literature, and they resolved to erect a seminary for that purpose. Louis Schaefer, of Canton, was a member of that convention, and although then a young man, he was appointed general collecting agent for the United States, to raise funds to establish such an institution. For some reason or other, the project failed of realization. But Mr. Schaefer has to-day, in his hands, a subscription list, with original and copied signatures, among the names upon which appear John Tyler, President of the United States ; T. Ewing, Secretary of the Treasury ; Daniel Webster, Secretary of State ; Fr. Granger, Postmaster General ; Henry Clay, United States Senator ; Daniel Sturgeon, United States Senator ; John Bell, Secretary of War ; John C. Calhoun, United States Senator, and E. Whitteley, Auditor of the Treasury.

In 1840 or 1841, parties in Canton, interested in the cause of education, made arrangements to take possession of the school property donated by Mr. Wells, and erect thereon a male academy ; the newly organized English Lutheran congregation paid a part of the money necessary to erect the building, with the privilege of using the first floor as a place of worship until it should be required for school purposes. The building was erected, but the school did not prosper to any great extent. In the spring of 1846, a company consisting of Isaac Harter, William Hawk, Martin Wikidal, Christian Palmer, Abraham Lind, Jacob Flohr, George Dewalt and Louis Schaefer, bought the rights of the original Trustees on easy terms, organized under a written constitution still in the hands of Mr. Schaefer, and authorized the latter to secure the services of Rev. Dr. A. B. Bierdemann as Principal, which he did. The arrangement seems not to have been entirely satisfactory ; Dr. Bierdemann, whom the writer of this, in after years, knew personally and somewhat intimately, was a fine scholar, and, in most respects, a genial man ; but he was also a man of very firm convictions and even prejudices, and of an unyielding character under opposition. At any rate, the Board of Trustees and he did not harmonize, and, at a meeting held November 16, 1846, he was requested formally to surrender his lease of the academy building, or rather that part of it used for school purposes. This he did, other teachers followed but with indifferent results, and a few years later the academy building became the nucleus of the present school system of Canton, and was transferred to the control of the Board of Education. In the year 1849, a general act was passed by the General Assembly of Ohio, entitled "an act for the better regulating of public schools," but a year before this, by a public vote of the people, a public school was organized. Previously, all the schools of the village were under private management, and no special arrangements had been made for the education of the poorer classes of children. The teachers of the former period were generally devoted and earnest educators, whose souls were in the work, and they laid deep and strong the foundation, upon which the present condition of general intelligence and educational progress in Canton has been attained. Among them, A. McGregor and Ira M. Allen were with the first advocates of the public school system. Upon the re-organization of the public schools of Canton under the law of 1849, Mr. Allen, who had already taught one year in them, was elected the first Superintendent of the Canton Union School. Among those who did good, successful work, against all opposition, for the establishment of the public schools by a vote of the people, the name of Mr. G. W. Huntington stands pre-eminent. He lived, too, long enough to witness the good results, which the people and their children secured for themselves by the vote of that election day so many years ago. The opposition came principally from the wealthier classes, and was somewhat formidable, though a few prominent property-holders gave the project their favor from the beginning, and nearly all have ever since given the public school work their cordial support. Canton was at this time a village of less than four thousand inhabitants. Mr. Allen was succeeded by Hon. H. S. Martin in 1854. The original records of the Board of Education have been either lost or destroyed, and there are no trustworthy statistics of the schools prior to the year 1855. In July of that year, Mr. Martin was re-elected

Jacob Hane

Superintendent, and teacher in the high school, with eight assistant lady teachers in the lower departments, as follows : Two in the Grammar School ; one in the Secondary (C. and D. Grammar School) ; four in the primary schools ; and one in a mixed school. Among these was Miss Betsey S. Cowles, who is yet well-known all over the State as of one of the best teachers that have graced the profession in Ohio. From the nearest calculation that can be made upon the meager data of this period at hand, the number of pupils in all the schools did not, in the year 1855, amount to five hundred. The Superintendent's salary was $800, and that of the lady teachers ranging from $150 to $400. Mr. Martin continued in the schools until January 1, 1864, a term of over eight years. His former pupils invariably speak well of him, and some of them are at this time still teaching in the Canton Public Schools. He left the superintendency to take his seat in the Senate of Ohio, to which distinguished position he had been elected at the preceding October election. In the Senate, he was a warm friend and supporter of all measures looking to the greater efficiency of the school work ; and, if we are not mistaken, he served as a member of the Standing Committee on Public Schools throughout his entire term of two years' service. He is still a resident of Canton, and a warm friend and patron of the schools. His successor was Mr. H. S. Leland, who continued as Superintendent during the remainder of that school-year, and the greater part of the following one. On account of misunderstanding and difficulties, which, for a time, seriously threatened the success of the school work in Canton, he resigned his position in the latter part of May, 1865. His successor, Daniel Worley, who had before served a period of ten years or more as Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Capital University at Columbus, Ohio, but who at the time was residing in Western Pennsylvania, was unanimously elected by the Board of Education, on the 13th of June following, but he did not take the position until the beginning of the next school year, in September, 1865. Mr. Worley was annually re-elected until June, 1874, when, under the new school law, he was the first School Superintendent in Ohio, to be elected for a period of three years. Owing to the failure of his health mainly, he however, only served two years of this appointment, and, after a period of eleven years' continuous service in the schools, resigned his position in June, 1876. In accepting his resignation the Board of Education passed a series of very complimentary resolutions, and showed their further confidence in his administration of the school work by appointing Mr. John H. Lehman, long associated with Mr. Worley in the school work in Canton, as his successor, that the work might be continued in the same general spirit as before.

Mr. Lehman is still in charge of the schools. Though Mr. Worley's salary was, during the latter years of his superintendency, $1,800, Mr. Lehman's was made $1,500 ; but it is gratifying to the writer to be able to say, that the latter's service has been so satisfactory, that in re-electing Mr. Lehman Superintendent a month or so ago, the Board of Education made his salary $2,000 per annum for the new term, this being the highest salary ever paid any Superintendent in Canton. Since their organization, the schools have, therefore, been under the charge of the five following-named Superintendents :

Ira M. Allen, from 1849 to 1854.

H. S. Martin, from 1854 to 1864.

H. S. Leland, from 1864 to 1865.

Daniel Worley, from 1865 to 1876.

John H. Lehman, from 1876 to the present time.

During Mr. Martin's administration, additions were made to the old Union School building, and a small new schoolhouse, with two rooms, was built in the eastern part of the city, now for the first time beginning to be numbered among the cities of the State. During Mr. Leland's time, preparations were made for a new school building in the south part of the city, but it was not erected until after his successor had taken charge. During Mr. Worley's time, the Board of Education erected, in addition to the one last named, a building of four rooms in the northeastern part of the city ; one of six rooms in the eastern part, and one of two rooms for primary pupils in the southeastern part, and one of six rooms in the southwestern part of the city. With all this increase of buildings and rooms, the rapid growth at this time always showed a great lack in adequate school facilities. The need of a new and better Central High School building became every day more apparent, and the Board of Education were at last constrained to take the sense of the people upon the question of borrowing money upon bonds for a series of years, and a tax to meet the principal and interest as they became due, so that they might be able to erect several new buildings for primary and grammar schools the next season. Fierce opposition was made against the proposition; but, after a warm contest, the majority of the people decided favorably. The Board of Education commenced the good work bravely at first, in accordance with the instructions of the people; but the clamor of the leading capitalists soon scared them, and the work was left to progress more leisurely as before. Nevertheless, in 1877, during Mr. Lehman's time, four rooms were added; in 1878 four rooms; in 1879-80, six rooms, together with two additional rooms to the south building in 1876-77. Steps have also been taken for the erection of a building of six rooms in the northwestern part of the city, and an addition of two rooms to the building on East Eighth street during the present summer, making eight additional departments for next year. The present growth and importance of Canton among the cities of the State imperatively demand a better and more commodious Central and High School building than the old schoolhouse on West Tuscarawas street. The growth of the schools and of the city may be seen from the following exhibit prepared and published five years ago:

The status of the schools last year is kindly furnished us by Superintendent Lehman, as follows:

School year 1879-80.—Total enrollment, day schools, 2,453; night schools, 174; total, 2,627. Number of teachers, including Superintendent, male, 11; female, 39; total, 50.

For the year 1880-81, just closed, the increase in enrollment will be not less than 300, with four additional teachers, and a prospect of even a greater increase during the next school year. About 30 per cent of the pupils enrolled in the primaries find their way into the grammar schools, and about 20 per cent of those in the grammar schools take a partial or complete course in the high school; but it is gratifying to all the true friends of popular education to know the fact that within the past decade the number of pupils continuing longer in the schools, and of those completing the entire course is at least 25 per cent greater than before.

The course of study below the high school provides for a thorough drill in the common English branches, including vocal music, drawing and object lessons in elementary science. In the high school, pupils are taken through a tolerably thorough academic course in language (Latin and German), mathematics and natural science. With frequent reviews, the pupils in the departments, from the A Primary upward, are subjected to the test of a written examination several times a year. Candidates for graduation in the high school are examined at the end of their course, and are given a diploma only after passing satisfactory examinations in all the studies of the course, with the exception that in language only the full course in one of the languages stated is required.

Pupils enter the school at six years of age. To complete the entire course ordinarily, with a pupil of average ability, requires eleven years. Of these, four years are given to the Primaries—D, C, B and A; four years to the Grammar Schools—D, C, B and A; and three years to the High School. Promotions are made at stated times by the Superintendent, but provision is also made for promoting pupils at other times, whose natural capacity or diligent application enables them to advance more rapidly than the average of the class in which they may chance to be at any time. On the other hand, pupils not properly sustaining themselves are equally liable to demotion. Besides these regular grades of schools, the Board of Education, under the requirements of the general school law of the State, have provided for German-English schools, with three teachers, in which the gradation of the other schools is observed as nearly as may be, as far as the B Grammar Grade, or through six years of the school course. Many of the high school pupils and graduates of former years now fill responsible positions at home and abroad, whose whole preliminary training was derived from our public schools. Through their influence in and upon society, they are paying back into the treasury of the public security and good, much, yea, infinitely more than was expended upon their education from the public purse.

Besides the excellent public schools of Canton, there are parochial schools (English and German) of the Roman Catholic Churches, with seven teachers, enrolling during the year not less than six or seven hundred pupils; a parochial school of the German Lutheran Church, with one teacher and from sixty to seventy pupils during the year; a select school for boys and girls, started and sustained by Prof. Worley, May 1, 1877, who is still at the head of it, with a yearly enrollment of about fifty; and an academy upon the ground of the Collegiate Institute of a few years ago, with two teachers—Mr. Spencer and Miss Danner—and about the same yearly enrollment. All these schools in their particular spheres, are doing good work in the field of education. In conclusion, it may be remarked that at no previous time in their history have the schools of Canton been dearer to the hearts of the people than they are now, and as increased facilities are afforded from year to year, they will, under wise and discreet management, assuredly increase also in efficiency, in thoroughly preparing the mass of our growing youth for the responsibilities of the future, and in beneficent results upon society in general, which are only to be secured through the intelligence and virtue of the people.

Canton was originally settled by a class of men from the East and from "Vaterland," who revered Deity and loved religion of the primitive type. For the first few years, the early settlers of course found it a hand-to-hand struggle to meet the wants of life; but the first difficulties in this direction having been surmounted in a short time, they began soon to desire the spiritual provender they had enjoyed in the old homes left behind them. At first this was sparingly furnished, and the more relished. At that early day, an occasional visit from a missionary was hailed with delight; to-day, with so many churches and regular services every Lord's Day, how very many, even of the descendants of those old pioneers, neglect entirely to enter a church or to show any other reverential recognition of the Divine Being. As a rule, however, Canton people are a God-fearing people, and her churches are well main-

The German Lutheran Church, East Tuscarawas street; First M. E. Church, corner Poplar and Tuscarawas streets; Second M. E. Church, South Market street, near William street; First Presbyterian Church, Plum and Tuscarawas streets; English Lutheran Church, West Tuscarawas street; First Baptist Church, Ninth and Market streets; St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Tenth and Poplar streets; Disciples' Church of Christ, Seventh and Poplar streets; St. John's English Catholic Church, Plum and North streets; St. Peter's German Catholic Church, Poplar street, above North; Evangelical Church, Fourth and Herbruck streets; First German Reform Church, East Tuscarawas street, near Herbruck; Trinity Church, Second Reform, 90 East Tuscarawas street; United Brethren Church, Charles street, South Canton; Mission Chapel M. E. Church, Cherry street and Washington avenue; Winebrennarian Church, East Tuscarawas street, near creek.

Most of the old pioneers were of Lutheran and Reformed stock, and hence these denominations deserve first consideration. The first preaching in this neighborhood was held in the barn of Michael Reed, who lived on the quarter-section just north of the present fair grounds. He had a double log barn, and the threshing-floor was the auditorium. The seats were slabs from Slusser's saw-mill. The preacher was Father John Stauch, a Lutheran, whose home was in Beaver County, Penn., and he came at stated periods during the summer months as early as the year 1806. Alternating with him was Father Mahnenschmidt, of the Reformed Church, preaching at the same place. The meetings were always well attended, as people of all classes came from every quarter, with a desire to hear the latest news, as well as to discharge their religious duties. In the winter, private houses and the taverns were used less frequently as places of meeting, especially the dining-room of Dewalt's tavern. There are some reminiscences of this early period worthy of mention, of which we single out one only. The boys and girls of the early day usually went "barefooted;" they would carry their shoes and stockings along, and would put them on before appearing in the presence of the great congregation; but after the services they would invariably doff the said incumbrances and return home, as far as feet were concerned, in a primitive state. In 1810, the German Lutheran and Reformed congregations took possession of the lot on West Tuscarawas street (now occupied by the Presbyterian Church), donated by Bezaleel Wells for a house of worship, and erected on it a small frame structure for a meeting-house. The building was never plastered, but served its purpose for a short time, and several sermons were preached in it. In the meanwhile, about 1808, Rev. Anthony Weier, a Lutheran minister, took charge of the congregation, and he was the first resident minister in Canton, and through his influence the two congregations purchased from Mr. Wells the grounds upon East Tuscarawas street, upon which are at this time a Lutheran Church and parsonage, and a Reformed Church and schoolhouse. Many were not well satisfied with this arrangement, and it was several years before they became reconciled. Steps were taken at once to erect a brick church. As an insufficient amount was subscribed, the progress of the building was slow. For several years it stood under roof unfinished, and in the meantime was struck by lightning and considerably shattered. Up to this time the Reformed congregation did not have the services of a regular pastor. Occasional supplies were given by Revs. Mahnenschmidt and Soundecker.

The first regular preacher was Benjamin Foust, who began his ministration in 1818. The frame church was occupied by the two congregations about four years, and then they bought the lots on East Tuscarawas street, where they now are, and built the brick church in 1822, both societies occupying the same building until 1863. Benjamin Foust died in 1832, and was succeeded by Rev. Peter Herbruck, who was then only a little over nineteen years old. At the first communion there were only twenty-six communicants present, and the pastor's salary at the time was $40 per annum, and kept rising until 1858, when it reached $100. This was his local station, but he preached at various points in four counties, ranging from eight to thirteen places. The gentleman is the oldest active minister; that is, oldest in one place in the county, and is still hale and hearty, bidding fair to be among us yet for many years. He resides in an old-fashioned house east of the church, almost concealed from view by a mass of trees and flowering shrubbery. A cozy study is his usual location and where he receives his visitors.

Rev. Herbruck is still in charge of this old congregation, and will, within a few months, be able to celebrate, with his people, the jubilee of his connection with them. Up to this time he has attended two thousand and sixty-six funerals, has baptized four thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven persons, has confirmed two thousand four hundred and forty-six, and has married one thousand nine hundred and sixty-one couples; a record which, it is believed, cannot be equaled by that of any one pastor in one place in Ohio or elsewhere in this country. The church was finished in 1822, and occupied jointly by the two congregations until 1852.

Rev. A. Weier, of the Lutheran Church, died in 1828. The first organization of this congregation was effected about the years 1812 or 1813. Among the first appear the names of Simon Essing, Jacob Becher, a Mr. Kraft, Jacob Rapp, Jacob Bucher, Jacob Rex, George Dewalt, Philip Dewalt, John Coleman, George Schneider, John Leininger and Jacob Kitzmiller. After Weier, Rev. Prof. William Schmidt had charge of the Evangelical Lutheran congregation, commencing his ministrations in the latter part of the year 1828. During his connection the Joint Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Ohio and adjoining States started the project of a Theological Seminary, and made Prof. Schmidt the Theological Professor. His first class was organized in Canton, in 1830. The seminary was finally located in Columbus, Ohio, and, in 1831, the Professor removed with his class to this place, and for several years and to the time of his death, in 1839, he filled the position ably and to the entire satisfaction of the Synod. While residing in Canton, he united in marriage with Miss Rebecca Buckius, a daughter of John Buckius, who had emigrated with his family to Canton some years before from Alexandria, Va. It may be an interesting reminiscence here to say that John Buckius was the last man to look upon the face of George Washington, first President of the United States. Mr. Buckius was, at the time of Washington's death, a tinner in Alexandria, and sealed the lead casket which contained his mortal remains before they were laid away to rest at Mount Vernon. Three daughters of Prof. Schmidt yet survive. The oldest is the wife of Prof. Worley, in Canton;

the second the wife of Rev. M. B. Lenker, Lykens, Penn.; and the youngest the wife of Rev. Prof. E. Schmidt, of Capital University, Columbus, Ohio. The theological department of this university is the same commenced in Canton, over fifty years ago. Pastors following Rev. Prof. Schmidt were Rev. J. J. Fast, in 1831, or thereabouts; Cadiz, Yaley, Melsheimer, J. D. Nune-macher; Fast again; G. J. Bruegle, from 1862 to 1866; J. C. Schulz, from 1866 to 1870; then J. J. Fast again provisionally until 1872; on the 8th of September, 1872, Rev. A. H. Feldmann, took charge, and has served the congregation ever since. The present number of communicants is about three hundred. Rev. Mr. Feldmann also supplies the Evangelical Lutheran Congregation at Osnaburg every two weeks. At this time regular services are held in both the English and German languages. In 1852, the Reformed Congregation withdrew and erected a brick church on the west part of the premises, leaving the old church in possession of the Lutherans. They occupied it until 1868, when it was taken down, and the present new church erected, a handsome brick structure, with two spires of unequal height on the northeast and southeast corners, with two large double door entrances in front, and one at the side for the Sunday-school. The church proper is a large hall nearly fifty feet high, frescoed, carpeted and contains pews capable of seating six hundred persons, although, with a little preparation, room can be made for one thousand; rose windows panel the sides, and gas chandeliers near the ceiling, under bright reflectors, illuminate the evening services. A commodious pulpit in the "west" accommodates the sacred desk. In the rear of this are two small rooms for the ministers, and still further back is a lecture-room, provided with a blackboard for illustrating Scriptural lessons, while texts plentifully bedeck the walls. A "winding stairs" leads up to the second story, where is found the organ loft, and west still are a number of class-rooms used for Sunday-school purposes. The entire building is heated by means of two immense furnaces.

About the year 1837, a number of members of the German Lutheran congregation, desirous of securing services in the English language, more particularly for their children, and the majority being unwilling to grant them this privilege in the old church, they organized under Pastor J. J. Fast, deceased. The following history of the English Evangelical Lutheran Church, prepared a few years ago by a prominent member, will present the facts in a clear and concise manner:

About the year 1837, a portion of the English-speaking members of the Lutheran Church being desirous of having occasional services in the English language, and being frustrated in this by the German members, withdrew from the congregation and formed a new organization under the pastoral charge of Rev. John J. Fast. They were joined by several members of the German Reformed Church, who were also desirous of attending worship in the English language, and, soon afterward, the organization was incorporated as the "Evangelical Congregation of Canton, Ohio." Although always served by Lutheran ministers, it had no direct connection with any Synod until some years afterward. The town hall, in the old market house, which formerly stood on the north side of the public square (now the engine house at the corner of Eighth and Poplar streets), was engaged for their purposes, and was used as a place of worship until 1842 or 1843. After serving the congregation for a year or more, Mr. Fast removed to Cincinnati, but after three or four years' absence returned, and again took charge of the congregation—they meanwhile being without a Pastor. In 1840 or 1841, an arrangement was made with the Trustees of the Canton Male Seminary (now forming a part of the West Union School building), by which the congregation, in consideration of $1,000 paid into the building fund of the seminary, were to be permitted to occupy the main hall on the first floor of that institution as a place of worship, until the room would be needed "for educational purposes," when it was to be surrendered and the congregation was to receive back the money so paid into the building fund.

After the erection of the Seminary buildings, the congregation fitted up its room with pulpit and pews, and at once took possession of its new sanctuary. In 1842, the Rev. Mr. Wadsworth, who had just graduated from the Lutheran Theological Seminary at Gettysburg, Penn., came to Canton in search of a charge. After preaching a few times for the congregation, a majority of members favored a change of ministers, and accordingly gave Mr. Wadsworth a "call." Some of the members being dissatisfied with the action of the majority, temporarily withdrew from the congregation, and for a time attended the Presbyterian and other churches. Mr. Wadsworth remained about one year, when a bronchial affection compelled him to cease preaching. Rev. Dr. Hamilton was next employed by the congregation, and he continued to serve it until 1845, when it was found necessary, on account of the distance at which the Doctor lived from Canton, his other engagements, and the difficulty in holding services at a time to suit the various members, to engage a minister who would reside in Canton and devote his entire attention to the congregation. A "call" was accordingly extended to Rev. A. J. Karn, which was accepted, and Mr. Karn remained Pastor for about four years. During his incumbency, the congregation flourished, and most of the members who had withdrawn when Mr. Wadsworth became Pastor, returned. Mr. K. was succeeded by Rev. L. Rizer, who continued two years, and after him came Rev. B. H. Bittle for one year. About this time, the subject of a new church building was first mooted, and Rev. S. A. Mealy, who then resided in Canton, to aid in erecting one preached to the congregation for a time without compensation, but his health failing, Rev. W. P. Ruthrauff, of Shellsburg, Penn., was next employed, and during his pastorate of seven years, the church edifice now occupied by the congregation was erected.

The members of the congregation who had come into it from the German Reformed Church being now all dead, the name of the organization was about this time (that is, during Mr. Ruthrauff's incumbency), changed to "Evangelical Lutheran Congregation," and it was attached to Pittsburgh Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. This Synodical connection produced several protests from other Synods of the church. The congregation was within the bounds of the Joint Synod of Ohio, to which the German Church at the east end of town belongs, and also within the bounds of the East Synod of Ohio, which is attached to the General Synod of the church. The Joint Synod is independent of the General Synod. The lines of the Pittsburgh Synod did not at that time extend into Ohio, but Mr. Ruthrauff being a member of that Synod, the congregation voted to go into it also, and being received by the Synod, it remained in connection with it until 1863, when it withdrew and united with the East Ohio Synod, where it still remains.

Mr. Ruthrauff was followed by Rev. D. Garver, who remained about three years. While Mr. Garver was Pastor, the steeple of the church was blown down by a high wind, and the erection of a new one and other necessary repairs, cost the congregation a considerable sum of money. For several months after Mr. Garver's withdrawal the congregation was without a Pastor, being temporarily served by Rev. J. A. Kunkleman and others. In 1863, Rev. G. F. Stelling took charge of the congregation and remained one year. Next came Rev. John W. Goodlin, who continued four years and was succeeded in 1869 by Rev. L. M. Kuhns, the present Pastor, whose term of service has been longer than that of any of his predecessors. Of all the ministers who have regularly served this congregation only four are now living—Revs. Hamilton, Stelling, Goodlin and Kuhns.

The following personal sketch of Dr. Kuhns, now the Pastor of the English Lutheran Church, and second to Rev. P. Herbruck, the longest resident minister in the city, will be of interest to his many friends here and elsewhere :

Mr. Kuhns is a native of Western Pennsylvania, educated at Wittenberg College, Springfield, Ohio, which institution conferred upon him the title of Doctor of Divinity in 1876. He entered the ministry in the spring of 1852, and his first charge was at Freeport and Leechsburg, Penn., within a few miles of where he was born, and he preached there for fourteen years, in a neighborhood where his father was founder of the church, and he confirmed. It is very seldom that a young man can so long and favorably serve a congregation at his own home, which goes greatly to disprove the old adage "that a prophet is not honored in his own country." In the spring of 1866, he took charge of a Lutheran Church at Bellefontaine, Ohio, where he remained until 1869, when he was called here, thus making eleven years of pastorate in Canton, and now being the second oldest minister in the city. He has a pleasant countenance, and numbers among his friends members of every church in the city, besides being on a friendly footing with all the clergy, which, sad to say, cannot be said of ministers in every community. The communicants number 210. Since he came here, he has received 180 members, but many removals have taken place. He has baptized eighty-seven children; married eighty-one couples; but upon consulting some old yellow musty records, which we have found in most ministerial sanctums, could not give correct burial figures, as he officiated at many funerals outside of his regular congregation.

Trinity Second Reformed Church was organized out of the German Reformed congregation in 1870, with nineteen members. J. B. Shoemaker, of Lancaster, Penn., was first Pastor. E. Herbruck took charge of the congregation in May, 1873. When he took charge of the congregation the membership was thirty-five, and now numbers 160. At the beginning of his pastorate there was a heavy debt, which is not yet all paid. Church cost $8,000; pews free; seats 350. He has officiated at the following: Baptisms, 174; marriages, seventy-four; deaths, fifty-three. A few months ago, Rev. E. Herbruck resigned his position and removed to Tiffin, to take the editorial chair of the German Reformed Messenger, the English organ of this church in the West.

The Roman Catholic Church—Was represented in the quite early settlement of Canton. John Shorb, who came to Canton as early as 1807, with his wife and three children, was the first resident Catholic in the place. Soon after the war of 1812, other Catholic families came to town, and to different parts of the County; of the families settling in this neighborhood were Andrew Meyers, Stephen Shorb, George Hossofross, the Pirrong brothers, Joseph Trout, Adam Rider, Cassily, Owen Grimes, Martin Zimmerman, John Gillig, Floom, and McCormick. As early as 1818, before this portion of the State belonged to a diocese, the Dominican Fathers, who had been sent West as missionaries, held occasional services at Mr. Shorb's house, on the locality still occupied by his descendants. The missionaries came about twice a year, and when the weather permitted the services were held in a grove in front of the house. The time of the meeting was made known in good time in advance, and parties from a great distance, in Stark and adjoining counties, were sure to be present. Catholic devotion to the services of the Church is proverbial, and worthy of closer imitation by members of other communions. The first Catholic service, in Ohio, was at Gallipolis, in 1793; the second in Perry County, in 1812; and the third in Shorb's Grove, Canton, in 1816. As the people came from great distances, as much as thirty and forty miles to attend these meetings, though bringing their own provisions with them, it was often a difficult matter to provide lodging places for them. Mr. Shorb was a zealous worker in the cause of his religion, and it was his ambition to have a church in Canton. In his visits to Baltimore and other parts of the country numerous inhabited by Catholics, he made it a part of his business to get contributions to the accomplishment of this end. When sufficient means for a start had been collected, he generously donated a site for the new church upon his own grounds, and gave his personal attention to the construction of the church thereon. The building, commenced in 1823, and finished the following year, was a structure 40 by 90 feet, a section of the East part being partitioned off for family use. Mr. Shorb was fatally injured at the raising of the building, by a rafter falling from the hands of a workman and striking him on the head; he died the following day, lamented not only by his family and his church, but also by the entire community, who knew his personal worth as an upright man, desirous of promoting, by every means in his power, the best interests of the town of Canton.

The first priest in charge of the church here was John A. Hill, a nephew of Lord Hill, of England. He commanded a regiment at the battle of Waterloo. He was married soon after this, when both he and his wife became converted to the Roman Catholic religion. Mutually impressed afterward with the idea that they must devote the balance of their lives to the service of the church, they agreed to separate, she entering a convent in Italy, and he an institution of learning, to qualify himself for the priesthood. After completing a course of study, he was sent to America, and served as a missionary for several years. He came to Canton in 1824, where he continued his labors successfully until death called him home from his earthly labors and usefulness. He was buried September 3, 1828, at his own request, under the eaves of the church, but later his remains were removed to Somerset, Perry Co., Ohio. Father Hill was loved by his flock and highly esteemed in the community. He was a lover of children, and, without respect to denominational distinctions, was generally beloved by the children of the town. He was a man of a strong social turn of mind, enjoyed a game of chess, and, it is said, he would occasionally try his skill with William Reynolds, Dr. Simmons and William Christmas, the prominent chess players of Canton at that time. For several years after his death, the church was without a regular Pastor. Fathers Miles, Martin and others officiated at intervals. From 1830 to 1834, Rev. John M. Henni was in charge of St. John's. During his pastorate, in 1832, Bishop Fenwick, of Cincinnati, after attending a jubilee in Canton, was taken with cholera on his way home in the stage, and died near Wooster, Ohio. Rev. J. S. Alemany followed Rev. Henni in this pastorate. Rev. Henni afterward became Archbishop of the diocese of Milwaukee, and Rev. Alemany the Archbishop of the diocese of San Francisco. The St. John's Church was twice enlarged to meet the growing necessities of the congregation. For about ten years after Rev. Alemany's time, pastoral changes were frequent. In 1844, about twenty-five families left the English Church, and under Rev. H. Lahr organized a German Catholic Church, under the name of St. Peter's, and measures were at once taken for the erection of a German church edifice. Among the later Pastors of St. John's Church were Fathers Doherty, Lindersmith and Bartoletti. During the pastorate of the latter, a new church was built, one of the finest in the city, at a great sacrifice of labor on the part of the Pastor, and sympathetic efforts and co-operation on the part of the people of his charge. This congregation has steadily increased, and now numbers not far from two hundred families. We conclude this notice of the Catholic Church in Canton by a brief history of St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church.

As stated above, this congregation was founded in 1844 by Rev. H. Lahr, who died in Cincinnati a few years ago. The membership at that time was about thirty-five families, who had separated from old St. John's Church, which was too small to contain all its members. Under the worthy pastorate of Rev. F. M. Boff and J. B. Uhlman, the number of members increased rapidly, so that in the year 1865, when Rev. Arnould, the present Pastor, took charge of the congregation it numbered 206 families. In 1874, the old church building being considered too small, the Pastor called a meeting of the congregation, at which it was decided to erect a large church edifice, the cost of which was not to exceed the sum of $80,000, at the same time a building committee was formed with Rev. V. Arnould as President; Joseph Biechele, Treasurer; William Dannemiller, Secretary; Joseph Schott and George Gonder, Advisers; all active, energetic men. The plan was made at once by H. Engelbert, of New York, in the Gothic style. In September, 1874, the foundation was built, and in June, 1875, the cornerstone was laid with appropriate ceremonies by Right Rev. Bishop Fitzgerald, of Little Rock, Ark., the Bishop of Cleveland being then absent on account of ill health. The building measures 164x74 feet. The ornamental plastering or stucco work was done by Carroll & Nolan, a Cleveland firm of great experience and ability; the wood work was under the direction of Stephen Wagner, of Canton, a very conscientious and skillful mechanic; the whole under the immediate superintendence of the reverend Pastor. The building is one of the finest in the State. The school children number 280, and are instructed by four teachers. The Sunday school is attended by 300. During his pastorate, the clergyman has baptized 1,495; married 195 couples; buried 198 persons.

This congregation now numbers about 300 families, and is still under the charge of Rev. Father Arnould, a faithful Pastor, and a whole-souled, genial, Christian gentleman. St. John's is at this time under the charge of Rev. Father McGuire, a man of rare taste and culture, and the congregation seems to be flourishing under his pastorate. It is worthy of note that the priests in charge of the Canton Catholic Churches have, as a rule, been men of more than ordinary ability, some of them attaining high positions in the church, and to this fact

The ministers of the Presbyterian denomination, on missionary tours through this part of the country, first made their appearance in Canton about the year 1809, though previous to that time there were some families in town of that persuasion. Itinerant ministers of different denominations had worshiped in favorable weather in Michael Reed's barn, about a mile from town. In the winter season and bad weather, services were held in private houses until the erection of the first court house, corner of Third and Market streets. The first minister of whom there is any definite account was Rev. Joshua Beer. He lived in Springfield, now in Summit County, but he seems to have labored in Canton, at stated periods, until 1815. There is an entry of a marriage in the records of Stark County, solemnized by him December 18, 1811. To a certificate of a still later date, he signs himself Joshua Beer, V. D. M., Presbyterian Church, Canton. From this fact, it is tolerably certain that an organization existed at a very early date; but as no records are known to be in existence, but little can be said about it. From 1817 to 1819, Rev. James Adams officiated quite frequently, and there are several marriages solemnized by him on record. The names of some of the other ministers visiting here in the early days were Mathews, Vallandigham (father of Clement L. Vallandigham, a Democratic legislator and congressman a few years back, a man of great personal power, of pleasing address, and of great importance to his party) and Cleland. In the absence of a regular settled Pastor and fixed services, the church did not at first attain very marked success. In 1820, Rev. James McClean took charge of it, and found it in a very weak condition. He began his labors in the old brick court house, erected a few years before his coming. John Harris, esteemed a good singer, led the singing. In his second sermon, Mr. McClean spoke of the "utility and importance of Sunday schools." This discourse so impressed his congregation that a meeting was called at the court house the following Thursday evening to consider the matter. It was there resolved to establish a Sunday school, and a committee was appointed to complete such an organization. This school met for the first time in the court house on December 2, 1820, and was the first Sunday school in the county. It had, in the start, fifty-six scholars. Rev. McClean continued to preach during the winter and summer following; but spent a considerable portion of his time in visiting destitute localities in the surrounding country. Up to the time of Mr. McClean's advent in Canton, no records of the church seem to have been kept. In the minute book of the session, the following entry appears: Mr. McClean, not finding any records of a regularly organized congregation, a meeting was called and held on the 13th of September, 1821, and proceeded to the election of three Elders, viz., Samuel Coulter, James Latimer and Robert Latimer. These brethren, having accepted the office, were ordained and installed on the 27th of September, and the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered on the following Sabbath, Mr. McClean being assisted by Rev. A. Hanna, of Fredericksburg. The membership at that time was twenty-seven. Mr. McClean continued his services until the spring of 1822, and six new members were added to the church. He left the field because of the non-payment of his salary. As the Trustees, Robert Latimer, George Dunbar and James Gaff, Sr., were unable to collect the subscriptions, they were sued by the minister, and, confessing judgment by default, had to make good the amount from their own pockets. Mr. McClean was an Englishman by birth, and was a man of quite a stylish appearance. For more than three years, the new congregation was without a Pastor; but occasional services were given by Revs. James Adams, James Snodgrass and A. Hanna, who had charges not far distant. In October, 1825, J. B. Morrow, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Winchester, Va., was engaged. After a formal call, he was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Richland on June 21, 1826, when the ordination sermon and charge to the new minister were given respectively by Rev. James Rowland, of Mansfield, and Rev. James Snodgrass, of Pigeon Run. Rev. Mr. Morrow continued as Pastor until December, 1830, and during the time of his charge there were seventy-six additions by profession and letter, and losses by dismissal, death and suspension of fifty, leaving at his retirement a membership of fifty-six. The Sunday school was maintained during Mr. Morrow's connection with the church. From an old library register of 1829, it appears that Jacob Rex was the Superintendent, and that

Mary L. Craighead, Eliza Laird, Catharine Harry, Mary Coulter, Amanda Gaff, Thomas Christmas, James Hazlett, Seth Godden, Joseph Parker, Joseph Heckman and Eliza Porter were the teachers. At this time, they numbered about one hundred scholars in the school. The lot now occupied by the Presbyterian Church and parsonage was donated by Mr. Wells, as we have had occasion to remark above, to any religious society who would take possession of it for a house of worship. In 1810, members of the Lutheran and Reformed denominations first availed themselves of the benefit of this grant, and as early as the year 1810, they erected thereon a small frame church, and held possession of the premises until 1821. The location did not please the members, and it was at last surrendered, and the frame structure was sold and removed. About the year 1827, the Presbyterians took possession of the lot, and commenced building a church, but by want of means and negligence it was not pushed forward to completion, and Mr. Morrow, thoroughly discouraged and disheartened, resigned his place and removed to New Philadelphia. Spiritual declension followed, and the Sunday school soon ceased its operations. There was occasional preaching by ministers in search of new charges, but they received little encouragement until Rev. T. M. Hopkins, of New York, came along. His wife and himself were known as experienced teachers, and he was induced to come to Canton, to start a school, and to preach for the congregation. General apathy prevailed among the members of the church; many persons of influence in the community had imbibed infidelity from Paine's "Age of Reason," and made public opposition to the cause of religion; and, on the whole, the field did not seem to be a very inviting one. After an interval of four years in the services of the church, Rev. Hopkins took the charge. He was in the prime of life, vigorous and enthusiastic in the cause of his Master, and at once took hold of his work in this new and neglected field with a vim that indicated success. The earlier members of the congregation were John Harris, Samuel Coulter, Robert, Thomas and James Latimer, James Gaff, James, Harry and Ebenezer Shaw. There were others, who by previous training and personal preferences were led into sympathy with the Presbyterian movement, and gave it from time to time substantial encouragement. In this connection appear the names of James Hazlett, William Christmas, Dr. Hartford, William Raynolds, John Sloan, Seth Godden, James Lathrop, George Sloan, George Dunbar, Sr., and William Drayton, all of whom were in their day men of influence in the community. To add to the complications mentioned before, Mr. Hopkins found at first a considerable opposition growing out of the new-school doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, which at that time were especially canvassed in his church, and which he himself had adopted as the true basis upon which to build up a regenerated church. He went, nevertheless, earnestly to work, re-organized the congregation, and in a year or two began to see the fruits of his labors. The cause of the unfinished church edifice was taken up anew, the women of the congregation took the matter vigorously in hand, the money was raised, and the church was finished and dedicated in 1833. Its internal arrangement and construction were of the ancient order, with a gallery on three sides, the choir occupying the side directly in front of the minister. The floor pews were boxes with doors, and the seats narrow and straight-backed and high, suggesting anything else than ease and comfort. Mr. Hopkins, nevertheless, was a popular minister, and his services were well attended. He was an outspoken temperance man, and his courage may be judged when it is stated as a fact, that while it was the universal custom of merchants in his day to keep the whisky bottle on the counter for the convenience of the customers, he was the first in the town to condemn and publicly denounce the traffic in spirituous liquors. Soon after the dedication of the new church in 1833, he removed to another field on account of personal difficulties among the members of the congregation, which seriously interfered with his pastoral administration. Mr. Hopkins was followed soon after by Rev. Mr. Reeves. He was a good man, but hardly able to cope with the situation.

While he was in charge, an Evangelist, by the name of Rev. J. F. Avery, held a series of meetings for several months in the Presbyterian Church, though members of other churches in sympathy with the movement, took an active part, also, in the meetings. Mr. Avery was eminently successful in stirring up the "dry bones," and as a result of his efforts, more than a hundred converts were reported, and among them some who had before boasted of their infidelity. As is apt to occur with purely sensational religionists, many of those in the "time of temptation" fell away, but, probably, the most disastrous effect of the excitement occasioned by Mr. Avery's preaching, was that the taste of the congregation for the plain and simple statement of Gospel truths was much disturbed, and it is recorded by one of our chroniclers of passing events, that "Mr. Reeves found himself inadequate to supply the pabulum desired by the congregation, and he had a call to another field, the soil of which required less stirring." Rev. Mr. Taylor followed Mr. Reeves, and being himself a man of decided convictions, he succeeded in bringing the congregation into active connection with the new school branch of the church. Mr. Taylor was a good speaker, and stood well generally with the congregation and the community. He remained only four years, but during his pastorate, the church was remodeled inside, and its appearance and comfort greatly improved. Rev. E. Buckingham succeeded Mr. Taylor, in 1846, and remained in continuous charge for a period of twenty-six years. Mr. Buckingham was a man of strong convictions, in some things with a strong leaning to bigotry, but at the same time honest, conscientious and zealous in advancing the best interests of his charge, according to his own convictions. There can be no doubt that the substantial position of the Presbyterian Church in Canton, to-day, is very largely due to his earnest, active and long-continued labors in this field. During his very long services, Mr. Buckingham retained the love and esteem of the greater part of his congregation. A man of noble impulses, and fearless in the discharge of every duty, as he regarded it, he sometimes came out very plainly in his public discourses, and taking a lively interest as he did in all public questions, he not unfrequently trod very closely upon the toes of some of his parishioners, and little bickerings and dissatisfactions, accordingly, arose from time to time; but as he never compromised his calling, and did not knowingly lend his influence or countenance to anything which might bring reproach upon the cause of Christ, and, while positive, was always the urbane and obliging gentleman, he retained a strong hold upon the affections of his people until the last. After his resignation in Canton, Mr. Buckingham removed to Muskingum County, and took charge of Putnam Female Seminary until his death. His remains were brought to Canton and interred in the cemetery west of the city. During his pastorate in 1850, a belfry was attached to the church edifice and a bell purchased, the one still in use; in 1853, a parsonage was erected at a cost of $2,200; in 1857, the church was incorporated under the title of "The First Presbyterian Church of Canton;" in 1856, measures were inaugurated and carried out for the building of the stone church, corner of Tuscarawas and Plum streets, at a cost of about $40,000. Mr. Whitelock, of Chicago, was the architect. Mr. Buckingham was a warm friend of our public schools, and did very much during his stay in Canton to enhance their popularity and usefulness. When he left at last, it would be hard to decide which felt the worse, his congregation or the community at large. A few months after Mr. Buckingham left Canton, Rev. W. J. Park received and accepted a call to this pastorate. He gave promise of great usefulness in this field, but after a few years' service and communion, on or near the 5th day of June, 1879, he became complicated in grave charges; his connection with the congregation was dissolved in July, 1879, and on the 7th of September of the same year, he was, conditionally, deposed from his office by the Presbytery to which he and the congregation belonged. From that time on until very recently, the congregation has had no settled minister. In January of this year, 1881, Rev. David E. Platter received a call, and in pursuance of an acceptance thereof, entered upon his duties last March. He was regularly installed on Tuesday evening, May, 31, 1881. The following brief account of his installation will be of interest in the future:

The installation of Rev. D. E. Platter as Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, by a committee appointed by the Presbytery of Mahoning, took place last evening in the presence of a large congregation. The services were opened by the choir singing "How Beautiful Upon the Mountains." The Rev. D. H. Evans, Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Youngstown, presided and preached a sermon appropriate to the occasion, after which he proposed the Constitutional questions to the Pastor-elect, then to the people. The Rev. N. P. Bailey, D. D., of Massillon, then delivered the charge to the Pastor, and the Rev. A. B. Maxwell, Leetonia, the charge to the people, at the conclusion of which the installing prayer was offered by Mr. Evans, and the services closed with the benediction by the Pastor. The floral decorations, the work of Mr. Harry Meyers, assisted by some of the ladies of the church, were very fine, and drew favorable comments from many admirers.

Of the very earliest movements of the Methodists in Canton, in the absence of authentic records, but little is known. The first active Methodists of whom there is any knowledge were William Hill and Philip Schlosser. These men frequently met, discussed the situation, and deprecated the lack, according to their judgment, of religious interest among the first settlers; they accordingly agreed to help improve every opportunity to encourage meetings for divine worship. Whenever a missionary came to town they made themselves active in providing and giving notice of the place of meetings. These and a few other of the earlier Methodists frequently came together in private houses, afterward in the old log court house, and still later in the old schoolhouse, corner of Plum and Tuscarawas streets. For many years the members of this persuasion were accustomed to meet in this old school building on Sunday morning for prayer and class meetings, and to preserve their identity as a special denomination of Christians. During this time, it is said, that John McLean, afterward Judge of the United States Supreme Court, but at that time a young man, on a tour through Northern Ohio, stopped over Sunday in the Eagle tavern, kept by Philip Dewalt. He had been from his youth an ardent, devoted Methodist, and to his latest day he made it a point to attend religious services on the Lord's Day, and he never missed an opportunity to do so if his health permitted him to be out. His case is one of many others among our public men, who consistently, by profession and practice, have given their approval to the doctrines of our holy religion. On the Sunday morning he spent in Canton, Judge McLean inquired of Mr. Dewalt whether there was any Methodist meeting in Canton on that day, and was informed that there was probably such a meeting in the schoolhouse. After finding out the location of the schoolhouse he directed his steps thither, and, on entering and taking a seat, he found a small number of persons holding a prayer-meeting. This closed soon after, and Mr. Schlosser announced a class-meeting, and requested all not members of the church to leave, and all not members left; but Mr. Mc-

Lean remained. For his benefit the request to leave was repeated more emphatically, but he still kept his seat, and the exercises commenced. The presence of a stranger of such commanding appearance as Judge McLean put a damper upon the meeting. There was no enthusiasm, and the meeting for a time was exceedingly cold and formal, until finally Father Schlosser, addressing the stranger, asked if he had anything to say. Upon this invitation the Judge arose, and, in a low, distinct voice, narrated his experience. He talked very impressively, eloquently, and with such pathos as had never before been heard in their meetings; he carried his audience with him, and soon there was not a dry eye in the room. Mr. Schlosser, upon his conclusion, congratulated him on being a better man than he had thought he was. As early as the year 1825, the society had acquired considerable strength and influence. Among the active new members were John and Thomas Bonfield, John Webb, Mother Cake, Peter Tofler and Newberry Cline. Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Rex, originally of the Lutheran Church, united with them. At this time Canton was a "regular appointment," with preaching once a month, and five years later, in 1830, every two weeks. The regular place of meeting was the upper room of the old Academy, corner of Tuscarawas and Plum streets. Revs. Frey, Plimpton Ruckel, Kent, Graham, Sheppard and Harry O. Sheldon were among the earlier preachers on this circuit. Sheldon was somewhat peculiar; a stout, muscular man, he did not hesitate long to take rowdies in hand who disturbed his religious meetings, and he could generally, as it became well known that, being without fear, he would, if necessary, fight for the Lord, as well as labor for him. Mr. John Buckius tells of his being nearly beaten on one occasion. Mr. Sheldon, after the introductory services were over, got up to preach, and began by saying, "I have been thinking of two texts, and revolving them in my mind as No. 1 and No. 2, and am undecided which to take." George Tofler, a well-known character of the town, called out promptly, "Take No. 1." The minister was astounded, but soon recovered himself and responded, "So be it," and announced as the text, "He being dead, yet speaketh," upon which he then preached an excellent and impressive sermon. The first camp-meetings were held for several years in William Hill's woods, two miles northwest of town, drawing immense crowds of people. They were afterward held in Williams' woods, north of town, and subsequently in the Yohe settlement, on the Steubenville road.

In 1830, a lot was purchased on Eighth street, near the corner of Plum street, and a frame church, 40x50 feet, was built upon it by Thomas Cunningham. There being no pavements at that day except on Market and Tuscarawas streets, and very muddy walking in every other part of the town during the winter, a tanbark walk was constructed to the church. Soon after the completion of the church building, Rev. Milton Colt, who was then on this circuit, took sick at Father Tofler's and died. He was buried upon the church lot, but his remains were afterward removed to the cemetery. David White and Joshua Saxton, of the Repository, William Dunbar and Daniel Gotshall, of the Democrat, George N. Webb, Sheriff of the county, and William, were, at this time, all prominent and active members. The oldest members still living are Frederick Hafer, residing on North Poplar street, and Barbara Ann White, on Cherry street. Next to them come Mr. and Mrs. Patterson, on South Market street, who settled in Canton in 1837. Rev. John M. Goshorn and wife came to Canton the following year, and started a female seminary. They were active members of the Methodist Church, and were both well fitted to conduct a first-class school. Mainly through the instrumentality of Dr. Thomas Bonfield, backed by the liberality of a few generous citizens not members of the church, means were secured to erect a good-sized seminary building, on the lot adjoining the church, corner of Eighth and Plum streets. This building still stands, though for almost a generation past it has no longer been used for school purposes. It has also been greatly changed and remodeled within and without, and has for many years been used as a residence by Mr. John Buckius and family. The brick house on the corner of Poplar and Fifth streets, so well known as the old Grant corner, was occupied as a boarding-house, and was the first house in town furnished with a bell-pull. This was a very great temptation to the young gentlemen of the town desirous of obtaining interviews with the young ladies, which were only sparingly granted by the worthy Principals. The seminary was well patronized; pupils from a distance were in attendance, Graduation Day was made memorable, and the exercises well attended; and this institution did much to elevate the standard of female education in Canton. On the opening of the seminary, the congregation, feeling assured of more liberal contributions, secured the services of a stationed minister, Rev. Edward Burkett, who was the first stationed minister of the Methodist Church in Canton. It soon became evident, however, that the congregation was too weak to give him an adequate support, and they were therefore compelled again to forego regular Sunday service, and re-enter the circuit. This embraced Canton, Hartville, Greentown, Greensburg, Bethlehem, Sparta and Miller's Church, in Pike Township. The ministers who followed Mr. Burkett on the circuit were Rev. Messrs. White, Hare, Cramer, Baker, McCue, Swasey, McAbee, Jackson and Scott, with probably a few others whose names have not been ascertained. McCue was here in 1840, and became a convert to Millerism, a prevalent hallucination of that day which dazed the minds of a great many good people all over the country. Believing the end of all things and the day of judgment to be near at hand, McCue turned his horse out to grass, arrayed himself in a white ascension robe, and put himself in readiness patiently to wait the summons of Gabriel's trumpet to meet the Savior in the air. But alas! Mr. Miller's signs and calculations were not as infallible as they were thought to be, and the angel did not blow the trumpet at the appointed time. The completion of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad through Canton in 1851-52, and the advent of Ball, Aultman & Company, who were active members of the Methodist Church, gave the organization here new life and vigor. The congregation increased, the contributions grew apace, and it was not long before they had regular, stated preaching. The old church on Eighth street was soon deemed inadequate, and in 1862, a large and at the time, and to the time of its destruction, a very grand and imposing structure was erected for the use of the congregation, on the corner of Poplar and Tuscarawas streets. An old citizen of Canton says, that "upon its occupancy, a new order of worship and paraphernalia were instituted. The cushioned seats, carpeted aisles, grand organ, and the promiscuous seating of the sexes were regarded by many as a wicked innovation. The style of preaching was also changed, being less emotional and more logical, directed more to the head than the heart. Shouting, which constituted so prominent a feature in protracted meetings and revival occasions, became almost obsolete. The old members were slow to accept the new departure, but the world moves, and they were compelled to move with it or be left by the wayside." The new church was built upon the site of the first St. Cloud Hotel, erected, furnished and kept by Mr. John Buckius and his son-in-law, Will Hawk. It was burned down but a short time before. This church edifice was also destroyed by fire on the first Sunday in January of the present year, 1881. The weather had been excessively cold for a number of days, and it took a great amount of firing-up to make the audience room comfortable during the meetings held in it for a few days previous to holding communion services. On this Sunday a large congregation had assembled with the Pastor, Rev. Dr. H. Miller, and the services appropriate to the celebration of the Lord's Supper had progressed almost through the act of blessing the elements of the communion. While on their knees, engaged in prayer, two or three gentlemen discovered fire in the upper part of the church, and gave the alarm. Confusion prevailed for a moment, but a few hasty and earnest words from the Pastor restored order, and in a very few minutes, the congregation, without accident, had escaped from the doomed building, but not a moment too soon. In a minute or two, the flames burst furiously through the roof, and began mounting the tall and stately tower which surmounted the building, and in a few hours, notwithstanding the heroic efforts of the fire department to stay the ravages of the destroyer, it was a total wreck, and nearly all its contents were burned up with it. The congregation, however, not disheartened, resolved to go ahead as soon as the weather would permit, and "build a new temple, which should surpass the glory of the old one." At this writing the work is progressing rapidly, and will be pushed energetically forward to completion. The designs for the new building are gotten up by Mr. Frank O. Weary, and are to be seen at his office in the County Surveyor's room at the court house. A writer in one of the local papers says:

Judging from these designs the building will be of one of the finest church structures in this part of the State. It will be a mixture of the gothic and modern styles of architecture, and will be built of pressed brick, with Berea stone trimmings. The length of the structure will be one hundred and thirty-four feet, in the shape of a letter T, with the cross arm running east and west at the south end of the building. The front will be seventy-nine feet long, with three entrances, a stairway turret on the east side, and the tower rising to a height of one hundred and thirty-five feet at the west. The audience room, which will be on the first floor, is 72x65 feet. The pulpit will be located at the north end with the choir and organ back of it. Main entrances are on each side of the pulpit. The seats are designed in amphitheater style, and the floor is raised two feet higher in the rear than in the front. In the center of the sides of the auditorium are large windows, topped by gables on the outside. Three additional double windows are on each side. Three large doors, 15x18 feet, at the south end of the audience room, separate it from the Sunday-school room; when desired, these doors slide down into pits, provided for the purpose, and thus throw the two rooms into one. The Sunday-school room will be divided into two stories, each of which will contain five class-rooms, arranged in a semi-circle, and facing the general Sunday-school room, at the north end of which is the Superintendent's platform. The class-rooms are to be separated from the regular Sunday-school room by doors with glass panels. The ceiling of the audience room will be finished in walnut paneling and fresco work; that of the Sunday-school room will be made dome-shaped with a skylight at the top. The means of entrance and exit to the first floor are numerous. The audience room is provided with two large entrances, and the Sunday school room with four. The north end of the structure will be raised five feet from the ground, and the south end seven feet. This makes a nice, airy basement, which will be divided into lecture and supper rooms, ladies' and gentlemen's parlors, cooking and serving kitchens, store rooms, pantries, toilet rooms, janitor's room, cloak rooms and boiler room. In the latter, will be located the steam boilers, which will furnish the heat for the building. Ventilating registers will be put in the wainscoting of the audience and Sunday school rooms, which will be connected by flues with the ventilating tower, located at the juncture of the roof of the main building and the hip roof of the Sunday school part of the structure. The inner part of the building will be finely finished in walnut, and the large windows will be furnished with stained glass. The roof will be surmounted by an ornamental tile casing, and the gables will be topped with stone trimmings. In the tower, a place will be made for a chime of bells. The contract for the foundation, to be of Massillon stone, has been let to Mr. John Melbourne, who will begin work as soon as the ruins are cleared away. Contracts for the other work will be let, and it is expected that the building will be under roof before snow flies. The estimated cost of this magnificent structure will be between $60,000 and $75,000.

While the great mass of the old congregation readily adapted themselves to the new order of things, there were always some imbued with the more emotional fervor of the older type of American Methodism, who could not bring themselves into full sympathy with their brethren in what they considered unwarranted innovations. These at last left the First Church, effected an organization as the Second M. E. Church, and erected a large brick church on South Market street, neat but plain, and without steeple or dome. There is no organ in this church, and the services, including "revivals," are more nearly like those of the primitive Methodist Church. As there are in every community men and women in whom the emotional naturally forms the greater part of their intellectual and moral nature, there is probably necessity also in religious matters to arrange by organization that these be provided for; at any rate, this organization seems to have measurably flourished from the start. Whether the emotional or the rational ought to have the higher value in any religious system is not for the impartial historian to determine; the middle ground is probably the safe one; a religion without place for the emotional in man's nature tends to formality and dogmatism; a religion which ignores man's rational being tends on the one side to superstition, on the other to fanaticism; true religion addresses man's higher intellectual powers, and through these, under subjection to faith, seeks to guide and control the affections, the feelings and the will. A third Methodist frame church building was erected a few years ago in the Fourth Ward, in the immediate vicinity of the north school building as a point for missionary operations. This movement, however, has up to this time not resulted in anything tangible or permanent. There are also two Methodist churches in the township, one in Section 26 and the other in Section 30.

The First Baptist Church was started in April, 1849, by Mr. and Mrs. John Danner, Thomas Goodman and Robert C. Latimer, at which time the services of Elder John Winter, of Warren, Ohio, were secured at a salary of $300. April 22, 1849, a Sabbath school was formed with fourteen scholars. The communicants to the church at this time numbered seven. In 1852, Mr. Danner agreed to build a church if the Home Mission Society would pay $500 for pastor's salary for one year, and at the end of the year he would guarantee it free from debt, which the society agreed to do. June 25, 1853, the church was dedicated by Rev. John Winter, Pastor. The church, situated on the southeast corner of Tenth and Market streets, seating 350 people, was used for eighteen years. In 1871, the new church on Ninth and Market streets was built at a cost of $50,000, which is now free from debt, with 275 communicants. Rev. E. W. Lounsbury, the present Pastor, came here in March, 1877, and is well liked by his congregation.

In 1853, a few Episcopalians associated themselves together and held services under the name of "Church of the Advent," until 1868; the number of Episcopalians increased, and a number of lots were purchased at the northwest corner of Tenth and South Popular streets, Easter Monday, March 29, 1869; a Vestry was elected, and the Rev. J. C. Laverty called to the rectorship. In September of the same year, turf was cut for the erection of a new church—the present edifice, which was soon after finished, with several thousand dollars indebtedness resting upon it. Mr. Laverty reduced the debt largely. His resignation took place in the summer of 1875. October 1, 1876, the Rev. Joseph P. Cameron was called to the rectorship, which continued until August 1, 1878. He also reduced the church debt, which was finally entirely paid in 1881, under Rev. Frederick Burt Avery, Rector, now in charge, who came to the parish the last Sunday in August, 1880. The church property now consists of a frame edifice, with a seating capacity of 300, well-furnished walnut seats, pipe-organ, chancel windows and side windows of stained glass; the church is painted and in good repair. The whole is now paid for, as are also the two lots—the one on which the church is built, and the adjoining one reserved for the rectory. Value of the property, about $10,000. Although a number of the old members have been removed by death and otherwise, the communicant list has been increased, by confirmation and transfers, by twenty new members. The Sunday-school numbers sixty-five scholars, ten officers and teachers. The Ladies' Guild has for its officers, Mrs. D. Tyler, President; Mrs. A. G. Dart, Secretary. The officers of the church: Rev. Frederick Burt Avery, Rector. Vestrymen, E. W. Amsden, Senior Warden; William Britton, Junior Warden; J. H. Mathews, M. D., Treasurer; A. G. Dart, Clerk of Vestry; Capt.

Williams, J. W. Young, D. Tyler, H. Churchman, John Snyder.

The Evangelical Church took this city as a mission field, A. D. 1852; and the same year, Rev. Peter Wiest was sent here as a missionary. He immediately set to work to build a church, which was completed in 1853. The building was a neat, one-story brick, which answered its purpose at that time. The church was rebuilt in the year 1874, under the administration of Rev. T. Bach, as preacher in charge of the congregation, and Rev. S. B. Kring, as Presiding Elder. The edifice is now two stories high. This church is located on the east corner of Herbruck and Fourth streets, on a lot donated by Mrs. Barbara Young. When this congregation was organized in 1852, there were but twelve members, viz., Isaac Voegelgasong and wife, John Hane and wife, Peter Tream, Phillip Tream, Gottlieb Kasher, Sister Kitzmiller, Catharine Dittenhaver, Lewis Voegelgasong and Mr. Leininger and wife. Brother Hane served the church of his choice temporarily. The Brethren I. Voegelgasong, P. Tream and J. Hane, obligated themselves to the Conference to pay $10 a year to the missionary cause in order that they might be supplied with a missionary. Rev. Jacob Burkett was the successor of Rev. Wiest, and his labors were crowned with a success that resulted in the conversion of quite a number of souls. This gave the work a new impulse, and ever since that time the influence and the borders of the church have been extended. Rev. G. F. Spreng was the first Presiding Elder presiding at this place. At present, Rev. J. A. Yount is the Pastor of this congregation, and Rev. J. A. Grimm, Presiding Elder. The future for the congregation seems to be bright. A present, this church has about one hundred and seventy communicants.

The Church of God is located on east Tuscarawas street, Rev. M. M. Beck, of West Lebanon, Ohio, Pastor. This is a plain brick structure surmounted by a small spire, containing no bell. The church is 60x40 feet and will seat 150 persons comfortably. It was built in 1876, at a cost of $3,300, and is not yet free from debt. Inside the church is roughly plastered, and has plain benches and a small gallery. The illumination is furnished by coal oil lamps, and the heating apparatus consists of two stoves. The congregation consists of eighty communicants. They believe in immersion and accept the Bible as their foundation rock. The society was organized about ten years ago, by Rev. Mr. Beck.

The United Brethren Church is on Charles street, and is built of brick with a seating capacity of about one hundred and fifty. It is lighted and heated in the old-fashioned style. A small spire with a bell surmounts the church. Rev. S. W. Koontz is Pastor.

The Disciples' Church of Canton dates back for its organization for more than a score of years, and has, under a number of able Pastors, enjoyed a fair share of prosperity. The church building is on the corner of Poplar and Seventh streets. Rev. Mr. Henselman is the present Pastor; he serves besides a congregation at New Berlin in Plain Township, and one newly organized, with a neat frame church lately built at North Industry in this township.

A small brick Lutheran Church has also been erected about a half-mile north of North Industry, on the Canton road, which though occupied a few times for divine worship is not yet quite finished.

Last of all, but doing a good work in its own sphere of activity, is the Mennonite Church just east of Canton, which was built during, or about the year 1830, by Jacob Rowland. Joseph Rohrer was the first minister, with the following members: Jacob Rowland and wife, Mrs. David Schriver, Mrs. Henry Hull, and Christian Wengard and wife. About the year 1852, Mr. Rohrer moved to Indiana; from that time till about 1870, Revs. Smith and Newcomer, from Columbiana County, officiated. The old log church was torn down, and the present brick structure erected in the year 1875, since which time, Michael Rohrer has been the principal minister with from fifteen to twenty members.

In concluding these sketches of the Canton churches, the writer deems it due to the publishers and himself to say that it is to be regretted that so many of the ministers take so little interest in securing a history of their church organizations in permanent form, such as this work would afford them an opportunity of doing. With a few exceptions, they failed to co-operate heartily in the work, and left the historian to do the best he could.

CHAPTER XII.*

PERRY TOWNSHIP—NAME AND ORGANIZATION—SETTLEMENT—AN INCIDENT—OTHER EARLY SETTLERS—FIRST RELIGIOUS MEETINGS—VILLAGE OF KENDAL—PIONEER INDUSTRIES—THE OHIO CANAL—EDUCATIONAL—THE CHARITY SCHOOL.

"Gather we from the shadowy past
The straggling beams that linger yet."
—Spenser.

At a meeting of the Board of Commissioners of Stark County, on the 7th day of December, 1813, it was "ordered that the tenth township of the ninth range be, and the same is hereby made known as a separate and distinct township by the name of Perry. The inhabitants of said new township will meet at the house of Samuel Patton, in Kendal, on the last Saturday in February, and proceed to elect township officers."

From the above it will be seen that the township took its name from Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry, the hero of Lake Erie in the war of 1812. The battle at Put-in-Bay had been fought but about three months previous to the above order, and as the success of American arms in that battle had saved the frontier settlements from being overrun by the British and Indians, the naming of the first township that was organized in the county, after the battle, was a fit recognition of the benefits which accrued to the pioneer settlers of the exposed region. Comparatively few settlements had been made on what was known as the "New Purchase," which was the territory lying west of the Tuscarawas Branch of the Muskingum, in what is now known as the townships of Sugar Creek, Jackson and Lawrence. West of the Tuscarawas River in Stark County, no organization had been made prior to 1810, nor in Wayne prior to 1812. In 1810, the township of Tuscarawas had been organized and its first census showed 145 inhabitants of all ages.

the lands were known as Congress lands to distinguish them from the Western Reserve, New Connecticut and the Fire lands as that portion lying north of the forty-first parallel was called. Much of the land now included in the townships of Bethlehem, Perry, Jackson, Lawrence and Franklin, in the county of Summit, was surveyed by Ebenezer Buckingham in the year 1800, and a man of the name of Carpenter. The Tuscarawas was then the boundary line between the United States and the Indians, which was the reason why the balance of these townships was not surveyed at the same time. Mr. Buckingham was afterward one of the Commissioners of the Canal Fund of Ohio, and lived many years at Zanesville, where he died, closing a long, active and useful life. As already noticed, Perry is called Township 10 of the ninth Range. In forming the ranges, the United States began on the base of the Western Reserve, at the east line of the State, or the base line of the Western Reserve, or latitude forty-one degrees north, and every six miles west was a range, numbering from east to west. The townships on the east side, or first range, counted from the Ohio River north to the base line of the Reserve.

Pursuant to the order of the Commissioners, the voters of Perry Township met in Kendal, now the Fourth Ward of the city of Massillon, on the last Saturday in February, 1814, and elected the township officers, but who were elected to the particular offices, cannot be ascertained, as no person is now living who was present at the election, nor is there a record to be found of an earlier date than 1825. Who were the first Trustees, Treasurer and Clerk, Supervisors, Fence Viewers and Overseers of the Poor and their successors for the first eleven years cannot be stated with entire certainty.

Among the residents of the township at the date of its organization, were Jacob Bahney, John Waggoner, Philip Jacoby, George Amick, Frederick Stump, Robert Barr, Michael Bose, Stephen Shorb, William Armstrong, William McCaughey, James McCaughey, Paul Beard, George Miller, Jonathan Neely, Abraham Goladay and Daniel Ritter, all of whom with others were residents of the south end of the township. In Kendal and in the immediate neighborhood were William Henry, already mentioned, Thomas Rotch, Charles Coffin, Zaccheus

Stanton, Moses Gleason, John Hendley, Abel Strong, Benjamin Franklin Coleman, Rowland Coleman, Alexander Skinner, Charles K. Skinner, Joseph Morton and Thomas Rotch, who resided at Spring Hill, the present residence of Hon. A. C. Wales; John Hall, Arvine Wales, Ephraim Chidester, Boyd J. Mercer, Edward Nelson, John Bowman, Aaron Chapman, Ambrose Chapman, Austin Allen, Richard Whaley, John Shobe, a German, who built a powder-mill on the south side of Sippo Creek, about twenty rods east of the flouring-mill of Messrs. Warwick & Justus in the First Ward of the city of Massillon. The powder-mill, as remembered by the writer, was a log building, in one end of which old John slept with kegs of powder piled up around his bed, and around his fire, wooden trays of the explosive material were arranged for drying. He never feared a blow-up except from lightning; on the appearance of a thunder storm, he was sure to vacate his mill and dwelling until the storm was over and danger from lightning had disappeared. Among the prominent of the early settlers in 1812, and whose influence tended to lay broad and deep the foundations of social order in Perry Township, were Thomas Rotch and his wife, Charity Rotch, members of the Society of Friends, natives of New Bedford, Mass., who moved from there to Hartford, Conn., and from Hartford to Stark County. With him came Arvine Wales and the late Charles K. Skinner, who with Mr. Wales became permanently identified with the growth of the township, and, as will be seen hereafter, with the now city of Massillon. Thomas and Charity Rotch were prominent members of the Society of Friends, both being recommended ministers according to the discipline of the society. The village of Kendal was laid out by Thomas Rotch, in 1811, who named it after a prominent manufacturing town in the West of England. On laying out the village, Mr. Rotch sought at once to utilize the water-power of Sippo Creek, the principal outlet of Sippo Lake, in the northeastern part of the township, by building a woolen factory and saw-mill, both of which have long since gone to decay. Mr. Rotch's policy was not such as tended to advance the growth of his village, nor was the condition of the new country favorable. The immigration was entirely agricultural. A land office was established at Canton, of which Col. Gibson and Col. John

Sloane were Register and Receiver respectively, and as fast as land came into market, it was entered.

On the 18th of June, 1812, war was declared against Great Britain by the United States, which exposed the frontier settlements to incursions of the British and Indians, especially after Hull's surrender, when many of the settlers of the new country went back to their former homes. The paralysis of all sorts of business which followed the declaration of war can hardly be realized at this late period, and which continued many years, and retarded improvements of all kinds. At the close of the war, in 1814, the General Assembly sought to relieve the embarrassment in which all sorts of business was plunged by chartering banks, which went into operation without capital, but soon suspended operations, and nowhere was the embarrassment of the country greater than in the Tuscarawas Valley. There was no surplus of provisions of any kind for many years, and when the surplus came wheat sold for 25 cents per bushel, when it would sell at all, as late as 1826, and all cereals proportionally low, potatoes at twelve and a half cents, while salt commanded at one time $3 per bushel of fifty-six pounds.

On the 14th of the ninth month, in 1823, Thomas Rotch died at Mount Pleasant, in Jefferson County, while attending the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends (Quakers), and was buried there; he was born at New Bedford, Mass., on the 13th of the seventh month, 1767, consequently was but little more than fifty-six years of age; he is well remembered by the writer as a man of fine presence and great shrewdness in all business matters, and, as all Quakers did and do, bore faithful testimony against human slavery. He was frequently called on to protect the fugitive slave on his flight to Canada, and never was known to let the call pass unheeded. A single instance will illustrate his devotion to his principles on that subject, as well as his courage. In the spring of the year 1820, a woman with two children called at his residence and satisfied him that they were fugitive slaves; he at once provided them with a place of safety in the second story of a spring house almost adjoining his residence. In the morning of the following day, immediately after breakfast, a couple of strangers on horseback rode up to the door and inquired if Mr. Rotch lived there, and, on being answered in the affirmative, commenced to make their business known, which was that of slave-hunters, one being known as a man who was in the habit of aiding slaves to escape, advising them what route to take, then following them for the reward offered by their masters; the name of De Camp, the slave-catcher, had become as familiar as household words. Thomas heard him very patiently describe the woman and children, and say that he had traced them to his (Thomas') residence, and produced a warrant for their seizure issued under the act of Congress of 1793, and supposed his work was done—that, the Quakers being a law-abiding people, the mother and children would be at once delivered.

After he had exhausted his vocabulary, Thomas said, "Dost thou think thou can take the woman and her children here if thou canst find them?"

"Certainly," replied the slave-catcher.

"Well," said Thomas, "thou may be mistaken. Thou hast not found them yet, and shouldst thou find them, thou might have trouble to take them."

The strangers had not been invited into the house, and while the dialogue was going on between Thomas and him having the warrant, the farm hands, of whom Thomas kept three or four, gathered around, and seeing such a crowd, the strangers began to look at each other and evinced alarm, which Thomas was not slow to notice, and, breaking a momentary silence, said to the person having the warrant,

"Dost thou know a man who follows the business of slave-catching by the name of De Camp?"

"I do," answered De Camp, for it was he, and was betraying fear of bodily harm, and inquired, "Have you any business with me? My name is De Camp." By this time, the men of Thomas' household, himself included, had formed a sort of circle around the slave-catchers. Thomas replied with the utmost coolness,

"I expect very soon to have some very important business with thee, and it will be well for thee to be prepared for it."

De Camp and his confrere concluded it would be best to beat a retreat, which they did without delay. On reaching their horses, they sprang into their saddles and left the Spring Hill farm and its Quaker occupants, and never again called there for human chattels. The home of Thomas and Charity Rotch, like that of the "village preacher's modest mansion" at "sweet Auburn,"

"Was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wanderings and relieved their pain;
The long-remembered beggar was his guest,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
The naked spendthrift, now no longer proud, Claimed kindred there and had his claims allowed."

There are few now who remember Thomas and Charity Rotch. Those who, in "memory's waste," can bring up the reminiscences of the long-inurned, long-forgotten, long-gone past, will cherish their memory in great kindness. Thomas Rotch died in the prime of life. Could he have lived another decade and participated in the great changes in the Tuscarawas Valley, with his wealth and enterprise, the history of Perry Township would have borne on its pages a record of improvements beyond what is shown even now by the enterprising pioneers who succeeded him, and who gave lavishly of time and money in the development of the resources of our favored township.

It is not, however, to the enterprising capitalist alone that credit should be given for the wonderful development that Perry Township exhibited in the decennial period from 1820 to 1830. It is to the men who hewed down the forest and ran the plowshare beam deep through the, until then, unbroken sward. They came with strong arms and willing hearts, to find a new home and to found a new empire. The harvest yielded to their sickle, and their posterity and successors are their heirs. With them came also another class of men, also pioneers, who contributed their share toward developing "the new country." They were just in advance of the permanent settlers, and stayed until the charms of forest life overcame the desire to remain where progress toward political and social organization got in the advance. Of that class was Massum Metcalf, who came in 1810 and remained a few years, when he left, saying, "The country is too thickly settled; I must go where I cannot see the smoke of my neighbor's chimney, nor hear his dog bark," and he went to parts unknown.

Among the hardy pioneer settlers, and who were among the earliest to build their cabins, and whose doors were always open to the stranger, were the Castleman brothers; their names were John, Henry, Richard and David, with their brother-in-law, Jacob Ross. Connected with them by marriage was a family by the name of Meek. Fond of the chase, not a deer or bear escaped their rifles when they started for game. The last wolf that was killed in the neighborhood north of Massillon was brought down by the unerring rifle of one of the Castleman brothers. Ross claimed that he was the first white child born west of the Ohio River. Be that as it may, a better type of manhood than Jake Ross was rarely found among the hardy pioneers of that day. Excepting John Castleman, all the families left Stark County soon after the organization of Perry Township. John was a citizen of Kendal and Massillon until his death, which was occasioned by a tree falling upon him, from which he lingered, a helpless cripple, for many years. His wife, Margaret Meek, survived him until a few years since, and lived to a good old age, a fine type of the women who sought homes with their families in the trackless forests of the Western country. At her death, she left four children—Mrs. Lyon, of Cleveland, and George and William Castleman and Mrs. Roof (since deceased), of Massillon.

In 1813 and 1814, before and after the organization of the township, immigration increased beyond any former period, and continued to increase, especially when the attention of the Legislature was turned to internal improvements. Land, however, did not rise in value until 1830, and within the personal knowledge of the writer, 1,000 acres of "the plains" in the south end of Perry Township sold for $4.25 per acre; the sale was made in 1824 by Capt. Mayhew Folger to Mr. William R. Dickinson, of Steubenville, and paid for in cloth manufactured at the "Steubenville Factory," of which Messrs. Belzaleel Wells, one of the framers of the Constitution of Ohio, of 1802, and Mr. Dickinson were proprietors.

In the same year first above mentioned, among the "new comers," were Capt. Mayhew Folger and his wife Mary, and their family, his brother-in-law, Thomas Coffin, whose wife, Anna Coffin, was a sister of Capt. Folger, and who took up by original entry and obtained by purchase the lands sold to Mr. Dickinson, above referred to. The newness of the country, and its social condition being so different from anything that Thomas Coffin and his wife, who, with Capt. Folger and his wife, were natives of the Island of Nantucket, Mass., had ever seen, discouraged Thomas and he sold his interest in the Western lands to Capt. Folger, who remained at Kendal until February, 1828, when he removed to Massillon. During the year 1813, also came Bradford Kellogg and rented the building on Lot No. 2 in Kendal, then owned by Arvine Wales. He and his two sons opened a brick yard immediately south of, near the extreme east end of, now North street, and which was afterward known as the Free Bridge Road, until Massillon and Kendal were united, and North street was extended to its present eastern terminus. At that brick yard were made the first bricks manufactured west of Canton. Kellogg and his sons came from Hudson, in Portage County, and brought the first oxen driven under the yoke in the township, and which were used for tramping the clay out of which the bricks were made for Alexander Skinner, Esq., who erected the first brick house in the township, and which was the first west of Canton. The walls of the house were laid by Calvin Hobart and Peter Humphrey; the building now stands on Front street in Kendal, where for sixty-five years it has stood a proud monument of the skill and integrity of the builders, and is a better piece of work, even now, than much of the brick-work built a half a century since. Messrs. Hobart and Humphrey removed to Wooster in 1817, where they remained until 1827, when Hobart returned to Massillon and built one of the first brick houses that was built there, and was finally drowned in the canal on the night of July 4, 1833. The brick house on Front street is now owned and occupied by citizen Anton Vogt, and bids fair to stand the storms of many years. Mr. Skinner removed to Loudonville, then Richland County, and died there. At the close of 1813 and commencement of 1814, and during the latter year, the population of the township increased largely, and the increase was of valuable citizens, among whom were Jonathan Winter, his wife Nancy, son Abner and family, and daughters Sarah and Catharine. Uncle Jonathan, as he was familiarly called, was a Quaker, had been a soldier in the war of the Revolution, and was fond of "shouldering his cane and showing how fields were won." He drew a pension, but escaped a wound on the battlefield. Prominent among the arrivals that year were Dr. William Gardner, from Albany, State of New York, the first physician in the township; from here he removed to Norwalk, Huron County, remained there a few years and then returned to Stark County and located in Canton, where he died in 1833. Dr. Gardner was prominent as a physician, and earnest in his convictions, rarely yielding when once having formed an opinion; also, about the time of Dr. Gardner's arrival, came John C. McCoy, from the city of Baltimore, a journeyman tailor, afterward well known in the Pittsburgh Methodist Conference as Rev. J. C. McCoy, a useful and popular preacher; from here he removed to Loudonville, Ashland Co., Ohio, thence to Washington County, thence to Athens County, where he died a few years ago, honored and respected as a Christian gentleman. In the early part of 1814, came Thomas A. Drayton, afterward a resident of Canton, and Hosea W. Tinker, all useful mechanics, who are pleasantly remembered by the few who yet remain to furnish items for these sketches. About the time of the organization of the township, a family known as the Andrews family came into the township, consisting of the father, Richard, Eve, the mother, and five sons, Daniel, Adam, Charles, David and Richard; the old man entered the fractional section upon which now stands the manufacturing establishment of Russell & Co., the station house of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway, and the other buildings of that corporation, the respective residences of Mrs. Julia Jarvis, Herman Schreiber and all others on South Erie street below the railway, all of which went for intoxicating liquors, which were drank in the family.

Richard Andrews had a son-in-law, John Wolf, who, with two sons, Richard and Samuel, are sleeping their last sleep in drunkards' graves. Among the chattels brought from Maryland by the Andrews family was a stalwart negro, known as Black Jack, John Tibbs being his real name. On the family leaving Hagerstown they were about to sell Jack, and were offered $550 for him, but upon his promising to stay by and support the old folks as long as they lived, they brought him to Ohio. Jack soon learned, however, that the old Constitution contained a clause in the Bill of Rights prohibiting slavery, and he told his old master and mistress that he would fulfill his part of the bargain, but he would not work to support the drunken sons, and left them and lived afterward in Jackson Township, where he married, earned a farm, sold it, moved into Lawrence, where he purchased another farm, and remained until the passage of the Fugitive Slave law, when he went to Canada and ended his days, fearing that some remote heir of the Andrews family might come from Maryland and claim him.

Up to the close of 1814, few settlements had been made in the township west of the Tuscarawas River. On the fractional section west and opposite the residence of Mrs. Jarvis, now owned by the heirs of the late Peter Runser, was located a sturdy Irish pioneer, William Whitcraft; he, however, sold out and removed to Lawrence Township. He was an energetic citizen and at his death left a worthy family. He sold to Hezekiah Bull, of Hartford, Conn., who settled on the land and remained until 1820, when he died.

Mr. Bull was a Democrat of the New England Jeffersonian type, thoroughly imbued with an intense dislike to the Federal party, the Hartford Convention and New England politics in their length and breadth. He was exceedingly earnest in advocating and defending the war of 1812, and the administration of President Madison. He was a kind neighbor and genial gentleman in his social intercourse. In point of culture, he and his family were among the first in the then new and really wild region. Very soon after his arrival here, two of his daughters were married, Hetty, to Alexander Skinner, Esq., brother of the late Hon. C. K. Skinner, and Hoyland to Thomas Taylor, Esq., a son of whom, A. A. Taylor, Esq., is the owner of the extensive flouring-mill on Erie street, in Massillon. Mrs. Bull died a short time after her husband, and the family, sons and daughters, removed to Loudonville, where all excepting Mrs. Taylor and Mrs. Sheldon died. Hon. John W. Bull, a grandson, a member of the present Legislature, from Ashland County, resides in Loudonville, and is always ready to extend a generous hospitality to his many friends. During the years 1812-14, the supply of provisions was not equal to the demand, and Charles K. Skinner, Edward Nelson and Charles Coffin, who was a Nantucket ship carpenter, built a boat and went to Coshocton, where corn was plenty, the Muskingum bottoms always yielding an abundance, and brought several loads, which sold readily for $2 per bushel. Excepting Charles Coffin, none of them knew much in regard to the management of a boat, and on one occasion coming up, they struck on the Cedar Ripple, a few miles below where Massillon now is, and came near losing boat and cargo.

The first religious society organized west of Canton in Stark County was the "Kendal Preparative Meeting of the Society of Friends," their Monthly Meeting being at Marlborough, Quarterly Meeting at Salem, and the Yearly Meeting being held at Mount Pleasant, Jefferson County. It is supposed that all these organizations existed as early as 1813. The principal members of Kendal Preparative Meeting were Isaac Bowman, Richard Williams, Zachaeus Stanton, Charles Coffin, Thomas Rotch, Mayhew Folger, Joseph Hobson, Jonathan Michener, Mathew Macy, a brother-in-law of Charles Coffin, Thomas Coffin, Micajah Macy and others, all of whom, with a single exception, were heads of families. Thomas Coffin could hardly be called a member of that meeting, as he returned to Philadelphia; his wife, a sister of Mayhew Folger and mother of the late Lucretia Mott, survived him thirty years. The influence of that little Quaker meeting was strongly felt in the community. So far as any religious sentiment was recognized, they were in the majority. They were first to erect a place for meeting for worship, called by them a "meeting house," which, when erected, they opened for a school, and it should be said of them, they "bore, with liberty and law, the Bible in their train." Next to them and about the same time, or shortly after, came the Methodists to Kendal, as will be seen by the following extract of a letter from the late Rev. Adam Poe, D. D. It will also be seen that the labors of the Methodists were mainly on the west side of the river until the period above referred to.

Dr. Poe says: "At a session of the Western Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, held at a chapel in Shelby County, Ky., November 1, 1810, Rev. James Dixon was appointed to Tuscarawas Circuit in the Muskingum District; Rev. James Quinn, Presiding Elder. The Tuscarawas Circuit then embraced all the country along the Tuscarawas River from New Portage to Coshocton, taking in the new settlements on both sides of the river. He formed small societies, and only returned seventy-seven members in all that territory at the end of the year. At the next session of the Conference, which was held at Cincinnati, October 1, 1811, Rev. William Mitchell was appointed to the Circuit. Rev. James Quinn, Presiding Elder. Mr. Mitchell reported one hundred and forty-two members at the close of his year. I am not sure whether Dixon formed a society in Tuscarawas Township, but during the winter of 1811-12, Mitchell organized a society at the house of Peter Johnson, Esq., and preached to them regularly every two weeks, since which there has always been a Methodist society in the township. The Western Conference was divided in 1812, and the Ohio Conference formed, which held its first session in Chillicothe, October 1, 1812. At this Conference, David Young was appointed Presiding Elder of the Muskingum District, and John Somerville was appointed to Tuscarawas Circuit, and seems to have had considerable success, for he returned four hundred and ninety-one members. During this year, my first personal acquaintance with the society at Johnson's commenced, and during the ensuing summer, the meetings were removed to the house of Joseph Poyser. This was, I think, the first regularly organized religious society in the township.

"At the second session of the Ohio Conference, which was held at Steubenville September 1, 1813, Rev. John Graham was appointed to Tuscarawas Circuit. At the next session, held at Cincinnati September 8, 1814, Rev. John Cord was appointed to that circuit. At the next session, which was held at Lebanon, Ohio, September 14, 1815, Rev. Curtis Goddard was appointed to the circuit. The next session of the Conference was held at Louisville, Ky., and Rev. Archibald McIlroy was appointed to the circuit, the society meeting at Joseph Poyser's, now the residence of John Christman, Esq. At the next session of the Conference, held at Zanesville, Ohio, September 3, 1817, Rev. James McMahon was appointed to the Tuscarawas Circuit. At the close of the year, he reported 411 members. This venerable gentleman is still living and active in the ministry. His address is Chesterville, Morrow Co., Ohio. He could probably give you a more minute history of the society than I can. Peter Johnson and Joseph Poyser are both dead. As the regular preaching, during this period, was at both their houses, if living they no doubt could be more particular in the history of the society meetings there. Rev. John C. McCoy became a resident in Kendal, I think in 1813 or 1814; and, there being no Methodist society there, he joined in Tuscarawas Township. His address is Marietta, Ohio. Wesley Hatton, still a resident of Tuscarawas Township, was also among the early members of the society. Also Miss Catharine Thacker, now Mrs. Nathan Eldredge. Mr. Thomas Eldridge, an uncle of Nathan, was likewise an early and active member of the society. I think he is still living, but do not know his present address."

The letter from which the foregoing extract was taken was written July 28, 1853. Dr. Poe was correct as to the death of Peter Johnson. He was well known to the writer, as was Poyser, who lived, until within a few years past, and died in Canton. All the other persons named by Dr. Poe, except Mrs. Eldredge, have been dead many years. She now lives with her nephew, William Moffit, Esq., about three miles southwest from Massillon, on the Millersburg road.

The Ohio Conference included within its boundaries the entire State of Ohio, and much more. The Muskingum District remained in that Conference until 1824, when the General Conference erected the old Pittsburgh Conference, so affectionately remembered by all the old Methodists in the valley of the Tuscarawas, which remained as erected by the Conference of 1824 until the year 1848, when it was so changed as to put Perry Township into the North Ohio Conference, where it remained until 1856, when the Pittsburgh Conference was restored to its original boundaries. The General Conference of 1876 changed the map of the Conference so as to bound it on the east by the State Line, between the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and Ohio and Virginia. The first Methodist preaching in Perry Township, east of the Tuscarawas River, was by Josiah Foster, preacher on the circuit, and as Presiding Elder of the Muskingum District he preached at the house of Rev. J. C. McCoy, in Kendal, once in five or six weeks, and as early as 1816. During the succeeding six years, it is impossible to learn with certainty in whose charge the Muskingum District and Tuscarawas Circuit were. In 1822, before the erecting of the Pittsburgh Conference, Thomas R. Ruckle, a young Irishman, was appointed to the circuit, and came around once in five weeks, preaching in the school-room in Kendal, school then being in the east wing of what is called the "L" house, a building built by Ephraim Chidester, grandfather of Dr. Ephraim Chidester, of Massillon. The school was then taught by the late Dr. B. Michener, whose recent death in Iowa at the age of eighty was generally noticed in the public journals. The Doctor being then a Quaker, in unity with the society, and disposed to controversy, and Rev. Mr. Ruckle being "set in defense of the Gospel," soon got up a debate on paper, which was kept up for a long time, and finally died out by consent of the disputants themselves. The Methodists had no place for meeting at this period; their leader in everything pertaining to the church, John C. McCoy, had married a young lady by the name of Comly and removed to Loudonville, and Methodism in Perry Township made little progress, increasing, however, a little from year to year, and always holding its gains until it acquired strength enough to unite with the Freemasons in 1840, to have a place known as the Methodist Episcopal Church of Massillon, and which is fully noticed in the sketch of that city.

Among the early Presbyterians who settled in the township were John and Garrett Cruson, two brothers, and their families, their sister, Mrs. Anna Burhans, Ephraim Chidester, Daniel Myers and his family, Austin Allen, Boyd J. Mercer, and two or three other families in different parts of the township, but no organization in the way of a church was had until after the now city of Massillon was laid out, and which will be noticed in its proper place.

The first thing almost that was done by Thomas Rotch on laying out and recording the plat of the village of Kendal, was to get a post office established on the great east-and-west route through the State, previous to which Canton was the post office for all the region roundabout. Thomas was appointed Postmaster, and John C. McCoy his deputy, as the Postmaster lived a mile out of town. McCoy withdrew from the office, and Matthew Macy was appointed Deputy, or, as that officer was called, Assistant Postmaster, and held the place until the death of Thomas Rotch, when he was appointed Postmaster, and held the office until it was discontinued in 1829. Matthew Macy was a man of rare integrity and rare business qualifications. A native of the island of Nantucket, Mass., he, as was common, indeed it was the rule, went to sea on board a whale ship bound to the Pacific Ocean, but getting crippled by a fall he left the ship he went out in and returned in a homeward bound vessel, arriving at Nantucket soon after the commencement of the war of 1812. The ship he went out in was captured by a British cruiser, so that he lost his share of the cargo. Finding no employment at home in consequence of his crippled condition (from which he never recovered), he came to Ohio and was a clerk in Thomas Rotch's store, taught school, was with Arvine Wales, an administrator who settled Rotch's estate after his death, and held various offices of trust. His wife was a daughter of James Austin, a Vermont Quaker, who removed from Montpelier in 1817 to Kendal.

The first blacksmith in the township was Jesse Otis. His shop was in Kendal, and he was ready for business as soon as a shop could be built. The first tanner in the township was Thomas Williams, whose tanyard and currying-shop were in Kendal, on the north side of State street, which was the great thoroughfare from east to west. Originally, the road from Canton west diverged in a northwesterly direction on the top of the hill near the Russell farm, running through the farm now owned by the heirs of the late John Yingling, then occupied by Zachaeus Stanton, and intersecting the east end of State street, in Kendal, which street it followed to the west end, where it diverged to the southwest until it struck a point now known as the east end of Cherry street, in Massillon, thence west to the Tuscarawas River, where a toll bridge was built and furnished the only crossing-place on the river in the township, excepting at the "high banks" at the northern terminus of Clay street, in the city of Massillon, and at Barr's Fording, three miles south, near where are now the Wormington Coal Mines. The stock in the toll bridge was mainly owned by Judge William Henry, who had purchased the fractional section of land on the west side of the river, and erected the brick house, yet standing there, in which he "kept store" and lived with his family. As immigration into Stark and Wayne Counties was in excess of any period before or since, the location for business was the best west of Canton or perhaps in the county. The toll bridge became a most odious monopoly, and the people everywhere determined that it should not exist. Their effort was to get a road laid out from the divergence east of the city on a straight line west, or as nearly so as practicable, to the fording place, the now northern terminus of Clay street, thence, after crossing the river at that fording place, as nearly west as possible, until it should intersect the old Wooster road. This plan, of course, would only answer when the river could be forded. It was at once determined to build a free bridge, which was done, and trade was then diverted over the new route, and the old toll bridge went to decay, and is remembered by but few of the present residents of the Tuscarawas Valley. After the free bridge was erected, it was sought to be destroyed by cutting away its principal supports at the eastern end. Tradition says that David Andrews, already referred to in these pages, did the job, for which he received a fiddle, a silver watch and a quart of whisky. The bridge was repaired and served the people for many years, until an additional straightening of the road from Canton to Wooster made Main street, in Massillon, the great thoroughfare, when the principal crossing of the river was located where it now is.

The first Justice of the Peace in Perry Township was a blacksmith by the name of Francis Smith, the grandfather of citizen George W. Hathaway, of Massillon. Justice Smith moved to Brookfield, in Tuscarawas Township, where he died. He was succeeded by Capt. Nathaniel Ray, a retired shipmaster, from Nantucket, and it may be said of him that he was a "character." While it was true of him that he had been a shipmaster, his sailing had been confined to coasting from Portland, Me., to the Capes of Florida and New Orleans. He had followed that mode of life until he felt that he, too, ought to join the vast crowd that was seeking a new home, so he came to Kendal. He had an unfortunate habit of mixing whisky with his water in considerable quantities, and when under the influence of the mixture, had little control over himself. On one occasion, while driving his iron-gray mare before a "Dearborn" wagon, as they were called in those days, a wheel came off, and he, considerably under the influence of the whisky he had drank, dropped the lines and jumped out. As he struck the ground the mare started for home, and got there with what was left of the carriage. As Ray followed, he found the pieces. He had the wheel on his shoulder that dropped from the wagon while he was driving. Meeting one of the neighbors he swore he would kill the mare, but on getting home he compromised by simply cutting off her ears, a feat Ray never survived so as to remain at Kendal, so he packed up and went back to Nantucket, got a little vessel and resumed his old avocation as master of a coaster, and finally anchored there.

The first store that was opened in Kendal or in the township was opened by Thomas Rotch; next to him came William Henry and Gilbertharp Earle, and lastly in Kendal, Isaiah Brown, noticed more particularly in the sketches of Massillon. The embarrassment in all business matters, stagnation of trade, and especially the ruin of commerce upon the ocean, upon which New England subsisted, occasioned by the war of 1812, drove many shipmasters and New England people to the West, and the year 1814 was strongly marked by the increase from that quarter. Among those who came into Perry Township that year were Gilbertharp Earle and his family, Capt. James Duncan, a retired shipmaster from the merchant service, his residence having been at Portsmouth, N. H., and many others. These gentlemen are mentioned particularly because of the important parts they sustained on the historic stage, as did Alexander Johnston, Esq., who came into the township a year or two earlier, and before the township was organized.

Gilbertharp Earle was born June 19, 1772, at Burlington, N. J., and was married at Upper Freehold, Monmouth Co., to Sarah Cook, October 10, 1799; he remained at Burlington until 1813, when he removed to Canton in the autumn of that year, and remained until the spring of 1814, when he removed to Kendal. He entered at the land office the fractional Section on the west side of the river, known as No. 6, and after merchandising at Kendal and removing to Canton again, where he remained but a year or two, returned to his farm, gave his attention to farming and the dispensing of a generous hospitality that will ever be gratefully remembered by all who shared it. The residence of Mr. and Mrs. Earle was a resort for young and old, and all were made happy by the unflinching politeness always kindly tendered. On arriving at Kendal, the family of Mr. and Mrs. Earle consisted of Sarah B., who married Dr. Gardner, by whom she was left a widow in 1833, and moved to Harmar, Washington Co., Ohio, and married Henry Fearing, Esq.; she died on the 30th day of July, 1876; John, who died January 8, 1855; Thomas Earle, M. D., now living in Brooklyn, N. Y., at the age of seventy-six; Hannah, now the wife of Hon. Harlow Chapin living at Harmar, at the age of seventy-four; Frances, who married Gen. Gardner Field, a notice of whose death will be found in the sketch of the city of Massillon; she afterward married Edward Clark, Esq., of Harmar, and died on the 26th day of February, 1879.

Gilbertharp Earle, Jr., born in February, 1812, and died at his residence near this city in September, 1873. Mr. and Mrs. Earle had three children born in Ohio, but one of whom survives, Mrs. Rebecca Johnson, widow of the late Hon. Matthew Johnson, member of the Legislature of Ohio in 1837 and 1838 from this county, and Marshal for the Northern District of Ohio, during the administration of President Buchanan. Mr. Earle died January 9, 1850, at the age of seventy-eight, and Mrs. Earle died at Harmar in 1855, aged seventy-nine; they led useful and active lives, Mr. Earle having filled important public trusts.

The organization of the township as a political and social organization fell into the hands of men who studied the public weal and carried out practically views and plans that met the entire approbation of the community. "Schools and the means of instruction," as recommended in that grand instrument, the old Constitution of Ohio, were encouraged, a refined social intercourse all over the township was established, that is affectionately remembered by the now old men who survive. In the language of the great British essayist:

"Then none was for a party;
Then all were for the State;
Then the great man helped the poor,
And the poor man loved the great.
Then lands were fairly portioned,
Then spoils were fairly sold;
The Romans were like brothers
In the brave days of old."

When Mr. Duncan left Portsmouth, his objective point was the State of Virginia, that portion now included in West Virginia, and especially Brooke and Ohio Counties. At Wheeling, he had friends, Messrs. Jacob Atkinson and Peabody Atkinson, brothers, and a Mr.

Peterson. He remained in those counties for a year or two, and married Miss Eliza T. Vilette, and with the two brothers Atkinson concluded as a sort of horseback adventure to visit the "Rotch Settlement." Accordingly the three gentlemen started on horseback in the spring and came to Kendal, and stopped at a hotel kept by John Bowman, a Pennsylvania Dutchman, which was the only one in the village, and was the first hotel opened in the township. It soon became known that there were strangers from Portsmouth, N. H., in town, and as there were several New England families already in the village and vicinity, a Quaker woman, who with her husband, had a year or two before visited Portsmouth, strangers, and received genuine New England hospitality, said to her husband, "Thee had better go and call on the strangers; they may be connected with the families who were so polite to us, and if so, we should at least invite them to dine."

The Quaker head of the family said to his wife, "I should be glad to invite them at any rate, and if thee thinks thee can make out a dinner for them, I will call on them and invite them for to-morrow." The preliminaries being thus settled, he called on the strangers, had a long talk with them in regard to the county and State of Ohio, its prospects, and invited them to dine; the invitation was promptly accepted, and after dinner they all rode over a considerable portion of the township, examined the water-power of the Sippo Creek, rode over the ground plat of the now city of Massillon, and the strangers were favorably impressed; they went no further west, returned to Wheeling, and Wellsburg, Va., and Mr. Duncan returned shortly afterward and purchased the Estremadura farm, now owned by the Kegler heirs, and purchased the quarter-section on which the city is, in part, laid out. The purchase was made for the water-power of Sippo Creek, and near where now stands the Masonic Lodge, and the merchant flouring-mill of Isaac N. Dexter. Mr. Duncan erected a flouring-mill and saw-mill, having first erected a dam across the creek, near where East street, Massillon, now crosses the creek. The place was known as Duncan's Mill, as it had no other way of distinguishing it from any other point in the Tuscarawas Valley.

There was one member of Mr. Earle's family when he came into the township, who yet lives in the township just outside the city limits at the age of ninety-six years, Mrs. Rebecca Stafford, her maiden name being Cook, a sister of Mrs. Earle; she married Abel Stafford, one of the colony who settled in Tuscarawas from Essex County, N. Y., by whom she was left a widow many years since. She is in the enjoyment of excellent health and bids fair to see the one hundredth anniversary of her birthday. The name of Aunt Rebecca Cook sixty years ago, was as "familiar as household words." She has life-long been a remarkable woman, and her bright intellect makes her home a pleasant place to visit; her recollection of the events of early times is clear.

The stagnation of business, scarcity of money and almost cessation of immigration, commencing soon after the close of the war, seemed to paralyze the energies of every body; a surplus of agricultural products was always on hand, and no outlet to market; a general feeling of discouragement pervaded the community; when land would sell at all, it sold for merely nominal prices, compared with its real value. To get rid of the increasing produce on his hands after the building of his mill, Mr. Duncan erected a distillery, a log building which stood near the corner of Charles and Mill streets, Massillon, the first distiller being Seth Chase, a native of Vermont, who had settled in Tuscarawas Township. As time wore on, Mr. Duncan accumulated a large quantity of whisky, and, in 1822, he determined to load a flat-boat with flour, whisky and potatoes for the New Orleans market. The idea had hardly entered his mind, until he went with all possible haste to Charles Coffin, and contracted for the building of a boat to be launched in the Tuscarawas, and loaded with flour, whisky, potatoes, bacon, and, in short, anything that would sell in Southern market. The boat was built and launched exactly where now is the eastern end of the arched stone bridge in Massillon; the amount of her tonnage is not recollected, nor can it be ascertained. She was built bottom up and turned over into the water with entire success; her upper works were immediately set up and finished; a fortunate rise in the river was taken advantage of, teams were employed which worked night and day, and with the rise, the boat was loaded, and in the early spring of the year, the "Walk in the Water," as Mrs. Duncan had named the boat, started on her voyage. Much apprehension was felt lest the dam across the river at Zoar, and Baker's dam at New Philadelphia, should be in the way, but the flood kept up and the dams were crossed in safety.

The Muskingum was reached and being at flood-tide, having the waters of the Tuscarawas and Walhonding to keep it up, Capt. Duncan had company to the Ohio, Coshocton and Zanesville and other towns on the river being engaged in shipping to New Orleans. No time was lost in reaching Cincinnati. On arriving there, Capt. Duncan found the market buoyant for his entire cargo, and sold out boat and cargo at a fine advance, and walked from Cincinnati to Kendal, where he then resided. His success was followed with other and similar efforts, none of which, however, were near so successful.

Mr. Duncan's success was only an additional stimulus to greater improvements in the valley, in which all his fortunes were staked, his ambition for improvement was only restrained by his means. On his return from Cincinnati, he and Mr. Skinner immediately formed the partnership of C. K. Skinner & Co., and first put up a carding-machine, picker and the other appliances, simply for carding wool and reducing it to rolls for the spinning-wheel, Mr. Skinner having been bred to the business while in the service of Thomas Rotch, and such was their success that the flouring-mill was soon turned into a woolen manufactory, and was known as the "Free Bridge Woolen Factory Fifty rods east of the Tuscarawas Free Bridge," and was continued as a woolen factory; an addition was made in which the works for manufacturing flax-seed oil were erected, and the business of manufacturing oil was carried on for many years.

Under the untiring energy of Mr. Duncan, in which he was ably seconded by Mr. Skinner, the improvements of this portion of the Tuscarawas Valley were rapidly accelerated. Among the old-time landmarks of a pre-historic period, so far as the city of Massillon is concerned, is the building now owned by James Bayliss, Esq., and occupied by T. Clarke Miller, M. D., and which was erected in 1823, the east end being first used by Mr. Duncan for a dry goods store, the west end being occupied by Mr. Duncan as a residence for his family. The year 1824, however, was the turning-point for business in the entire length of the Tuscarawas Valley, and especially in so much of it as lies in the county of Stark. In that year, 1824, the Legislature of Ohio, which had had for several years the subject of internal improvement in one form or another before it, resolved to proceed; and an act was passed February 24, directing the Commissioners, who had been already appointed, to continue their labors and employ an able engineer and assistants. The reports of the Commissioners were so favorable, that, in 1825, an act was passed "to provide for the internal improvement of the State of Ohio by navigable canals," and agreeably to the provisions of which act the Ohio Canal, from Cleveland to Portsmouth, was built.

Immediately upon the passage of the last-mentioned act, Mr. Duncan commenced and never ceased his labors until the canal was located in the Tuscarawas Valley, and on the east side of the Tuscarawas River. On the 18th day of January, 1826, forty-four sections, commencing at the south side of the Summit Lake in Portage, now Summit County, on the Portage Summit, and extending south to the second lock south of the city of Massillon, near the residence of Mrs. Jarvis, a distance of twenty-seven miles, south of the now city of Akron, were let to contractors, the letting taking place in Kendal at Mr. Duncan's residence, which was the only brick house in the village, and which will be remembered by the reader as the one erected by Alexander Skinner, Esq.

As soon as it was settled beyond peradventure where the canal was to be located, Mr. Duncan commenced to purchase land in the valley north and south of the tracts already owned by him, and also commenced to lay out a town, which extended from North street, on the north, adjoining the residence of Dr. Joseph Watson, to South street, adjoining the "Excelsior Works," west to the Tuscarawas River (beyond that boundary the land was owned by Judge William Henry), and east to High street, which bordered on lands owned by the estate of Thomas Rotch, deceased. Excepting on the south, Mr. Duncan took in all the territory he owned. The fractional section on the east side of the river, not owned by Mr. Duncan, lying between his land and the river, was owned by Hon. P. A. Karthans, of Baltimore, having been entered by him at an early day, and on which a large portion of the village, between the canal and river, was laid out. The new town was called Massillon, taking its name from Jean Baptiste Massillon, a celebrated Roman Catholic French Bishop, of the days of Louis XIV, of France. The name was suggested by Mrs. Duncan, who was a fine French scholar, and of whom, it may be said in passing, she was a niece of the Hon. Charles Hammond, one of the early editors of the Cincinnati Gazette, and a woman of rare education and social qualities.

The first school in the township was taught by William Mott, a young Quaker of limited education, but earnest in his efforts to do good, faithful and upright; he realized his incapacity, and soon quit teaching, and worked in Thomas Rotch's woolen factory, and finally returned to the East. Next to him as a teacher was Cyrus Spink, a man of education and excellent habits. As a teacher for those days he was a success. But one of his pupils yet remains within the bounds of his territory as a teacher, now drawing rapidly to the seventh decennial period of life, and another now residing at Mantua Station in Portage County, Ohio, just entered upon his seventy-eighth year. Mr. Spink, on leaving Kendal, went to Wooster and remained there until his death on the 31st of May, 1859. At the time of his death he was a member of Congress elect from that district, and was sixty-seven years of age. He was Major General of the Military Division in which Wooster is situated, and life-long sustained the reputation of an upright man. Among the teachers of that day was Ruth Logue, a Quaker, afterward the wife of Nathan Galbraith, of New Garden, Columbiana County. She was a model woman as teacher and in every other respect. The writer can well say of her, as was written by Goldsmith of the village master of Sweet Auburn, she was a woman,

"Severe and stern to view,

I knew her well as every truant knew;
Full well had boding troubles learned to trace
The day's disasters in her morning face;
Yet she was kind, or if severe in aught,
The love she bore to learning was in fault."

The children she taught loved her, and the few who yet remain to visit the old play-ground on the "Green" in Kendal, cherish for her affectionate memories.

The way schools were organized and conducted, the mode of teaching, indeed everything connected with education in those days, was, perhaps, the best that could be under the circumstances; but while that is conceded, it is a wonder that children learned anything useful, or received just impressions of anything calculated to serve them in the future. The foundations for usefulness, however, were laid, and many of the men and women educated, in part, in those schools, poor as they were, have written their names high up on the historic page, the women as teachers, and the men have taken their places in all the learned professions, and as legislators in the General Assembly of the State and in Congress.

On one occasion, a teacher came to Kendal and called on Capt. Mayhew Folger, who was always among the first to interest himself in the cause of education, and made known his desire to have a school, and represented himself as well qualified. Capt. Folger gave him pen and ink and said if he would draw a subscription paper, he, Capt. Folger, would subscribe a certain number of scholars; the teacher drew up his paper misspelling about half the words; his attention was called to that defect in his own education, when he replied with the utmost coolness, "Spelling is not very essential."

Until 1825, there was no uniform school system in Ohio. "In that year, the friends of schools and canals," says the late Chief Justice Chase, in his admirable historical sketch of Ohio, preliminary to his great work, "Chase's Statutes," "united in the Legislature, and the following systems of internal improvement and general instruction were simultaneously brought into being. The act, from that year, imposed a general tax of one-half of one mill on the dollar for the support of schools, and provided for their establishment in every township." The schools were championed by the Hon. James W. Lathrop, a member of the House from Stark County. On Mr. Lathrop's return to his constituency at the adjournment of the Legislature, a hue and cry was raised against him, which threatened his defeat as a candidate for re-election; he was, however, re-elected by a reduced majority, the objection to him was the increased taxation to support common schools. "People do not want so much learning," said a prominent farmer, whose grandson, in 1840, graduated from Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, at the head of his class. Mr. Lathrop returned to the Legislature and remodeled the "act entitled the act organizing the common schools of Ohio," increasing the taxation and improving the law generally. The clamor against him was increased tenfold, but he was re-elected in 1827; and true to his convictions, he started again to improve, by amendments to the former acts, "The Common-School System of Ohio." While engaged on his work, he was stricken down by disease and died; his wife, a resident of Canton, rode to Columbus on horseback, arriving in time to witness his death; his remains were laid away in one of the cemeteries of the Capital City, and remained there until 1873, when Hon. Samuel C. Bowman, then member of the House of Representatives from this county, offered a resolution providing for their removal to Canton. The resolution was at once adopted, and the Stark County members of the House and Senate were appointed a Joint Committee to attend to the removal, Hon. Ellis N. Johnson, Jr., being the colleague of Mr. Bowman and Hon. Arvine C. Wales from the Twenty-first District, Stark and Carroll, being the Senator, the Committee and remains being attended by Frederick Blankner, Esq., Third Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms of the House.

Mr. Lathrop having been an honored member of Canton Lodge, No. 60, of A., F. & A. M., the brethren of both lodges in that city met the remains at the railway station at Canton, and, under their care, the remains were deposited in the beautiful cemetery of that city. A large number of the prominent citizens of Canton and Massillon paid their respects to the remains of the founder of the common-school system of Ohio by their presence at the interment; remarks, suited to the occasion, were made by gentlemen from both cities, but no eulogy can ever do justice to the memory of James W. Lathrop. A monument to his memory "more durable than brass," should be at once erected, upon which should be inscribed, simply, "The Founder of Common Schools," with the name of the distinguished citizen; and, as Daniel Webster said of Bunker Hill Monument, "there let it stand and meet the sun in his coming; let the earliest light of the morning gild it, and parting day linger and play upon its summit."

Still the imperfections of the common schools were such that select schools were everywhere springing up, until repeated legislation has given the township, as well as the entire State, the best school system in the West.

Perry Township was never behind other portions of the county in its attention to education.

The excellent school taught by Barak Michener, in Kendal, before he studied medicine, brought pupils from Canton who were taught the rudiments of a common English education. The year 1817 brought many "new-comers" from New England, among whom were Thomas Reed and Richard Breed, and their families, from Lynn; and Sylvanus Hathaway and his family, originally from New Bedford, Mass. The first two went into the then lately organized township of Jackson, and Hathaway stopped at Kendal, where he died in a few years. Miss Eliza Reed, one of the three children of Thomas Reed, was married to Mr. C. K. Skinner in 1822. They lived in Kendal and in Massillon forty-four years, she dying in 1866 at the age of sixty-nine; her life was one of great usefulness. Before her marriage, she, too, was a teacher of a select school at Kendal.

The first orchard planted in the township is on the south side of the road between Massillon and Canton, on what is now the farm of Mr. Daum, and it is believed to have been planted by Jonathan Chapman, better known as Johnny Applesseed, who was well known through this part of Ohio during the earliest settlement of which any account can be had, as a planter of orchards. He is well remembered as going from house to house and calling for apple seeds. The fruit then had was brought from the East in wagons, and sold at fabulous prices. A full sketch of Johnny Applesseed will be found in "Howe's Historical Collections of Ohio," in the history of Richland County. The next orchard was planted in the south end of the township by John Reamer, on a tract of land sold by him to Mayhew Folger, and subsequently owned by Mr. Coder. After Mayhew Folger purchased the land, a portion of the trees were transplanted to the orchard formerly within the now city limits of Massillon, where stands the residence of Henry Beatty, Esq. On the west side of the river and now in the Second Ward of the city, was another early orchard, planted by Alexander Johnson, Esq., already mentioned in these pages. He had served in the army of the United States with Gen. Wayne in his campaign in 1794. He came from Western Pennsylvania, and was of as hardy a race of men as ever peopled any country, and was a man of as high a sense of honor and integrity of character as ever aided in the formation of society. Earnest in his convictions and true to himself, he never was false to anybody else. He was killed in 1841 by falling from his hay mow on the sharp paling of his hay ladder in his barn on the farm where now resides his son, Jonathan Johnson, just outside the city limits of Massillon, at about the age of seventy.

This township claims the distinction of having first introduced Spanish Merino sheep into this portion of Ohio. Thomas Rotch introduced them; they were driven from Hartford, Conn., and were the product of importations from Spain made in 1803, by Col. David Humphreys. The next importations of merino sheep into the Tuscarawas Valley were by Bezaleel Wells and William R. Dickenson, of Steubenville, Mr. Dickenson being the owner of the celebrated merino ram "Bolívar," which took the premium, a silver cup, in Baltimore. Bolívar was sent from Mr. Dickenson's farm, "Estremadura," in this township, in a covered cart in charge of a faithful shepherd, and at an exhibition of fine-wooled sheep from all parts of the United States, Perry Township bore away the prize.

Among the institutions of Perry Township of which everybody should be proud, is the Charity School, of Kendal, sometimes called the Rotch School, founded on the following bequest in the will of Charity Rotch:

Having for many years past been very desirous of promoting the establishment of a benevolent institution for the education of destitute orphans and indigent children, more particularly those whose parents are of depraved morals, that they may be trained in habits of industry and economy; it is my will that my executors convert the remainder of my property, both real and personal, into money as soon as practicable, and place the same in permanent funds, the interest of which to be solely applied to said institution. Should the same be sufficient to attach a farm thereto, so that a portion of the boys' time may be devoted to the laudable pursuit of agriculture, and a part of the girls' time to be devoted to the duties of housewifery, whereby they may support themselves and become useful members of society, and also that a sufficient time may be devoted to the acquiring of a common English education. It would more fully comply with my desires, should the amount not be sufficient fully to accomplish said object, and no other fund could be added to second my efforts, it is my will that the interest of said fund be solely applied to the instruction of such children in a common English education.

It will be observed that, according to the terms of the foregoing bequest, the school was made a residuary legatee. The testatrix had no idea what the amount would be, but greater or smaller it was to be carefully husbanded by her executors, who were Arvine Wales and Matthew Macy, who after settling the estate and paying the last farthing in the way of specific legacies, and reducing the rest and residue to money, or its equivalent, found that $20,000 would remain for the purpose of establishing a school, such as was contemplated by the Quaker woman whose act was for the race, the poor and needy whom she never forgot. The fund was carefully managed by the executors, Arvine Wales, especially, and within twenty years after the death of the testatrix, Mr. Wales had purchased 185 acres of choice farming land just outside the city limits on the north, and on which the school buildings are erected.

The following very complete history of the school, its objects and the success that has attended it, is furnished by Ira M. Allen, Esq., Superintendent:

The main building was commenced in 1842, and in 1844 a school was opened with ten scholars. Philander Dawley, from Newark, N. Y., Superintendent, the Trustees and Superintendent having adopted the following plans:

The school, when full, to consist of twenty boys and twenty girls were indentured to the Board of Trustees for four years, ten to be admitted and ten to graduate at the end of four years. No child to be admitted under twelve, nor over fifteen years of age. As the children were to be taught, the boys farming, and the girls to do all kinds of housework and plain sewing, which was one of the requirements of the will, and the school has been managed substantially upon that plan since its organization, except that when the prices of clothing and supplies for the school advanced during the war, it was found that the income was not sufficient to maintain so many, when the number of pupils was reduced to thirty.

The school has been conducted on the plan of a family, as far as possible. All eat at the same table and mingle together as brothers and sisters, and there is very little more restraint than would be found necessary in a well-regulated family, they are, in fact, a family of brothers and sisters. The cultivating of the idea that we are a family, works well. All that is required for an applicant, when there is a vacancy in the school, is that he or she shall be of sound mind and body, of fair moral character, and so poor as to be unable to procure decent educational advantages. Mr. Dawley resigned his position as Superintendent, April 1, 1854, and was succeeded by Ira M. Allen, who resigned in 1864, and was succeeded by Adam W. Heldenbrand, a former pupil, who was elected Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in 1865, and is now Probate Judge of Stark County, holding the latter place for three terms. Judge Heldenbrand's successor was Abraham

C. Duley, who managed the school successfully for seven years, when he resigned and Mr. J. W. Geseman took his place, who was again succeeded by Ira M. Allen, April 1, 1879, and who has charge of the school at this time.

There have been graduated at the Kendal Charity School, which is the corporate name of the institution, about one hundred and fifty scholars since its organization, most of whom have become honorable members of society, and many have arisen to eminence in the learned professions. The farm is nearly all under cultivation, the entire labor of the farm and in the house is performed by the pupils, notwithstanding which, the division of labor and study is such that the children have about as many hours of study during the year, as is devoted to teaching in the best Union schools of the State. Many complete the entire course of study, which consists of reading, writing, geography, arithmetic, grammar, natural philosophy, History of the United States, elements of physiology, algebra and geometry.

Whatever may be due to Charity Rotch for her gift for the education of the poor and needy, all of which will ever be gratefully acknowledged, the name and memory of Arvine Wales will ever be kindly and affectionately remembered in connection with the cause of education, not only for his guarding the fund upon which the Charity School is based, but for his devotion to the cause of popular education during his long and useful life. The Charity School of Kendal, and the Union School of Massillon, are monuments which bear the impress of his care and watchfulness.

While great credit is due to the Superintendents of the Charity School, their wives, who have had the responsibility, in addition to their own families, of looking after the pupils, must not be overlooked nor forgotten; they, too, have borne burthens that entitle them to mention everywhere in connection with the school, and nobly and well have they discharged every duty and every responsibility connected with their position, they will be ever gratefully remembered by the poor for whom they so faithfully labored.

On the 6th of the eighth month, 1824, Charity Rotch died at the Spring Hill farm, and was buried in the Friends' burying ground in Kendal, where rest the remains of many of the "rude forefathers of the hamlet."

The property belonging to Kendal Charity School, at a low estimate is valued at $60,000. The interest on the fund, now about $30,000, with the labor of the pupils, pays the entire cost of the school, and under the management of the present careful Board of Trustees and Superintendent, the school is fulfilling the anxious wishes of its founder, as expressed in her last will and testament near sixty years since.

The present Board of Trustees consist of Thomas McCullough, President; Charles F. Ricks, Frank L. Baldwin, Horace Richards and Hon. A. C. Wales, Secretary and Treasurer. The grave of Charity Rotch may possibly be found in the old Quaker burying ground. If there be anything to enable the stranger to find it, it is a plain sandstone just above the surface of the earth with the initials C. R. "The foe and the stranger might tread o'er her head," unconscious that he is standing on the grave of the noble woman who divided her estate with the poor. The writer of these sketches attended her funeral, and as no epitaph graces her tombstone, he desires to say of her, "she loved mankind."

While each year's history discloses some event that was regarded worth remembering, the year 1824 has its event, and that was the running of a four-horse post coach from Pittsburgh to Mansfield once a week, and carrying the mail; then the post office department increased the mail service to twice a week in coaches, then tri-weekly, which soon became a daily; before the running of coaches, the mails were received weekly; their coming was announced by the

"Twanging horn of the postman that
With its wearisome, but needful length, Bestrode the wintry flood."

The four-horse post coach was an incident in those days, but few yet remain who remember its coming.

The proprietor of the stage line, as it was called, was Daniel Burgert, of Paris, the driver a man by the name of Estep, afterward a merchant in New Alexandria, Columbiana Co. Proprietor and driver have long since closed their accounts.

The year 1826, was marked by many important events in the history of this township; the laying-out of the new city of Massillon, the letting of the work on the Ohio Canal to contractors and the commencement of the work, were regarded as works of great importance in the effect they were destined to have on the future history of the county, and especially on the western townships, but to those who can say in reference to those events—

"All of which I saw—"

no circumstance in history is remembered with more interest than the formation of the Kendal Community, its rise and progress and decline and fall.

In the year 1825, it will be remembered that much was written on the subject of socialism and social reform, and that among the writers and advocates of such a reformation was Robert Owen, father of the late Robert Dale Owen, and who will ever be remembered as a humanitarian of the most noble type, unbounded benevolence, and stainless purity of character and reputation, of New Lanack, Scotland. Paul Brown, one of the clearest writers and thinkers on that subject; Josiah Warren, a man somewhat Utopian in his ideas, but, nevertheless, upright and honest in his convictions, and many others, were prominent in their efforts to awaken the public mind to a consideration of the subject. Paul Brown and Josiah Warren being in the West and visitors at the Kendal Community, were known to the writer. Men and women of liberal and enlarged views, and who might well be classed among the most advanced thinkers, gave the subject attention, and the result was, that, in the summer of 1826, many of the residents of Perry and Tuscarawas Townships and also from Portage County, after various meetings and discussions of the subject, determined to organize a community based generally upon the views of Robert Owen; the name adopted by the association was the Kendal Community. The name given it by the public was the "Owenites." They purchased of the estate of Thomas Rotch, 2,113 acres of land in the neighborhood of Kendal and Massillon, together with some town lots, improved and unimproved, in Kendal, for $20,000. Of the officers, or mode of government of the community, little can now be ascertained. In November, 1827, the community was re-enforced by a considerable accession from the State of New York. Edward Dunn and James Bayliss, of the city of New York; Dr. Samuel Underhill, wife and children, a total of five; Nathaniel Underhill, wife and children, a total of five; Jethro Macy, wife and five children, a total of seven; Henry C. Fosdick, wife and children, a total of seven; William G. Macy and Edward Hussey, making a total of twenty-eight. They started from Cossackie, Greene Co., N.Y., so near the close of navigation as to be subjected to almost untold trials before reaching Kendal. On reaching Buffalo, all the steamboats on the lake were laid up, and it was with great difficulty that a small and inferior schooner could be had to bring them to Cleveland, where they arrived after "hair-breadth 'scapes." The Ohio Canal was only navigable to Akron, in its best condition, and, at that season of the year, could hardly be called navigable at all; some of the men walked to Akron on the towing-path of the canal, which, much of the way, was through an almost uninhabited portion of the country; those who managed to get to Akron were met with teams from the community, and, after much suffering, all got through safely, and all united with the Kendal Community to which they had been invited, and which they intended to do before leaving home.

For the rest, in regard to this social enterprise, one of the surviving members of the community furnishes the following, and from whose manuscript the foregoing, much condensed account in reference to the New York accession to the community is taken. It is much to be regretted that the full account of the journey from Albany to Kendal could not be inserted, as it is full of points of exceeding interest.

"On our arrival," says the gentleman from whose manuscript the following is copied, "we went to work with a will, and were very anxious to make a success of the undertaking, and willing and ready to make any sacrifice to that end. We had listened to that eloquent philanthropist, Robert Owen, had read much that he had written, and were thoroughly convinced—as he taught—that man is the creature of circumstances, over which he has no control whatever. That he cannot say who his parents shall be, what shall be their country, politics or religious creed; therefore his character is formed for him and not by him. That property was very unequally divided; that all things were tending to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. That those who produced the wealth enjoyed only a small portion of it, and that those who produced nothing had too much wealth for their own good. That the producing classes, if properly educated and surrounded by proper circumstances, could easily arrange society so as to secure to each the product of his or her own labor, and all the best advantages of securing to all the children equally the very best education attainable.

"The Kendall Community, at the time of the arrival of the friends from New York, was composed of the following persons:

"Amasa Bailey, Asa K. Burroughs, Matthew Macy, Frederick Oberlin, Philip Waggoner, John Waggoner, John Newcomb, William Harding, Zeno Culver, Hezekiah Culver, John H. Blackman, John Harmon, John Sprague, William Widgeon, Jehiel Fox, Jonathan Winter, Joseph Tinkler, Dr. Luther Hanchett, William Hanchett and Elijah Bigelow; all these had families. Of those who had not families were Luther Pond, David Kennedy and John Kennedy, and doubtless others that I cannot remember. Most of the families were large, and seemed to keep all busy to make a living, and no remunerative labor offering to enable them to earn money to pay the annual amount coming due on the large tract of land purchased of the Rotch estate, many of the above-named individuals had sold good farms or homes to raise money for the first payment. Some began to feel discouraged, and, unable to accomplish the object and purpose for which they came together, they gave it up, and the property was sold to Messrs. Duncan, Wales and Skinner, who divided it into farms and town lots, and sold much of it at a good profit, and divided the rest.

"The members of the community scattered in various directions, each pursuing those objects in life most likely to lead him and his to enjoy health, wealth and happiness. Some of the above-named persons still remain in this neighborhood, notwithstanding the wonderful changes that have occurred in the last fifty-four years."

South of the center of the township is the village of Richville, laid out by John Houk, in 1836. Mr. Houk was proud of the title, "the proprietor of Richville," and did what he could to give the village celebrity. It is on the State road running from Canton, southwest to Navarre, in Bethlehem Township, Wilmot, in Sugar Creek and Holmes County.

For sixty-seven years, Perry Township has been an organized political community, occupying a most important position in the fertile valley of the Tuscarawas. East and west of the river, it produces everything that any township produces in an agricultural sense, and its mineral wealth is unequaled by any other township in the Congressional District.

Under the great and enlightened policy that marks Ohio's history, Perry Township must always be in the front rank of the townships of the county, whose boast shall soon be, that she contains within her borders three cities.

CHAPTER XIII.*

THE CITY OF MASSILLON—ITS BIRTH AND GROWTH—A DESTRUCTIVE FIRE—THE BUILDING OF THE CANAL—THE POST OFFICE—EDUCATIONAL—THE UNION SCHOOLS OF MASSILLON—INCORPORATION OF THE TOWN—ITS MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

AS noticed elsewhere, the city of Massillon was laid out as a village in the winter of 1825-26. One of the first lots purchased after the village had "a local habitation and a name" was purchased by Capt. Mayhew Folger and was Lot No. 45, on which now stands the three-story building occupied by Clarence L. McLain, Esq., as a store; this lot was purchased for the purpose of erecting upon it a hotel, and which was built and opened as such on the 4th of February, 1828, by Capt. Folger.

Almost cotemporaneous with that purchase was the purchase of the lot on the southwest corner of Main and Mill, by Jacob Miller, Esq., and the two lots west of it extending to the alley. On the corner lot purchased by Jacob Miller, a building for a hotel was also erected and opened in the autumn of 1827, and occupied by Mr. Miller for many years, when he retired from the business and engaged in merchandising, and was elected one of the Associate Judges of the county, a position he filled until his death in February, 1843. In all the relations of life, Judge Miller commanded the respect of his neighbors; his father, George Miller, is believed to have been the first settler in the Township of Jackson, having erected a cabin on the west side of the Tuscarawas River opposite Millport as early as 1806. Judge Miller lost no time in filling his front, on Main street, with buildings which stood until July, 1853, when a fire swept out the whole square, since which, the lots have been divided and subdivided, until they have gotten into their present shape, forming an important business block.

On the 27th of August, 1851, the entire square, from the northeast corner of Main and Erie streets to the northwest corner of Main and Mill streets, extending north to Plum street, was swept away by the first really destructive fire that occurred in the city. In this fire but a single building escaped on the entire square, and that was the building adjoining the one now occupied by F. Lehman as a book-bindery. The American House, then standing on the corner now occupied by C. L. McLain as an extensive dry goods establishment, and which was kept by Samuel Hawk, late of the St. Nicholas and Windsor Hotels in New York. The store of Messrs. L. & S. Ranson, the dwelling and grocery establishment of N. Sibila, the building on the northwest corner of Main and Mill, where now stands the Park Hotel, as well as all others, went down in the general conflagration, thus removing many of the original landmarks of the village of Massillon. The first dwelling erected within the village limits, and the first occupied after Massillon was known as a village, was the building on the southeast corner of Erie and Oak streets. It was erected by Julius Heydon, out of lumber gotten for a building in Kendal intended to be a home for the family. The rapid indications of growth in Massillon induced the young man to consider whether the new village did not offer inducements to go there and build a home. Accordingly, after considering the possibilities and probabilities, he determined to purchase the above described lot, and did so and paid Mr. Duncan $40 for it, and erected a portion of the building now standing thereon, and known as the Farmers' Hotel.

The first marriage in the village was Julia A., a sister of the proprietor of the building just described, and William M. Folger, now residing at Mantua Station, Portage County.

* Contributed by Robert H. Folger.

This marriage took place on the 18th day of May, 1826, Hon. Gilbertharp Earle, then a Justice of the Peace of Perry Township, officiating. Mrs. Folger died in the city of Akron, on the 5th of October, 1870. The first marriage in Massillon, according to the ceremony of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was that of Herman B. Harris and Louisa M. McClary, the Rev. Mr. Morse, Rector of an Episcopal Church in Steubenville, being the officiating minister. This marriage took place in 1832, in the dwelling now occupied by T. Clark Miller, M. D. Miss McClary was a niece of Mr. Duncan, the daughter of a widowed sister, Mrs. M. H. McClary, one of the pioneer women of Kendal, and of rare accomplishments. She brought a small but well-selected library, which left its impress on the society she aided in building up. Mr. Harris died at sea on his way to California, and Mrs. Harris in this city many years since.

The next building erected in the village as a dwelling-house was the present residence of Hon. S. A. Conrad, now a member of the House of Representatives, in the General Assembly of the State of Ohio. This building was erected by Dr. Beriah Brooks, who was the first physician in the county west of Kendal, and the second west of Canton. Dr. Brooks was from South Hadley, Mass., and a thorough type of the New England Presbyterian. He first settled in Kendal, and as a physician was successful. When Massillon and began to assume the proportions of a village, Dr. Brooks was one of the first to recognize its importance, and at once purchased one of the most eligible lots on Main street. On getting his house habitable, he moved into it, buried his wife from there, and died there himself in 1831.

On the locating of the canal in 1825, and the letting of the building of it in January, 1826, an entirely new and different class of people came into the village. Before these events, Kendal had a little store kept by Ambrose Chapman, and a still smaller one by his brother Aaron, who was a sound, orthodox Quaker, and who had the gift of making money out of his little business. He moved to Morrow County and died. Ambrose died before Massillon sprang into existence. In January, 1826, before the letting of the contracts for the building of the canal, the brothers H. and H. A. Howard, merchants, who had settled the year before in Middlebury, Portage County, furnished a stock of goods to Isaiah Brown, a most enterprising young man from Berkshire County, Mass., which stock he opened as a dry goods store in Kendal, and was successful. He determined at once to go into business in the new village, and made arrangements for a storeroom, which was erected by Isaac Austin, about where now stands the drug store of Ph. Morgenthaler, and there commenced business under the firm of I. Brown & Co., but did not get into their new building until near the close of the year.

The letting of the contracts on the canal took place at Kendal, at the residence of James Duncan, Esq., on the 18th of January, almost contemporaneous with the laying-out of the village of Massillon. Work progressed on the canal rapidly, that portion through the village being done by Jesse Rhodes and Horace E. Spencer; they had two or three more sections of half a mile each, which they completed.

Mr. Duncan and George Wallace, of Brandywine, Portage, now Summit County, built the canal through the stone quarry, on the east side of the canal, between whose work and the village Aaron Chapman had a half mile to build, who, when advised that he had succeeded in getting a "job," advertised for laborers and added at the foot of his advertisement, "Those who cannot work without whisky need not apply." The result was that Aaron employed no whisky drinkers, his half-mile of canal was first finished in 1828, his work was better done, and while the history of the canal lasts, his section will be remembered as one built without whisky. Aaron gave his men hot coffee as a beverage, paid them promptly, and his work tells its own story. Just here the writer desires to say that the aqueduct just this side, north, of Bolivar, was built by the contractor, John Laughery, Esq., in the same way; no intoxicating liquor was allowed on the contract, wet or dry, and there was a preponderance of wet in the construction of an aqueduct to take the canal across the river. No whisky or other intoxicating liquor was used as a beverage in the building of that work. Mr. Laughery, the contractor, was a most worthy man. After finishing his work on the canal in the neighborhood of Massillon, he was largely engaged on the aqueduct across the Scioto River, at Circleville, Pickaway County; from there he went to Adams County, and engaged in fruit culture, and ended a long and useful life.

As the work of building the canal south of the Portage summit progressed, business centered at Massillon, the only important point in the Tuscarawas Valley, north of New Philadelphia, and south of Akron, which is in the Cuyahoga Valley, and as fast as a room could be had it was filled. The first stock of goods opened in the village as a store was that of A. McCulley & Co., who erected a small building, where now stands the establishment of Messrs. P. Dielhenn & Son. This establishment was backed up by Judge William Henry, and did a wonderful business. The Hon. Bezaleel Wells, almost as soon as lots were in market, purchased the block of lots on which now stand the stores of S. Oberlin, G. L. Albrecht, Joseph Coleman, watches and jewelry, the Union National Bank, Joseph Oppenheimer's Star Clothing Store and the First National Bank, and erected a small frame and put in a stock of goods, previous to which they had kept as a store in the east end of the building now occupied by T. Clarke Miller, M. D., the style of the firm being S. O. Wells & Co., Samuel O. Wells being a son of the senior partner. Thus it will be seen that I. Brown & Co., S. O. Wells & Co. and A. McCulley & Co. were first to engage in the business of merchandising in the new village, all of whom had good backing, Messrs. Wells & Dickinson being in the firm of S. O. Wells & Co., Judge Henry in that of A. McCulley & Co. and the brothers H. & H. A. Howard in the firm of I. Brown & Co. Immediately following them came Hiram Johnson, from Middlebury, and business took a start—the town began to grow. In 1828, a malignant fever swept over the Tuscarawas and Cuyahoga Valleys, which baffled the best medical skill that could be had. The Howard brothers fell before it, as did almost all who were attacked. The population along the line of the canal especially was almost decimated; it swept over the country, scarcely missing a house. The necrology of that year records the death of many of the most enterprising citizens. As cold weather came on and the ravages of the disease were stayed, business resumed its wonted character and all kinds of labor found employment.

Still progress was not rapid; there was a full supply for every demand. Within the knowledge of the writer, Capt. Mayhew Folger sold, in 1826, 100 barrels of flour at $2 per barrel. The great change in the entire business relations of the county came, but too late in the season to be felt to any great extent. On the 25th of August, 1828, the Ohio Canal was opened from Akron to Massillon. The first boats that arrived here were the Allen Trimble of the Ohio, Troy & Erie Line, Capt. Z. Mather, and the State of Ohio, of the Farmers' Line, Capt. H. Wheeler. They brought the Acting Commissioners and Engineers and the event was celebrated with bonfires and illuminations at night as it had been by the roaring of cannon during the day. A poem was written for the occasion, a single stanza only of which is remembered, and is in this wise:

"Come give us a bumper and let it run full While we drink to the health of our friend Johnny Bull,
And long may prosperity follow us all,
While water shall run in the Ohio Canawl."

Navigation was thenceforth open between Massillon and the outside world. Warehouses for the storing of produce had already been erected; a system of warehousing, in the nature of a forwarding and commission business was inaugurated, and a new impulse was given to all sorts of enterprises. With the closing of the canal, business closed, and it was not until 1829, that a regular and systematic mode of business could be said to exercise control of the commercial relations of the country just opened to the rest of the world. Massillon was put in communication, by means of canal navigation, with Cleveland, and the world was open to her enterprise; boats continued to arrive and depart during the season of the open canal. In 1829, near the close of navigation, a mercantile firm composed of Hiram B. Wellman and Marshall D. Wellman, by the firm of H. B. & M. D. Wellman, brought a large stock of goods into Massillon. H. B. Wellman had a year or two before opened a law office in Wooster, and M. D. Wellman, who had been a cooper and settled in Wooster, left there and went into the State of Pennsylvania, and went to building canals under State contracts, and succeeded in money-making. These brothers started the firm under the above name. On opening their store in Massillon, they offered "cash for wheat," and advertised the public that they would take all the wheat they could get, and would pay cash; and that was the commencement of the prosperity of Massillon. To the firm of H. B. & M. D. Wellman may be accredited the beginning of the great name that Massillon acquired as the "Wheat City," and which it proudly held until the railroad era noticed hereafter. For twenty-five years Massillon knew no competition nor allowed any competition to cross her path. She purchased and stored wheat, paid the largest prices, and grew more rapidly than any commercial point on the navigable waters of the interior of the State. She never knew what it was to call a halt until the building of the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railway and the numerous other railways which offered transportation to markets with which she cannot nor does compete by means of the canal, so far as the grain traffic is regarded as an important factor in the business of the country.

During the year 1827, a movement was made for the establishing of a post office in the new village; a petition was forwarded to Hon. John McLean, then Postmaster General under President Adams, and to appoint Capt. Folger Postmaster, Kendal then being the post office at which all mail matter was delivered for the county west of Canton—Jackson, Lawrence, Tuscarawas, Sugar Creek and Bethlehem being without any mail facilities. Of course there were rival candidates for the office, but Capt. Folger received the appointment and opened the office in January, 1828; before he moved into the village, his first Assistant Postmaster was Orlando Keyes, a clerk in the store of Hiram Johnson, and where the office was kept until Capt. Folger removed into the village, which—as already noticed—was on the 4th of February, 1828; he then opened the Commercial Inn, and kept it as a hotel until his death on the 1st of September of that year. The first quarterly report from Massillon Post Office, as rendered by Capt. Folger, showed a balance due the Government of 80 cents. On the death of Capt. Folger, his son, William M. Folger, was appointed and held the office until the administration of Gen. Jackson got fairly at work, when Alexander McCulley was appointed, who held the office until 1839, when the late Hon. Mathew Johnson, Jr., was appointed. McCulley's accounts had got into a bad shape, the drafts upon the office were not paid, and McCulley had to surrender at discretion. Mr. Johnson held the office until after the election of "Tippecanoe and Tyler too," when, under the Postmaster Generalship of Hon. Francis Granger, of New York, he surrendered to Dr. Abel Underhill. The Doctor held the office until a few months after the death of Gen. Harrison, President, when the Government became Tylerized, and he was removed to make room for G. W. Williams, a Tyler man. A change of administration put him out and Samuel McCaughey was appointed; he held until another change of the appointing power, when Samuel F. Jones took charge; he held until John Shepley, under another administration, took the office, who was removed to make room for John J. Hofman, who held the place until the late respected Dr. John Schertzer took the office and held it two terms, when Isaac H. Brown, Esq., was appointed and held it to the satisfaction of all who got their matter at the office, when he gave way for the present incumbent, Charles F. Ricks, Esq., whose second term expires early in 1882, and who has rendered entire satisfaction in all respects. The writer of these sketches has witnessed all of the above appointments and changes from 1828 to the present time. From the appointment of Capt. Folger to the latest appointment, he has had an opportunity to express his preference between the applicants.

Capt. Folger was also the first Collector of Canal Tolls for the port of Massillon; at his death, Hon. James Duncan received the appointment for the succession, and held the office many years; after whom, John Everhard, Mathew Macy, John S. Johnson, Judge Thomas Blackburn and others successively held the office; it is now held by David Atwater, Esq.

Prominent among the early business men of the village was the late Hon. John Everhard. He erected the first brick building on the west side of the canal, and opened a store, his firm being J. Everhard & Co. Dr. Thomas Hartford, of Canton, being his partner. Mr. Everhard erected one of the first warehouses for storing wheat that was erected in the city, and which was built on the lot where now stands Beatty's Block. The last mentioned building was built by the Johnson Brothers in 1837, who from 1832 to 1845, were prominent in business circles. Their business was dry goods and commission merchants, produce dealers, and shippers on the canal. The old landmarks in the way of business houses that have stood more than forty years, are the building erected by Gen. Gardner Field, the Farmers' and Mechanics' Block, erected by Hogan & Harris, now owned by Hon. George Harsh, Coleman's Block, northeast corner of Main and Mill streets, and the building at the east end of the canal bridge, south side of Main street. Older, however, than any other building in the city erected after the city was laid out, except the Farmers' Hotel, is the brick building on the west side of the canal, south side of Main street, erected by Judge Everhard. In this connection, it should be remarked that few men among the early settlers of Massillon have left as good a name, or one that will be remembered in greater kindness. Although long years have passed since his death, his name is inseparably connected with Massillon's early history.

The first saddler and harness-maker who opened a shop in the village was Thomas S. Webb, now a resident of the city, and better known as Col. T. S. Webb. Since Col. Webb came to Massillon, fifty-two years have flown, during which period Col. Webb will be remembered as the host of the Franklin House in this city, the Eagle and Union in Philadelphia, the National in New York, and during the Centennial year, two in Philadelphia, after having years before retired. As a hotel keeper, he has achieved a world-wide reputation.

In 1831, 1832 and 1833, the business talent and enterprise of the village was largely augmented by the new firms of Hogan & Harris, Hull & Shepard, A. & P. Vinton, and J. D. & D. R. Atwater. Messrs. Hogan & Harris were agents for the Ohio, Troy & Erie line of canal boats, and did a large forwarding, commission and produce business, going out of business with the changes brought about by the panic of 1837. Messrs. Vinton, as general dry goods merchants and produce dealers, did business in the village for several years, when they removed to Port Washington, Tuscarawas County, where Mr. P. Vinton died, after many years of successful business. Messrs. Heill & Shepard commenced and continued in the produce business also for many years, and erected the first steam flouring mill in the village. The Atwater Brothers continued in the grocery and provision business until 1840, when their firm was dissolved by the death of Mr. J. D. Atwater; the survivor, D. R. Atwater, Esq., continued business until his death, on the 31st of July, 1875, at the age of sixty-eight years. In 1833 also came Dr. Joseph Watson and family, from Dalton, Wayne County. The Doctor at once opened a large drug store, and continued in business until within a few years past, when he disposed of his stock of goods and retired from business and is now quietly enjoying the luxury of

"Blest retirement, friend of life's decline."

The first school opened in Massillon was in 1827, in a building standing on the present corner of Mill and Charles streets, which had been erected by James Duncan, the proprietor, for some other purpose.

"There, in his noisy mansion skilled to rule,
The village master taught his little school."

The village master was a young gentleman who, in the autumn of that year, had left his native home, Berkshire County, Mass., and came west to find employment as a teacher. That young gentleman is now known in Ohio as Hon. Harlow Chapin, of Harmar, Washington Co., Ohio. Perry Township was all included in one district under the law, as prepared by Hon. James W. Lathrop. The Directors were James Duncan, Alexander Johnson and Gilbert Earle. Mr. Duncan was a resident of the village, and Mr. Johnson resided on his farm southwest of the village, and Mr. Earle on his farm northwest. The amount of money which was raised by taxation was not half enough to pay the teacher, and the deficit was made up by voluntary subscriptions by the parents or guardians of the scholars. The School Districts of Perry Township now number ten, each having a good schoolhouse, independent of Massillon Union School, which enumerates 2,461 children entitled to the benefits of the common school fund.

Mr. Chapin had tried in Medina County to obtain a school, but the ground was occupied; he came into Stark County, James F. Leonard being then a School Examiner; under the provisions of the law, although Mr. Chapin was provided with a certificate from Medina, he was not authorized to teach in Stark County until he could produce a certificate from a Stark County Examiner. On making the acquaintance of Mr. Leonard, whom Mr. Chapin found to be a "very kind-hearted man," he obtained the necessary authority to teach in Stark. Armed with the proper authority and encouraged, with but 18 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents, as money was then counted, in his pocket, he arrived at Massillon and at once took lodgings with Jacob Miller, and made known his business. Mr. Miller said a school was needed, and tendered his aid at once, but there was no building suitable—in fact, no building at all.

It would be interesting to narrate the trials and tribulations through which Mr. Chapin passed in order to open a school. Mr. Duncan treated him with habitual kindness, but was "very busy," and referred him to the other Directors, Messrs. Johnson and Earle, who gave little encouragement. The truth was everybody was poor in this world's goods; they were rich in hopes of the developments of the "shadowy future," but they had not learned to wisely improve the present so far as education was concerned; they were men of limited education themselves, consequently had not that appreciation of the necessity to "Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring."

While despair seemed almost to hold Mr. Chapin within its dreaded grasp, he fell in with John Everhard, one of the pioneers of Massillon, a School Examiner, a gentleman of education and refinement—a son of Henry Everhard, a pioneer settler of Plain Township—and who at once interested himself for the young, friendless and penniless teacher. Mr. Everhard, afterward Associate Judge of the Common Pleas Court, went to the Directors and obtained their consent to the opening of a school in the building described, and which is well remembered by the writer as being about twenty feet square. A contract was made, and Mr. Chapin opened the first school in what is now the city of Massillon, the teacher to receive $12 per month and board, which was to be with Mr. Miller, necessarily often referred to in these sketches, and who gave his full influence to the enterprise. All arrangements being made, no time was lost in obtaining and placing the meager stock of furniture for Mr. Chapin's school, which consisted of four long slab benches or seats, without backs, and a sort of sloping shelf on one side of the room for practicing writing, with a large open fire-place on another side capable of receiving cord-wood from which to warm the room, "and all was ready," as Mr. Chapin says, for the first school in Massillon.

Mr. Chapin's first term was such a success that he was immediately employed for a second, at the end of which his school closed with a theatrical exhibition in the ball-room of Judge Miller's Hotel. Mr. Chapin was assisted in his histrionic effort to close his school with eclat, by outside parties, "who with the school acquitted themselves with credit, and elicited praise from a full house."

Mr. Chapin furnishes a most graphic account of his labors in thus starting and closing the first school, and which, did room permit, would cheerfully be given at length; those who recollect the early means of education may make a large draft on their imagination for what he has so kindly written, in aid of Massillon's early history. In naming the early pupils whom he taught in the little building, he gives those of Amelia and Fanny Heydon, the former of whom is now Mrs. Folger of this city, and the latter, Mrs. Finton, wife of Alvin Finton, Esq., an eminent banker and capitalist at New Philadelphia and Dover in Tuscarawas Co., Ohio; James Henry, son of Hon. James Duncan, who died in 1828, an unusually bright young man, whose death was long mourned by his parents and friends; Mary G., daughter of Mr. Duncan, afterward wife of the late Hon. J. L. Reynolds, of Chicago, now residing at Grand Rapids, Mich.; Caroline, also a daughter of Mr. Duncan, afterward Mrs. Wheeler, wife of Hon. H. Wheeler, Jr., Superintendent of the Massillon Rolling Mill Co., by whom she was left a widow in 1841, she subsequently married David J. Ely, Esq., a prominent merchant in New York, and is now a widow enjoying a competence, and residing in the city of her husband's business and residence. Mr. Chapin also mentions George, a son, whose death is noticed elsewhere in these sketches, and Mary and Clarissa Miller, daughters of his patron and friend, Judge Miller; Mary became the wife of Henry Waggoner, and died in Cincinnati, and Clarissa, by her second marriage, is the widow of the late Dr. J. P. Barrick, her first husband being Pomroy Baldwin, Esq. Mrs. Folger and Mrs. Barrick are the last of Mr. Chapin's scholars now residing in this city.

After Mr. Chapin concluded his teaching, he went into the service of the State as engineer on the Ohio Canal; thence as contractor on the Muskingum improvements. He married Hannah, daughter of Gilbertharp Earle, Esq., and has lived in Harmar many years. He represented Washington County in the Constitutional Convention of 1873, and life-long has sustained a position commanding the respect and esteem of the people of the State.

Mr. Chapin's school was followed by many teachers, men and women, and among those ever ready to aid in the cause of education were Judge Miller, Hon. Arvine Wales and the late Dr. William Bowen. Dr. Bowen became a resident of this city before the organization of the Union School, and remained here until it was in successful operation, when he removed to Akron, where his useful life closed a few years ago, at the age of seventy years. Since Mr. Chapin closed his school at Massillon, he seems to have abandoned the profession of a teacher, educated as a civil engineer, and succeeding in getting positions more to his taste than teaching; he has not, since leaving Massillon, accepted any of the numerous positions as an educator that have been within his reach. His failure to follow a business for which he was so well qualified by nature and education is to be regretted, as his labors as a teacher in this city will ever be kindly remembered. To attempt to enumerate those who have followed him in this city, between the time of his teaching until the organization of the Union School, now the pride of the city, would be a hopeless task. It cannot, however, be said of him, as of him of Sweet Auburn—

"But past is all his fame; the very spot, Where many a time he triumphed is forgot."

On the contrary, he will be ever gratefully remembered by his surviving pupils, and the spot where stood the old schoolhouse will not be permitted to be lost "in memory's waste."

The influence left by Mr. Chapin's school continued to live and thrive. The people of Massillon, young as was their village, felt the importance of education. They realized that England's Lord Chancellor, who defended Queen Caroline, uttered a great truth when he said, "The schoolmaster is abroad," and that "the schoolmaster is greater than the soldier." Mr. Chapin was succeeded by many teachers; the names of but few are remembered. John Mark, Brice S. Hunter, Wallace and Miss Grosvenor are, however, among those whose names as teachers deserve mention.

When Messrs. Duncan, Wales and Skinner purchased the real estate of the "Kendal Community," they laid out a portion of it into lots as an addition to the village, and named it Duncan, Wales & Skinner's Addition. This was in 1832. They donated a square containing near two acres for "literary purposes." The first use to which this donation was put, was by a Mr. Wallace, whose Christian name is not remembered; he taught for some time successfully, but it was not until 1848 that Massillon Union Schools were organized and in successful operation. In 1847, a plan of a union school was gotten up by William Bowen, M. D., who with Arvine Wales and Charles London, were elected Directors. The plan of a building was fixed upon, and on the 21st of February, 1848, the General Assembly of the State of Ohio passed "An act entitled, an act to incorporate School District Number One, in Perry Township, Stark County, Ohio." Under that act, the Board of Directors organized by electing Charles London, President; Arvine Wales, Treasurer; and William Bowen, Secretary. Of that first Board of Directors of Massillon Union School, Charles London is the sole survivor, a firm friend of education, honored and respected wherever he is known. On perfecting their organization, the Board appointed Philander Dawley (who at that time was Superintendent of the Charity School of Kendal) George Miller and Kent Jarvis, Esqs., examiners for the district, to serve three years, two years and one year in the order named. The teachers employed for the year were Lorin Andrews, Superintendent and Principal, salary $800; Miss Betsey M. Cowles, $300 and board paid; Miss Jane M. Becket, $300; Charles R. Shreve, $200; Mary Ann Russell, $225; and Sarah J. Hoxworth, $140. In 1849, the corps of teachers was increased by the addition of Miss Sarah C. Pearce and Mr. Frederick Loeffler, teacher of German and Music. This year the first catalogue was published and among the pupils in the high school is found the name of W. B. Hazen, Hiram, Portage County, now Gen. W. B. Hazen, U. S. Army and Chief of the Signal Service. He left Massillon in 1850, and was appointed to the U. S. Military Academy that year or the next, graduated after the usual course of study, and has served in the U. S. Army with distinction ever since.

Mr. Andrews resigned in 1852 to accept the Presidency of Kenyon College, at Gambier, Knox County, Ohio, where he remained until the breaking-out of the war of the rebellion, when he resigned and entered the army; was appointed Colonel of the Fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and died in the service.

The Union School of Massillon, was opened in a plain substantial brick building, erected on the lot donated by Messrs. Duncan, Wales & Skinner, by the board already named, and it must be said of the board, they builded as well as they knew. They had no experience in building or furnishing such houses as are now required by the Union Schools of Ohio. The building stood for thirty years, when it yielded to the unchangeable law of change which always enforces obedience, and in its place stands the grandest structure in Ohio, finished in 1879 at a cost, including heating apparatus, seats, an additional square of land purchased on the north of the school building, outbuildings, well and cistern and grading of the new lot, of $48,000, imposing a tax cheerfully borne by the district. The board who erected the building and watched its progress with characteristic fidelity were Henry Beatty, John R. Dangler, J. E. Brown, J. G. Warwick, James H. Justus, W. B. Humberger, S. A. Conrad and Dr. J. P. Barrick. Messrs. Conrad and Humberger have served as members of the board nine and eight years respectively. Dr. Barrick did not live to witness the completion of a work to which he faithfully devoted his careful attention.

Of the many Boards of Education that have been elected for the Union Schools of Massillon, the following gentlemen are conspicuous. The first Board entire, Arvine Wales served until his death, January 1, 1854. Dr. Bowen, for his devotion to the cause of education, as does citizen Charles London, deserves especial mention. Hon. Arvine C. Wales has served thirteen years. Hon. George Harsh was elected in 1851 and served until 1869, the full period of eighteen years, when in consequence of failing health, he declined a seventh election. No village or city in Ohio has been more favored in its selection of wise and prudent men for its school boards, than has the city of Massillon. By a vote of the citizens, and according to the provisions of the amended school law, the number of members of the Board was increased from three to six and the following gentlemen were elected. Hon. Kent Jarvis, S. A. Conrad, James H. Justus, Warren C. Richards, Frank L. Baldwin and William B. Humberger. Messrs. Jarvis and Richards, both of whom were for many years identified with the public service, holding offices of trust, the duties of which they always faithfully discharged, are dead.

After the resignation of Mr. Andrews, Hon. Thomas W. Harvey, late State School Commissioner, was appointed Superintendent and held the place fourteen years, his term of service closing in July, 1865. He was succeeded by Professor Joseph Kimball, who remained until 1869, when Prof. E. A. Jones served for four years, until 1873. Mr. Jones then declining a re-election, D. P. Pratt was called to the superintendency and remained from 1873 to 1875, when Mr. Jones was again tendered the position and accepted and remains at the head of the schools.

Among the teachers who have served long and faithfully should be named Miss Jane M. Becket, ten years in the high school, Miss Nancy Stone, in the different departments, including the high school, fourteen years, both of whom are well known in Ohio as teachers and as having occupied important positions as educators. Miss Sarah J. Hoxworth began as a teacher in the primary when the school was first organized, and served in the different departments until 1872, when she resigned her position in the high school, having taught more than twenty-three years in the same building. Miss Sallie Brannan was connected with the schools as teacher thirteen years, and is now teaching in the same building. Miss Temperance Dunn and Miss Sarah R. Folger, ten years each. Miss Dunn is not now living and Miss Folger holds a prominent position in the "Mann" High School, at Toledo, where she has taught many years since leaving the high school here. For nine years last past Mrs. L. D. Pinney has been Principal in the high school, where her labors have been distinguished by marked success. The Union Schools of Massillon, whether considered in the past or present, need no praise from the historian. For the third of a century, they have been making their own history, and have written it ineffaceably upon the character of the scholars. Young men and women who have graduated there and become teachers, entered the learned professions, graduated at the U. S. Military and Naval Academies, and have arisen to honorable distinction, and some are achieving honorable distinction in the service of the State and United States.

During that long period the school has taken no steps backward. Under the present as well as the past management of the Board of Education and teachers its march will be as it has been onward to greater improvement and greater excellence. Its present Board of Education is composed of the following gentlemen: John G. Warwick, Silas A. Conrad, Henry Beatty, William B. Humberger, William H. Justus and John R. Dangler.

The following is the corps of teachers: Superintendent, Prof. E. A. Jones; Principal High School, Mrs. L. D. Pinney; Assistant, Miss Cassie Reamer; Grammar School, Mr. John Ellis, Miss Emily Brainard, Miss Mary Dieter, Mr. Jacob Graybill and Mrs. Laura Taylor; Secondary, Miss Susie Graybill, Miss Mary Merwin, Miss Ella Hershey, Miss Laura Ware, Miss Viola Pepper; Primary, Miss Rachel Elsass, Miss Sallie Brannan, Miss Bell Willison, Miss Lillian Ulman, Miss Reilly, Miss Ada Hollinger, Miss Louisa Strobel and Mrs. C. Moore; German, Mr. Philip Wilhelm; Music, Prof. Whelpton.

In 1838, when Hon. Matthew Johnson was a member of the House of Representatives in the State Legislature, an act of incorporation for the town of Massillon was obtained, and an organization was had which lasted until 1845, when in answer to numerous petitions the act was repealed, and Massillon was not known as a municipal incorporation until 1853, when under the provisions of the general act regulating towns and cities, it was again incorporated, and at the first election, held on the 28th day of May, 1853, being the first election under the proceedings to incorporate the village, Samuel Pease was elected Mayor, G. W. Williams, Recorder and Hiram B. Wellman, Isaac H. Brown, Thomas McCullough, Valentine S. Buckius and Warren C. Richards, Trustees, and they constituted the Council of the incorporated village of Massillon. On the 31st of May next succeeding the election, the persons above named met at the office of H. B. Wellman, and were duly sworn according to law by Robert H. Folger, Justice of the Peace, and the Council of the incorporated village was organized in due form of law, which organization continued until the 17th of March, 1868, when by act of R. B.

Hayes, Governor, J. H. Goodman, Auditor and John Russell, Secretary, of the State of Ohio, it was advanced to a city of the second class, the preliminary steps to effect the change from a village to a city having been commenced on the 12th of February of that year, in accordance with a numerous petition of the citizens, which petition was referred to Robert H. Folger, attorney at law, with instructions to take the necessary steps to procure the advancement. Upon the advancement being effected, the city was divided into four wards, and at the election in April, 1868, the following persons were elected to the several city offices:

Mayor, Bennet B. Warner; Marshal, Milo Alden; Solicitor, Louis K. Campbell. Council—George L. Russell, Charles London, First Ward; Jacob Herring, Francis Willenburg, Second Ward; Adam Mong, Otis G. Madison, Third Ward; Louis Gies, George Bollinger, Fourth Ward. David W. Huntsman was elected Clerk by the Council. The following gentlemen are charged with the business matters of the city:

Mayor, L. C. Cole; Marshal, Frederick Paul; Street Commissioner, Louis Limbach; Treasurer, Hermann Shaidnagle; Solicitor, Otto E. Young. Council—James H. McLain, George Snyder, First Ward; Thomas Lavier, Jonas Sutz, Second Ward; Conrad N. Oberlin, Francis Willenburg, Third Ward; Anton Bamberger, Joseph Dressler, Fourth Ward.

The disasters connected with the old corporation of Massillon—that of 1838—have been carefully avoided by the late ones. The city owes no debts, and while it is constantly progressing, and is the soundest municipal incorporation in the State, its maxim is "hasten gently." It is able to borrow money on long loans at five per centum. It has never adopted the plan of running into debt for the purpose of making improvements, preferring to see its growth forced by the natural course of events.

For beauty of natural surroundings it is unsurpassed. "I would not have the hills surrounding Massillon leveled if I could," said Mr. Duncan, the proprietor of the village, in reply to a friend who objected to the location because of its hilly surroundings. "The day will come," said he, "when those hills will be covered with residences overlooking the city, to which the hills will but add beauty, and Massillon will be celebrated for its beauty."

What was then regarded as a wild creation of Mr. Duncan's fancy has grown into a beautiful reality, and vindicates his judgment as to what the future would develop.

In 1831, Judge Henry laid out an addition to the original plat, and called it West Massillon. That portion of the city is now included in the Second and Third Wards, and is a most important part of the city. On that tract, the south end of fractional Section 6, and formerly in Tuscarawas Township, is located that portion of the Cleveland, Tuscarawas Valley & Wheeling Railway, the buildings of which corporation stand on the ground where stood the cabin of Judge Henry, and where he first had his home. It was in that cabin that his daughter, afterward Mrs. Cummins, was born, and who was the first white female child born on the territory known as the New Purchase, the first male child being a son of Peter Slusser; he was born on the territory now included within the limits of Tuscarawas.

The only item of a pre-historic character that has been developed in Massillon occurred in 1832, when Christian Witt, from Lower Alsace, and some fellow-laborers by the name of Miller and Simmons, while ditching what was then the swamp south of the village, and near where now stands the paper mill, found two tusks of a mammoth, each eleven feet in length and twenty-seven inches in circumference at the larger end. They were justly regarded as a great affair. The finders concluded that there was money, if not millions in it, and arranged for traveling and exhibiting them. They employed an agent to manage the business, and Witt went to Pittsburgh with the party, when he became satisfied that there was not so much in it as he had supposed, and came home, leaving Miller, Simmons and the agent to make the most of the "show business." They went to Philadelphia where they left the tusks and came home. Similar discoveries have been made in the Tuscarawas Valley, but with the finding all information in regard to them ceased. Indian relics have been found in various parts of the township, but nothing of an uncommon character.

On the obtaining by the Government of the United States the title to the New Purchase, by the treaty of Fort Industry the tribes named in the treaty departed toward the setting sun, and few remained on the coming of the pale faces. In the language of Ossian "The chiefs of other times are departed. They have gone without their fame. Another race has arisen. The people are like the waves of the ocean; like the leaves of woody Morven, they pass away in the whistling blast, and other leaves lift their green heads on high."

CHAPTER XIV.*

THE CITY OF MASSILLON—MANUFACTURING INTERESTS—RUSSELL & COMPANY'S WORKS—THE MASSILLON IRON COMPANY—OTHER INDUSTRIES—COAL INTERESTS—RAILROADS OF MASSILLON—THE BANKING BUSINESS, ETC.

"Harness me down with your iron bands."
—Cutter.

IN 1832, in the presence of the writer, a casual conversation on the subject of manufacturing pig iron sprang up between Jesse Rhodes and James Duncan, the result of which was the taking of immediate measures to erect a blast furnace at or near the village of Massillon. Mr. Rhodes had been in the employ of Laird, Norton & Co., proprietors of Congress furnace, and had acquired a considerable knowledge on the subject of manufacturing pig and iron castings.

* Contributed by Robert H. Folger.

The Massillon Iron Company was formed, consisting of James Duncan, Joseph G. Hogan, Herman B. Harris and Jesse Rhodes. The business was not, however, confined to the making of pig iron. Castings of all kinds were made—the old-fashioned ten plate stove—specimens of which can be found in the county, and all other kinds of ironware, now only made at foundries, including tea kettles, sugar kettles, and, in short, everything under the general nomenclature of "castings." The furnace was erected and put in operation in 1833, on the west bank of Sippo Creek, south of Main street, near the present eastern limits of the city, where some marks of its having stood can yet be found. The Massillon Iron Company stopped business in 1838, when Messrs. Hart & Brown bought out the company, the furnace was abandoned. Messrs. Hart & Brown purchased the patterns and other stock requisite for a foundry and machine-shop, and started the first foundry in the county, in January, 1839, in a three-story stone building, which stood where now stands the main building of the Excelsior Works. That building was burned in 1840, and was the first fire of any magnitude in the village. When burned, it was occupied by Hart & Brown as a machine-shop; McMillan, Partridge & Co.; as a manufactory of all sorts of machinery for woolen mills; John H. Wheeler, carpets, and John Hartness, window sashes, blinds and doors. The brick building, lately occupied by the Excelsior Works, was built in 1843. Messrs. Hart & Brown went out of business in 1858. Of all the persons named in the foregoing article, Mr. Brown alone remains in this city. Mr. Hartness resides in Cleveland, and the rest are, some of them dead, and some scattered over the Western States.

The first of the followers of St. Crispin, who was, and still is, at the head of his profession as in Massillon's early days, was Col. Benjamin Raser. He is one of Massillon's earliest citizens, having come into the county in 1825, and to the little village as soon as it obtained a place in history. In the earlier and better days of this city's history, when some attention was paid to the organizing and disciplining of the militia, Mr. Raser was elected Colonel of a regiment in the Third Brigade and Sixth Division of Ohio Militia, and came near being called into active service in the long-time-ago unpleasantness between Ohio and her loving sister Michigan.

Col. Raser and his excellent wife, a daughter of Griffith Cooper, one of Perry Township's pioneers, celebrated their golden wedding a few months since.

The first carpenter in the village, and who became a property holder immediately on the lots coming into market, was Hamilton Sherer. The property he purchased is now held by his heirs, and is valuable.

The great and crowning glory of Massillon industries is the mammoth establishment of Russell & Co., manufacturers of the celebrated Massillon threshers, horse-powers, etc. It was started on the 1st of January, 1842, consequently antedates all other manufacturing establishments of a similar kind now in Stark County. At the date above given, three brothers—Charles M., Nahum S. and Clement—carpenters by trade, formed a partnership in Massillon, under the style of C. M. Russell & Co., for the manufacture of threshers and horse-powers, in connection with their business as architects and builders. Their capital stock was $1,500, with which they began work forty years ago. The senior partner had seen and carefully examined the Pitts Buffalo Separator, which had already been constructed and in use, and on that examination Mr. Russell believed that he saw where improvements might be made, and with characteristic energy set about trying to make it better, and so succeeded that the improved machine took the premium at the Ohio State Fair at Columbus in 1845.

Thus encouraged, the new firm pushed ahead, sparing no effort, and met with continued encouragement in their progress. They continued to improve all their machinery, and led all competitors in the race for popularity. When the far-reaching influence of what is now the great railway system of the Western Continent reached Massillon in 1847, the firm of C. M. Russell & Co. at once gave it their influence. As the history of the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad attests, they took stock, the elder Mr. Russell was a contractor who built large portions of the road, and with all their other business, built cars for freight and passengers. After the road was opened to Massillon, Mr. C. M. Russell was elected a director, which place he held by successive re-elections until his death in February, 1860, which made a break in the business of the firm, which had gone on uninterruptedly for eighteen years. The death of the senior partner dissolved the firm of C. M. Russell & Co., and the survivors immediately re-organized by the name and style of N. S. & C. Russell, which continued until January 1, 1864, when the brothers Joseph K., Thomas H. and George L. Russell purchased an interest and were admitted as partners, and the firm name changed to Russell & Co., which it still bears. One year later, W. K. Miller and Thomas H. Williams, Esqs., were admitted to membership in the firm.

In 1857, Mr. Miller perfected and patented the Peerless, originally called the Russell Mower and Reaper, and this successful machine was manufactured by Russell & Co. up to 1871. In the spring of that year, the "Peerless" was sold to C. Russell & Co., of Canton, and its production transferred to that city, Mr. Miller withdrawing to take the superintendency of the Canton establishment. Prior to 1865, the shops were located on Erie street, between Tremont and South, north of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway, but the business having outgrown their producing facilities, at this time the firm decided to erect more commodious and convenient buildings just south of the railway. Accordingly, in 1864-65, the present extensive and substantial buildings were put up and equipped with improved machinery, tools, and every convenience requisite to the rapid and economical manufacture of their increasingly popular products. In the summer of 1868, Mr. T. H. Williams retired from the firm. In December, 1871, Mr. Allen A. Russell, the youngest brother, and Alanson A. Rawson, since deceased, a nephew of the brothers Russell, became members. On the 1st of January, 1878, the firm was dissolved by mutual consent, Mr. Clement Russell, one of the original members, retiring, and has since had no connection with the house.

On the 17th of May, 1878, just as they were fairly under way for the season's business, fire destroyed all their iron working machinery, wagon stock and thirty-six years' accumulation of patterns, the latter having cost not less than $75,000, and throwing 250 men out of employment. The entire south wing and one-half of the Erie street front of the main building, were destroyed, involving a loss, exclusive of that in patterns, of $75,000. The whole amount of insurance realized was $53,100. Many of the valuable patterns could never be replaced, and the net loss by the disaster was estimated at $50,000. The fire broke out soon after 1 o'clock, A. M., and had it not been for the almost superhuman exertions of the fire department, aided by citizens, the entire works would have been destroyed. Fortunately about two-thirds of the main building was saved. At daylight the next morning seventy men were set to work on the ruins, and two of the partners started, one East and the other West, to procure machinery to replace that destroyed. Such promptitude and pluck are characteristic of the enterprise of the firm. By the kindness of C. Aultman, Esq., of Canton, and Capt. J.

H. Kauke, of Wooster, machinery which they had in charge as assignees, was promptly loaned to the firm until new machinery could be procured. Gas was put into the works and a supplementary engine attached to run the foundry; so that just one week from the time of the fire they were running the iron department double time to make up for lost time, and within thirty days were turning out their full complement of machines. The Erie street front was rebuilt during that summer, and in order to make more room in the works, the office was removed, and the present elegant and spacious two-story office building was erected the same year, and, in the winter of 1880-81, erected a four-story new brick warehouse 250 feet in length.

In the fall of 1878, Russell & Co., under the general law of Ohio, without a change of style, became an incorporated body. The corporators were J. E. McLain, N. S. Russell, J. K. Russell, T. H. Russell, G. L. Russell, A. A. Russell and J. W. McClymonds. Capital stock, $500,000. The first election resulted in the selection of Nahum S. Russell, President; J. W. McClymonds, Secretary and Treasurer; T. H. Russell, Superintendent; since which they have created the office of Assistant Secretary and Treasurer, to which position Mr. C. M. Russell has been elected. The works have been repeatedly enlarged and improved until they now comprise one of the largest and most complete manufacturing establishments on the Western Continent. The premises have an area of about seven acres. A convenient side-track connecting with all the railroads runs alongside the shops with excellent facilities for receiving materials and shipping products. The works are splendidly equipped with every mechanical appliance calculated to expedite manufacturing operations and processes, thus reducing to the minimum the cost of production, and enabling Messrs. Russell & Co. to place upon the market their superior machines at figures which defy competition. The entire establishment in all its parts is governed by a perfect system and discipline. The several departments are under the watchful and vigilant care of practical members of the company, who see to it that nothing in the way of labor or material is neglected or executed in any unworkmanlike manner. Mr. Thomas H. Russell is charged with the general superintendency of the establishment. Mr. Joseph K. Russell has the purchasing of the lumber and the general management of the wood-working department. Mr. George L. Russell has charge of the metal-working department. Mr. Allen A. Russell has supervision of the finished machines and territorial agencies, several hundred in number. His residence is in Indianapolis.

Russell & Co. have branch houses at Indianapolis, Ind., Mr. G. W. Harbaugh, manager; Council Bluffs, Iowa, Mr. V. S. Russell, manager; St. Joseph, Mo., Mr. George O. Richardson, manager; Dallas, Tex., Mr. F. R. Rowley, manager; McGregor, Iowa, Mr. G. W. Prim, manager. The number of workmen employed in all departments is 425, whose monthly wages exceed $18,000. The aggregate product of their extensive establishment approximates $1,500,000. A description of the different kinds of work manufactured by Messrs. Russell & Co., does not come within the scope and design of this work. It is sufficient to say that they invite competition. They are the only establishment that has taken hold of the threshing machine business in the city of Massillon and reduced it almost to an exact science, their labors are rewarded by a market for their products all over the United States and Territories, Germany, Russia, South America, Australia and New Zealand.

While the old firm of C. M. Russell & Co. were not the first to engage in the building of threshing machines, they were first to see what the business could be brought to by care and attention. The first machines that were built in Massillon were called the "Pitts Separator," and were introduced by H. D. Jameson, from Rochester, N. Y.; he built 100 in one year, in 1838 or 1839, when his works were closed by his sudden death. Messrs. Knapp & McLain embarked in the business about the same time, but did not continue.

The making of pig iron received little or no attention until 1853, when the late M. D. Wellman conceived the idea that that branch of industry could be successfully carried on here, and by subscriptions of money added to his own capital, which had become much impaired by unsuccessful ventures, he erected the furnace lately torn down to make room for the glass-works now about to be erected, and which was a success as a manufactory of pig-iron, and a source of wealth to the owners. During much of the time that it had an existence, the fluctuations of business after it had passed out of Mr. Wellman's hands, ruined the iron manufacturers, and the "Massillon Furnace" passed out of existence, and as incidentally noticed above, in its place is to be glass-works. In 1855, Messrs. Hiram B. Wellman, James S. Kelley and others seeing the success of the Massillon Furnace, as it was called, determined to build another, and accordingly the Volcano Iron Company was incorporated under the general law of Ohio, and went into operation. It was a failure, and made bankrupt many of the stockholders, was sold, and is now owned by the Volcano Furnace Company, the principal stockholders of which are James Lee, Esq., and Hon. Anthony Howells, late Treasurer of the State of Ohio, under whose judicious management it promises success. As this work goes to press a new enterprise for the Tuscarawas Valley and the city of Massillon, in the shape of glass works for which Massillon affords abundant facilities, is fully inaugurated with ample capital, skill and experience on the part of the proprietors.

Inside of the city limits are the Merchant Flouring Mills: Messrs. Warwick & Justus, and Isaac N. Doxsee, in the Sippo Valley; Messrs. Kitchen & Sons, on Tremont street, west of the Tuscarawas River, on the line of the C., T. V. & Wheeling Railway; McLain Brothers, on Exchange street, in the heart of the city; A. A. Taylor, Esq., on North Erie street, and George Heppert, on the northwestern boundary of the Third Ward. Messrs. Kitchen, McLain Brothers and Taylor use steam exclusively, while the rest use steam and water. Just above the city limits is the Crystal Spring Mill, also owned and run by the McLain Brothers, making seven extensive flouring mills in and near the city; and which, if they are not already, can be put within call of each other by telephone, and which consume more wheat annually than was ever consumed or purchased during the busiest days of the wheat city. Independent of the great coal interests of the city, Massillon supports more than fifty establishments of various kinds, manufacturing, commercial and industrial, and in addition to those above enumerated, including an extensive paper mill, under the general management of C. T. Bicknell, Esq., also foundries and machine-shops, each carrying on a healthy and paying business. Its stone quarries within and just outside the city limits are a great source of revenue, and furnish employment to all who want work. A sale of the stock in trade and fixtures of a single one of these establishments, in the early part of June, in the present year, for $35,000, exhibits the importance of that branch of trade in this city.

The formation of the Massillon Iron Company, which was a voluntary association of individuals, was followed by the obtaining of a charter for the Massillon Rolling Mill Company from the Ohio Legislature; and but for the panic of 1837, would have given the place a start in manufactures that would have made it one of the most important manufacturing points in the State. The charter was extremely liberal. The capital stock named in the charter was $600,000, the company having power to do anything but a banking business. It invested a large amount in real estate, city lots and farms; and, under the pressure of the panic referred to already, sunk all the capital subscribed. The stockholders, most of whom resided in Boston, became discouraged, and the Massillon Rolling Mill Company, of which James Duncan was President, and H. Wheeler, Jr., Superintendent, is now only remembered in the description of premises where the "Massillon Rolling Mill Company's alteration and subdivision of certain lots in the city of Massillon" forms a part.

The coal interest alone in Massillon is represented by $840,000 of capital invested by the following-named persons and companies: Camp Creek Mine, O. Young & Co., $80,000; Pigeon Run, Pigeon Run Coal Company, composed of Hon. John G. Warwick, Hon. Anthony Howells and James Lee, Esq., Massillon, and Hon. W. S. Streator, Cleveland; capital, $80,000. Warmington Coal Company, Messrs. Robert Rhodes & James Rhodes, sons and successors of the late Hon. D. P. Rhodes, Mark A. Hanna and George Warmington, Esqs., Capt. Henry Foltz and Hon. J. G. Warwick; capital, $80,000. The Grove Coal Company, first organized under that name and style by Charles H. Clarke and Orlando Grove. This company and its extensive mines have been merged in a syndicate able to command all the capital required. The amount of capital at present invested is about $60,000. The Massillon City Coal Company, composed of Capt. Henry Foltz, the Nestor of all coal operators in the Tuscarawas and Newman's Creek Valleys, and James F. Pocock, Esq. This well-known company commands all the capital it needs, and its operations are extensive, extending into Tuscarawas County. The Sippo Coal Company, an incorporated company, Hon. Clement Russell President, and Milton Wilson, Esq., Secretary and Treasurer. These gentlemen are the principal stockholders; capital invested, $60,000. The Willow Bank Coal Company: This company operates through a slope and shaft, and have a capital invested of $60,000. The Mountain Mine: This is a most extensive organization, and has invested $80,000. The Ground Hog, $40,000. The Ridgeway Coal Company: The nominal capital of this company is $60,000; but commands all the capital required for its extensive operations. It is under the management of J. P. Burton, Esq., one of the most energetic operators in the Tuscarawas Valley. The Oak Hill Coal Mine is under the general management of James Neall, Esq., and is owned by him, John Albright and others. Its capital invested is $40,000.

The above mines give steady employment to at least fifteen hundred persons, operatives of all kinds, inside and outside of the mines, and make Massillon a shipping point, in connection with the other industries of the city, from which a greater tonnage is shipped than from any other railroad center in the interior of the State.

In 1831, when Capt. James Allen was a member of the House of Representatives in the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, an act was passed incorporating the Massillon & Pittsburgh Railroad Company. The necessary reconnaissance was made by a corps of engineers, at the head of which was Lieut. O. M. Mitchell, just then graduated from the United States Military Academy at West Point, and a member of the United States Topographical Corps. In those piping times of peace, Lieut. Mitchell resigned his position in the United States Army, and cultivated the arts of peace, and became a resident of Cincinnati. At the breaking-out of the war of the rebellion, he tendered his services to the Government, which were accepted, and while in command of the Tenth Army Corps, with the rank of Major General, he died on the 30th of October, 1862, at Beaufort, South Carolina.

Lieut. Mitchell made his surveys, and reported it impracticable to construct a railroad from this city to Pittsburgh, and the project was abandoned. The charter of the road and the names of the corporators will be found in the Local Laws, 29 Sess. Gen. Ass. The names of James Duncan and Charles K. Skinner, always connected with every improvement, were first, and could the road have been a success, would have reaped the benefit of their enterprise, as would Massillon.

The fact that the line between Massillon and Pittsburgh was deemed impracticable for the construction of a railroad, and that twenty-two years later a railway was opened between these two points, known as the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad, is suggestive of the fact that

"New occasions teach new duties, and that Time makes ancient good uncouth."

In 1846, the year of the great wheat crop in Ohio, it became apparent that new and more rapid outlets and greater facilities for getting Western produce to the seaboard must be had, and Massillon, always first to move in those enterprises, had a small meeting at the law office of Gen. Dwight Jarvis, and he and Charles K. Skinner, Esq., were appointed a committee to visit Pittsburgh, and with statistics of the business of Massillon, to go before the Board of Trade and show the extent of the resources of this great producing region. The committee went, made known their business. The Board of Trade and the Councils of Pittsburgh and Allegheny listened to them, and were surprised. They, the City Councils and Board of Trade, at once determined to give the subject attention, but having the Great Central Pennsylvania Railroad under consideration, western connections with Pittsburgh were permitted to rest. Massillon became impatient, called another meeting, and added to the old committee Hon. David K. Cartter, then a distinguished member of the Stark County bar, and these gentlemen went again to Pittsburgh, and through the late Hon. Andrew W. Loomis, another meeting of the Board of Trade and of the Councils of Pittsburgh and Allegheny was called, and the matter of Western railway connections with Pittsburgh was presented by Mr. Loomis, in a most able speech, which he concluded by introducing Hon. D. K. Cartter, the additional member of the committee. The committee had learned before the meeting that Pittsburgh and Allegheny were not disposed to favor the enterprise, and were, if not discouraged, a little disheartened.

Mr. Cartter, however, on being introduced, said he "should not undertake to present the advantages that would accrue not only to Pittsburgh and Allegheny, but to the whole State of Pennsylvania, and especially Philadelphia. That matter," said Mr. Cartter, "was presented to you in detail a few weeks since by the gentlemen now with me, and they may reproduce it at this meeting if they choose. For myself, I have come to deal in practical matters, and to serve a notice on you, gentlemen composing the Board of Trade of the City of Pittsburgh and the Councils of Pittsburgh and Allegheny, that we out West, comprising the backbone, not only of Ohio but of the Western Continent, mean business. A road is to be built from this city through Massillon to Chicago, and in its construction you must either fish or cut bait; now take your choice. We are going home, and are going into this business at once. If you can take some immediate measures indicating that you are really awake, we can wait, and shall be glad to bear to our people the tidings that you are with us; but, gentlemen, you must accept the alternative I have presented."

The speech from which the above extract is taken was made thirty-four years since, and is a specimen of the impetuosity of Mr. Cartter's character at middle life, and its effect may be well imagined. The Councils and Board of Trade started up, rubbed their eyes, and asked, "Where is Massillon?" "Who is this fellow that talks to us in this wise?" They finally concluded that it would be well to give the subject attention, but they delayed until Massillon became impatient, and called a meeting to be held at Massillon in November, 1847. The meeting was largely attended from Philadelphia, extending westward to the west line of Ohio. Hon. William D. Merrick was chosen President, and active measures were taken, which resulted in the obtaining of a charter for the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad, and which was opened to this city in 1853. The Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad extended to Crestline and there connected with the Ohio & Indiana, which made the link to Fort Wayne, and the Fort Wayne & Chicago thence to Chicago completed the great chain of railway communication from Philadelphia to Chicago, and was the first railroad through this city. In 1869, the Massillon & Cleveland Railway Company built the road from Massillon to Clinton, thirteen miles in length, which connects this city with the Cleveland & Mount Vernon Railway, and which affords a direct connection between Massillon and Cleveland. In 1871, the Cleveland, Tuscarawas Valley & Wheeling Railway Company was formed and built the railroad of that name, passing through Massillon to Wheeling, and as this work goes to press, the Wheeling, & Lake Erie Railway, which connects the cities of Toledo and Wheeling, making Massillon a point on its line, is rapidly advancing to completion, and when completed places this city in a direct connection with the city of Baltimore, via Wheeling and the Baltimore & Ohio Railway, and the West and Northwest, by way of Toledo, also on a direct line. The railway connections of the city are surpassed by none in any section of the State by direct lines in all directions. A more detailed history however is found in a preceding chapter of this work.

In 1833, while Hon. David A. Starkweather and Hon. Jehu Brown represented Stark County in the House of Representatives, and Hon. Matthias Sheplar in the Senate, the Bank of Massillon was chartered with a capital of $200,000, and which was the second bank of discount and deposit in the county. The Farmers' Bank of Canton having been chartered in 1816. The new bank started out successfully, its stock was taken, much of it at home, some at Troy, in the State of New York. On the 1st of October, 1834, the bank went into operation, its banking room being on the second floor of Hogan & Harris' Block on Main street. Its first officers were James Duncan, President, and J. D. W. Calder, Cashier. Mr. Calder was from Troy, and represented the Troy stock. It soon became apparent that there was a want of harmony between the Cashier and President, which finally culminated in a third party, the Dwights of New York and Massachusetts purchasing a controlling interest in the stock, which was done on the 9th of July, 1835, one of the Directors being actively engaged in the purchase, 150 per centum premium on the amount paid in being freely paid. The Calder party in the board resigned, and their places were filled by friends of the new regime. The Cashier resigned, and Parker Handy, Esq., of Cleveland, was elected in his place. Mr. Duncan, the President, also resigned, and Augustus Baldwin, Esq., of Hudson, was chosen to fill that vacancy, he remained but a short time, when the late Charles K. Skinner took his place and continued President as long as the bank had an existence. In 1838, Mr. Hunt, then clerk in a mercantile establishment in this city was chosen by Mr. Handy as Assistant Cashier, and kept the place until the resignation of Mr. Handy, when he was appointed Cashier, and held that position until the impending destruction of the bank, the controlling interest having passed into the hands of Henry Dwight, Jr., tendered his resignation, and was succeeded by F. E. Platt, of Owego, N. Y., who remained until the crash came in 1853. It may be remarked in passing that Mr. Platt was an elder brother of Mr. Platt, late Senator from New York in the United States Congress, and that the ex-Senator was a clerk in the bank at one period during his brother's cashiership, and also a clerk in the drug store of Messrs. Joseph Watson & Co. When the bank closed, it was found that all its assets had been transferred to the city of New York, that it had in circulation $400,000, which was its full limit according to its charter, its capital stock being all paid up and it being allowed to issue two to one on its paid-up stock. As soon as it was ascertained that a crisis in the affairs of the bank had come, the President and Directors made an assignment to Charles D. Smith, Dwight Jarvis and M. D. Wellman who were afterward removed by the Court of Common Pleas on a motion by E. P. Grant, Esq., counsel for parties in interest, and Hon. George Harsh, Dr. Isaac Steese and Hon. P. C. Hull, now of Oneida, Carroll County, substituted. The entire assignment was thenceforth managed by Mr. Harsh, the other assignees of course being consulted, and being advisory members; and it should be placed on an enduring record that no assignment was ever conducted with more unyielding fidelity than was the assignment of the Bank of Massillon, after it had passed into the hands of Messrs. Harsh, Steese and Hull. Whatever there was of its assets was faithfully accounted for to the last cent, and the records of the Common Pleas of Stark County show an honorable discharge of the assignees after having discharged their trust. The assets of the bank, not stolen by the Dwight management, paid about 30 cents on the dollar, 70 per centum being plundered from the holders of the liabilities of the bank. Meanwhile, Mr. Hunt whose sagacity had enabled him to escape the fraud for which Henry Dwight, Jr., with his confreres, was liable, in connection with Dr. Isaac Steese and H. B. Hurlburt, under the general banking law of Ohio, organized the Merchants' Bank, with Dr. Steese as President, and Salmon Hunt, Cashier; their first office of discount and deposit was in the room on the east side of Erie street, south of Main, now occupied by George Yost & Son, saddlery and hardware, where they remained until they purchased the premises on the south end of the Wellman Block, corner of Erie street and the alley. There they closed out the Merchants' Bank, and under the National Banking law of the United States, organized the First National Bank of Massillon, with Dr. Steese as President, and S. Hunt, Cashier, with a capital of $200,000, and the following-named gentlemen as Directors: Isaac Steese, James M. Brown, Arvine C. Wales, Charles Steese, Jacob S. Bachtel and John Jacobs, with unimportant changes, that organization continued until August, 1874, when the death of Dr. Isaac Steese occasioned an entire change. Mr. Hunt was elected President, and Charles Steese, who had been a Director in the bank from its organization, was elected Cashier, under which management it has continued except an occasional change in the Board of Directors, and is one of the institutions of the West. Its influence in money circles is not confined to Massillon, or the county or State. It bears upon its history and present existence the names of Hunt and Steese as its present managers, which are a guarantee as to its management. The name of Isaac Steese is indissolubly connected with the history of the banking institutions of Massillon.

In November, 1847, the Union Branch of the State Bank of Ohio, at Massillon, was organized, with Dr. Steese as President, and S. Brainard, Esq., as Cashier. This position Dr. Steese resigned in 1850 to engage in private banking with Messrs. H. B. Hurlbut and Alvin Vinton, which firm was dissolved a year later for the purpose of organizing the Merchants' Bank, already mentioned. Dr. Steese was in all respects a representative man, and was so regarded, as the following extract from a notice written at his decease by one who knew him well, fully attests:

With Dr. Steese's removal to Massillon, he entered upon his widest field of usefulness. For twenty-five years he was one of the largest landed proprietors and farmers of the county. For twenty-five years he was the manager of the largest banking institution in the county. No man was better fitted by nature and acquirements for an eminent banker. Of the whole theory and science of banking he was a thorough master. His perfect rectitude and integrity were widely known, and were never questioned where known. His perfect acquaintance with business, and his sagacity were such that the institutions under his direction passed through all the monetary convulsions of the past quarter of a century almost wholly without loss, and without once failing to make their customary dividends to their shareholders. Their shares were never upon the market, unless brought there by the death of their owners. Always anxious to encourage the commercial and industrial enterprises of the place so far as he safely could, no considerations of public spirit or of private friendship could cause him to forget for a moment that as a banker he was the trusted custodian of other people's money.

The universal respect and confidence which he inspired, caused him largely to be sought out as the manager of the funds of the people in declining years—of widows, of minor children, and of people of small savings, carefully husbanded and left with him as in a place of the last security against a time of need. In times of financial peril and alarm, the sense of responsibility which these peculiarly sacred trusts entailed upon him was oppressive, sometimes almost crushing.

Always a man of marked individuality, one of the most prominent traits of his character was his strong attachment for books, and for sound and generous literature. It began with his earliest boyhood. Before he was fifteen he secured the use of a little island in Penn's Creek and planted it with the castor bean, with the sole purpose of founding a library with the proceeds. Friends who knew him forty years ago, are full of amusing recollections of his inseparable companionship with books.

A few men who begin life with these tastes preserve them to the last, but generally at the expense of all relish for business avocations. It was not so with him. His active and comprehensive mind maintained to the last its keen enjoyment of intellectual pursuits, and the most thorough understanding of all the details of affairs. For twenty-five years he directed his extensive farming operations, the running of his banks, and a multiplicity of private undertakings, and during all this time he was a devoted and most loving student. He seemed to have the power of most perfectly absorbing the whole contents of a book. What was once read was never forgotten. He delighted to share with others the result of his studies, and could condense into an hour's conversation, the whole pith and substance of a bulky volume.

Few practicing physicians kept so well read up in the advance of medical science. The discovery of a new remedy, a new method, or an ingenious operation was hailed with the joy of an enthusiast. There is no book in the English language treating of metaphysical topics that he was not familiar with. Not twenty men in the nation were better informed in politics in the large and best sense of the word—in political economy, and especially in questions of finance, taxation, the interchange of commodities, and the fluctuations of prices; his knowledge of the action of our own and European Governments on these subjects was very full, and his reasonings wonderfully clear. It was a subject of frequent regret among his friends that he had not exercised his talents of this kind in a wider way, and in a public capacity.

In several departments of natural philosophy—in history, in the best lighter literature, in social and reformatory topics, he was well read, and kept abreast with the best minds of the age. His kindness of heart was universally known and acknowledged. But the extent of it never was and never will be known. Hundreds of the kindest acts of his life were so quietly and so delicately done that they never reached the knowledge of any but the recipients of them. Of the most genial disposition, few men so enjoyed the society of his fellows.

What he was to his family—what to a circle of friends larger than often gathers around one man who walked with him through half a life time so nearly that their hearts touched his, I dare not, with the grief of his death fresh upon me, trust myself to write.

The home which he builded up in Massillon was known far and near not more for its elegance, its culture and refinement than for its open-handed hospitality; it was always the home of teachers of youth. Its welcoming doors were always open. There were few days in the year when its generous tables were not surrounded, and its rooms were not filled with neighboring or distant friends. At this home, on the 10th day of August, 1874, attended by all that the highest medical skill or the most painfully anxious affection could suggest, ministered to by loving hands, and surrounded by a devoted and heart-broken family, he quietly passed away.

From the organization of the Merchants' Bank until the death of Dr. Steese, Hon. S. Hunt, now President of the First National Bank, was associated with him; and of Mr. Hunt, it may be said, his name is a synonym for integrity and uprightness. For forty-three years, with a slight intermission, he has been a banker in this city. From Assistant Cashier to President, he has by unswerving fidelity built up and sustained a reputation for purity that cannot be assailed, and with that of Dr. Steese, will be treasured as one of Massillon's brightest jewels.

Next in order was the Union Branch of the State Bank of Ohio, which was started in 1847 by Dr. Isaac Steese, Sebastian Brainard and others. After the death of Mr. Brainard it passed through many hands, and was finally merged in the Union National Bank of Massillon, and is one of the soundest banking institutions in Ohio. The President and Cashier are among the soundest business men in the Tuscarawas Valley, and its stock is held by men of wealth. The following gentlemen compose its Board of Directors: John E. McLain, Thomas McCullough, Joseph Coleman, Frederick Loeffler, Edward Kachler, Frank R. Webb and James H. Hunt. President, John E. McLain; Vice-President, Thomas McCullough; Cashier, James H. Hunt. The capital stock of the bank is $100,000.

The Massillon Coal and Iron Company was formed in 1873, with a capital stock of $50,000, all paid. Its principal stockholders are John E. McLain, James Bayliss, Clement Russell, Nahum S. Russell, Peter Dielhenn, Edward Kachler, Hermann Schrieber, Joseph Coleman, Gustavus P. Reed, William F. Ricks, Henry Beatty, Silas A. Conrad, James H. Justus, Peter Sailer, Salmon Hunt and others.

Its present officers are S. Hunt, President; Edward Kachler, Secretary, and Joseph Coleman, Treasurer.

The company, immediately on its organization, being incorporated under the general law of the State, built a rolling mill which, for its capacity, is regarded one of the best in the country. It is now leased to Joseph Carns, Esq., for three years, who has taken a son into partnership, the firm being Joseph Carns & Son, and who are running the mill successfully.

The mill has eight puddling furnaces, two heating furnaces; much train, eighteen-inch bar mill train, nine-inch small train. The product of the mill is 425 tons per month, and has more orders than it can possibly fill. The force employed is 120 men, and the cash value of the product of the mill is about $20,000 per month, or from $240,000 to $250,000 per annum.

Messrs. Carns & Son are at the head of their profession, as managers of a rolling-mill, and by their energy and sound judgment are making the Massillon Coal and Iron Company's Rolling Mill a most important item in the business of the city, and in the northern portion of the Tuscarawas Valley.

CHAPTER XV.*

THE CITY OF MASSILLON—ITS CHURCH HISTORY—THE EARLY METHODISTS—PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH—OTHER CHURCH ORGANIZATIONS—SECRET AND BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS—THE PRESS—FIRST NEWSPAPER IN MASSILLON—CHANGES, ETC., ETC.

AT the laying out of Massillon fifty-five years ago, "the word of the Lord was precious." The Methodists, always on the frontiers of civilization, had preaching at stated periods. Massillon belonged to Canton Circuit, Steubenville District, of the Pittsburgh Conference. Their preachers occupied the school-room, when there was one, for that purpose. When no school-room could be had, a private house was opened, if in the winter; if in the summer, the threshing floor of a large barn; but Methodist preaching was sure to come. In 1832, Messrs. Hogan & Harris, a firm of forwarding and commission merchants, erected the brick building on Main street, now owned by Hon. George Harsh, in the third story of which was a hall, known as Hogan & Harris's Hall, which was used for all public gatherings, religious or political, or for any special meetings. The Methodists continued in this houseless manner until 1840. At that time Rev. D. R. Hawkins was on the circuit. He was a young man of great force of character, and he determined that there should be a Methodist Church edifice in the village. So he at once opened a correspondence with the Freemasons, who held their meetings in Hogan & Harris's block, occupying the room on the west side, the public hall being on the east side. The result of the correspondence was the Methodists and Freemasons determined to erect a two-story building, the lower story to be fitted up for a room for the church, and the second story for a Lodge and Chapter for the Masons. The building was erected in 1840. On the 24th of June the corner-stone of Clinton Lodge, No. 47, and Hiram Chapter, No. 18, and of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Massillon was laid, "with pomp and circumstance." For seventeen years there had not been a public Masonic exhibition in the county, the last one having been in Canton in 1823. Clinton Lodge was organized by charter from the Grand Lodge of Ohio in 1836, and was almost the only working Lodge north of the National road in the State. The building was erected and the two institutions occupied it harmoniously until 1860, when the Masons bought out the Methodists, and the Methodists had bought the old church edifice of the Baptists in 1858, which, as is noticed elsewhere, had been abandoned by the Baptists many years before. Although the Methodists purchased the building for a mere nominal sum, the extensive repairs they have put on it have made it cost as much as a new building would have cost, and is now commodious and well adapted to the wants of the church and congregation, now one of the most numerous in the city, of English Protestant churches. In 1845, the annual conference made Massillon a station, and the first in the county. Rev. Dr. Osborn is now the preacher in charge.

The first organization of a Presbyterian church and congregation in Perry Township or in this city is hidden in impenetrable obscurity, there being no one living who aided in such organization; nor is there any record that aids in arriving at a correct conclusion. As early as 1829, a distinct and earnest movement tending to such an organization was had. Rev. James B. Morrow then settled at Canton, and after him Rev. T. M. Hopkins came to Kendal and Massillon, and preached in Daniel Myers' carpenter-shop on State street in Kendal. At that time the Cruson brothers, John and Garrett, Austin Allen, Joseph Heckman and a few other families, composed the entire church, and they were the first to get a house which should be used for religious worship, after the Quakers of Kendal. They gave liberally, and got help from those who "had a kind word for all" evangelical denominations, and erected the building now used by the veteran carpenter of the city, John Zimmerman, as a carpenter-shop, which stood near where it now stands, on the hill between Kendal and Massillon, as the topography of the place was then described; and it was used as a meeting house for all religious sects, the Presbyterians however claiming the exclusive right. In this building Mr. Hopkins preached first, and which was in 1830 or 1831. In 1832, the mercantile firm of Baldwin & Noble came to Massillon and opened a stock of goods in the frame building which stood where now stands William Yost's saddlery and harness shop and store. They were Presbyterians, earnest and determined to see a church organized in the village. Through their influence the Rev. Elijah Buck, with his young and excellent wife, came from Rochester, N. Y., or from that section of the State, and becoming discouraged at the prospect for organizing a church, did not remain a great length of time. He is remembered, however, as an earnest, sincere young man, of scholarly attainments, and, if living, is supposed to be in Branch County, Mich., at or near Coldwater. In March, 1833, Rev. G. W. Warner, now of Canaan Corners, Columbia Co., N. Y., then Pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Wooster, being on his way to Sandyville, Tuscarawas Co., to aid the minister there in the labor of a four days' meeting, stopped here in response to repeated invitations, and made the acquaintance of the Presbyterians of Massillon, and such others as attended his meeting. The sermon on that occasion "was founded on the first clause of the 8th verse, 33d chapter of Ezekiel," and, as Mr. Warner says in a late letter to the writer, "was as plain and pointed as the preacher could possibly make it." This meeting was followed by a prompt and decided request for another sermon, and an appointment was made for May 25. "On this evening," says Mr. Warner, "almost the whole city came together to hear the word of the Lord." Mr. Warner adds: "The impression was favorable. Written as well as oral testimony, of the most gratifying character, rendered it certain that the labor was not in vain in the Lord." "Indeed, from that very point in the history of your thriving village, was dated the more manifestly growing change from the old regime of infidelity to the ultimate and completely commanding influence of Christianity."

From the fact that there is a record in existence showing that the late Joseph Heckman, Esq., was installed as Elder June 1, 1834, it would seem that a church was organized in Massillon at that time. It is certain that on the 30th of January of that year, there was no settled Presbyterian minister in Massillon, as the writer has a tolerably vivid recollection of a marriage that took place at that date, at which Rev. T. M. Hopkins, then settled at Canton, was the officiating minister. It was not, "however, until the 17th of April, 1836," says Rev. Mr. Warner, "that a minister of this denomination went among this people with a view to steady and exclusive operations." "At that date," adds Mr. Warner, "I found a church organized, and Mr. Heckman its only Elder; and, during the first of my ministry, Mr. Parker Handy, Cashier of the bank of Massillon, and Darius Ford, were ordained Ruling Elders, making the session to consist of Rev. George W. Warner, Moderator; Joseph Heckman, Clerk, and Parker Handy and Darius Ford.

"I was an ordained minister when I went to Massillon, but was never installed as Pastor of the church there."

The Trustees were Parker Handy, Harper Partridge and James O. Bloss. From the foregoing facts, it is clear that the Presbyterian Church in this city was first organized by Rev. Elijah Buck or Rev. T. M. Hopkins. Mr. Hopkins succeeded Mr. Morrow at Canton, as is now recollected, and Mr. Morrow removed to New Philadelphia where he died. The following tribute to the memory of the late Joseph Heckman, by Rev. Mr. Warner, is so just and so well deserved that it is given a place in these reminiscences:

"He for many years, even unto the day of his death, with marked consistency exemplified the principles and power of his Christian faith; and it should be added that as a citizen and public officer, his name will always, in the history of the good and useful men of Massillon, be especially remembered."

Dating from April 17, 1836, the Presbyterian Church of this city has had an existence. From Rev. Mr. Warner at that date there has been a succession of ministers, stated supplies and installed Pastors, who have maintained its position as one of the institutions of the city. On Mr. Warner assuming the duties of the pastorate of the little church here, he, with characteristic energy, set about getting a house in which to worship. The eligible lot, on the corner of Hill and Plum streets, was purchased, and a building erected, which served the church until 1852, during the pastorate of Rev. D. C. Blood, and during which it may be said the church grew and flourished, equal to its prosperity in any former period. In the year above named, the old building was sold, and the present commodious one erected. The old building was purchased by J. J. Hofman, and took the name of Hofman's Church, while he continued to own it. It is now occupied by Mr. Hoke as a residence on North street. On the resignation of Mr. Blood, after many years of faithful service, he was succeeded by Rev. George A. Little, now of Warsaw, Kosciusko Co., Ind., on whose resignation, Rev. R. L. Williams, now of Baraboo, Wis., was installed as Pastor; and who, in 1879, after twelve years of service, resigned, and was succeeded by Rev. N. P. Baily, D. D., who is now the Pastor, having been installed at the date above named. During that year, the church was made the recipient of a most munificent gift from Hon. H. B. Hurlbut, of Cleveland, consisting of a most commodious chapel, erected immediately adjoining the church, building, furnished and ornamented with every thing useful and beautiful, including a piano. As a church, the Presbyterian is the oldest organization in the city; and, in view of the changes of the past forty-five years, while it has not escaped the trials and vicissitudes incident to all organizations, its permanence and prosperity, as at present organized, are assured.

There are some things connected with the history of the Presbyterian Church in Massillon and the old building in which Rev. George W. Warner's ministry commenced as Pastor, that should not be forgotten, first and foremost of which was the organization of the Massillon Lyceum and the great debate in the winter of 1837 on the question, "Does Justice demand the Immediate Abolition of Slavery?" Mr. Warner and the trustees freely opened the house, which was filled to its utmost capacity every evening of the debate, and every possible phase and idea involved in the question were discussed in their length and breadth. Seed was sown that took root downward and sprang upward until the final result was. Although it took long years to accomplish it, Massillon became thoroughly abolitionized from being intensely pro-slavery, and on the close of the debate, the President, Hon. Hunking Wheeler, Jr., one of the best debaters and parliamentarians of that day, decided that the affirmative had the advantage in the argument, but qualified his decision by saying, "Had the word 'expediency' been substituted for justice, he should have decided differently." The popular vote of the Lyceum was largely in the negative.

In 1832, the first temperance lectures delivered in the county were delivered in Massillon by Theodore D. Weld, supposed to be living now in the State of New Jersey. These lectures revolutionized public sentiment for the time being, and when Mr. Warner came four years later, he put the Presbyterian Church into active work on that subject, and which lasted until he resigned in 1840. In November, 1841, he accepted an invitation to return, and did so, remaining two years, when he tendered his resignation, and is now, at the age of eighty, Pastor of a Presbyterian Church at Canaan Four Corners, Columbia Co., N. Y.

The first preaching by any minister of the communion known in Stark County as the United Brethren in Christ was at the tavern of Philip Slusser, in what is now Brookfield, in Tuscarawas Township, and was by Bishop Newcomer, in May, 1816. From the Bishop's journal, it appears that on the 24th of May he lodged with Jacob Rowland, near Canton, and on the 25th reached Philip Slusser's. "To-day and Sunday," says the Bishop, "we held a sacramental meeting here," which is the first account that can be had of any religious services by the United Brethren in the township. Later in the year, Rev. Messrs. David Wimar, Christian Kanaga, John Wimar and Peter Wimar held meetings in the township of Sugar Creek and at Pigeon Run, in Tuscarawas Township, and at some period between 1816 and 1820 a society was formed. Among its members were Adam Shilling, George Krider, Christian Maxhimer and many others. Preaching was had at private houses. The Pigeon Run Chapel was built at some time during the four years from 1816 to 1820, and regular preaching has been had in the township ever since. In 1829 or 1830, there was an accession of new members from Franklin County, Penn., Abraham Bowman and his family, and Samuel Zent and his family. The circuit was extended, and Brookfield was taken into that circuit, and, in 1849, a church building was erected and the different congregations were merged in the Brookfield congregation, except at Pigeon Run, those within the bounds of the charge remaining there. In 1873, the congregation was transferred to Massillon, the church building in Massillon was erected, and since which Massillon has been a station. The first preacher at the station was Rev. Elias Lower, now in Michigan. The first Trustees were Abram Bowman, John Silk, John Reeves and B. F. Booth. The present Pastor is Rev. J. M. Poulton. Present board of Trustees is Abraham Bowman, John Waggoner, John Silk, Tho's H. Seaman and the Pastor. The church in Tuscarawas Township, as well as at Massillon, is growing, and is exercising a wholesome influence. The journal of Bishop Newcomer is interesting, as showing the earnest faithfulness of his labors in his Episcopal visit to the West sixty-five years ago. The Mr. Bowman referred to as a member of the church in 1829, was the father of Abram Bauman, Esq., now a resident of Tuscarawas Township, and of Hon. Samuel C. Bauman, of Massillon.

Thirty-eight years have gone into the great ocean of time since Elder Jonas Hartzell organized the Disciples' Church in Massillon. The first Pastor was Elder Eli Regel. The first Board of Trustees was Charles London, John Bender and Isaac N. Doxsee. Mr. London and Mr. Doxsee yet survive, representatives of the doctrines of their church, and as such are representative men, and as highly esteemed citizens. In the "noiseless tenor of their way" the church and congregation meet at their meeting-house, corner of Hill and North Streets, and of them it should be said they are composed of many of the best citizens, and while they do not increase rapidly, they are always in the front rank of every reformatory movement.

The following history of the German Evangelical Lutheran Church is furnished by Rev. P. J. Buehl, the Pastor in charge:

The members of the Evangelical Lutheran Church was gathered together and organized by Rev. P. J. Buehl, Pastor of the Evangelical Lutheran Zion's Church of Akron, the sermon for that purpose being preached on the 5th day of September, 1863. The regular organization took place on the 1st day of January, 1864, at which time a constitution was adopted and a church council elected by the members of the church present, and installed by Rev. P. J. Buehl, and incorporated under the General

Laws of the State of Ohio by the name of The Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Church, in the City of Massillon. The following members were elected to constitute the first Church Council. As Deacons, Hermann Schreiber, Adam Gemminger, George Schueir and Peter Bause; as Trustees, George Speigel, Balthazer Ketterer and Peter Diemer; Treasurer, Gattfred Danner; and Clerk, J. Frederick Lehmann. On the 22d of February, 1864, Rev. P. J. Buehl, of the city of Akron, was called as the regular pastor, which call was accepted, as advised by high officials of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, on the 4th day of May, 1864, and on the 16th day of the same month moved his family to the city of Massillon, and since said time has remained the regular pastor of said church, now more than seventeen years. On the 12th day of May the Church resolved to purchase the premises upon which now stand the church buildings, then owned by Arvine C. Wales, and the estate of William S. Wetmore, deceased, and, after grading and much preparation, the present buildings were erected. First, a schoolhouse for a German and English Congregational School, which was dedicated on the 1st of January, 1865. After preaching from the 6th of September, 1863, to the 1st day of February, 1865, in a building called Hofman's Church, on North street, now changed into a dwelling-house, and from the last above date to October, 1870, in the lower room of the Masonic Building on Mill street. On the 13th day of June, 1869, the corner-stone of the new church edifice was laid with becoming ceremonies, and on the 18th Sunday after Trinity, A. D. 1870, the same was finished and dedicated to the service of the Triune God. The building is 47 feet wide, and, with the projection of the tower and altar place, is 110 feet long, with a tower 170 feet high, the whole of first-class finish and materials. Near the schoolhouse and church edifice stand two dwelling houses, one a parsonage and one a dwelling for the Congregational teacher and organist, built since the building of the church edifice. The congregation increased during the first year to a communicant membership of ninety-seven members of both sexes. It now numbers 300, exclusive of 130 children of school age, which are taught to a certain age in the Congregational day school in German and English, and the religious principles of the word of God and the doctrines of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

To the above should be added that the church edifice and grounds of the Evangelical Lutheran Church are surpassingly beautiful. The buildings are surrounded by an Osage orange hedge, which is kept trimmed and in the highest state of cultivation, inside of which are shubbery, flowers and evergreens, among which are carriage-ways and graveled walks, all of which are kept so neatly that the place is an object of the admiration of all strangers visiting the city. All the ornamentation of the grounds is the work of Rev. Mr. Buehl, who, in addition to the duties of the pastorate, finds time to embellish the churchyard with flowers and shubbery, and keeps them in order beyond similar work in point of taste and elegance in the city.

On the 7th day of June, 1836, the Parish of St. Timothy's Church was duly organized, according to the Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a charter therefor having been previously obtained through the influence of Hon. David A. Starkweather, member of the Ohio Senate. The Rev. John Swan was elected the first Rector, October 10, of the same year, the corner-stone of the church edifice having been laid by Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Ohio. On the 13th of May, 1843, the church was consecrated by Bishop McIlvaine. On the 15th of July, the Rev. John Swan resigned the charge of the parish. July 26, 1846, Rev. Anson Clark accepted a call to the parish, and remained in charge until May 11, 1851. From October 1, 1851, until April 3, 1859, Rev. Edward H. Cumming was Rector; from July 1, 1859, to July, 1865, Rev. Henry H. Morell was Rector; from February 1, 1867, to May 1, 1871, Rev. G. W. Timlow; from October 1, 1871, to October 1, 1872, Rev. Wilfred H. Dean; from May 15, 1873, to March, 1877, Rev. W. M. Probasco, who died that month of small-pox.

The present Rector, Rev. R. D. Brook, took charge of the parish October 16, 1877, having been unanimously elected thereto by the Vestry.

The first Vestry were James Duncan, Herman B. Harris, James S. Reynolds, Hunking Wheeler, Charles K. Skinner, Dwight Jarvis, Matthew Johnson and George Paine. The present Vestry are Thomas McCullough; Senior Warden; Hiram K. Dickey, Junior Warden; Thomas

Hopper, Augustus J. Ricks, Moses A. Brown, Jacob G. Bucher, James R. Dunn, H. H. Everhard, Edward B. Upham, and John G. Warwick.

Through the long period of forty-five years, St. Timothy's has been one of the standard institutions of the city. The beautiful location of the church and parsonage, in one inclosure, at the southeast corner of Tremont and East streets, attracts the attention of strangers visiting the city, and is, of itself, an enduring monument of the liberality of Hon. James Duncan, whose generosity was restricted only by his means.

In 1849, the German Protestant element having increased rapidly, a meeting was called of those of the German Evangelical Church. In a legal proceeding of a later date, they were sued as the German Evangelical Church of St. John, and to that style the trustees answered. At the date above named, there were forty-eight families. At the meeting an organization was effected, and the Rev. Dr. J. G. Buettner, a most scholarly and elegant gentleman, was chosen Pastor. He remained four years. Of the original forty-eight families, but seven or eight remain. The number of families now composing the membership is two hundred and sixty-five. This church has grown in wealth and influence. The first meeting-house is the stone building on East street, south of St. Timothy's Protestant Episcopal. In that they met for long years, and when it got so small as no longer to be used for that purpose, they purchased the beautiful lot on the corner of Tremont and Mill, than which none is more eligible in the city, and on that they have erected a large and commodious building—an honor to themselves and the city. Their former meeting-house has been sold to the Union School District, and, as a schoolhouse, is useful. It was built in 1840, and after twenty years of use as a church, was sold. In 1863 and 1864 there was a secession from the church of about fifteen families, making about seventy-five members, on account of a difference of opinion on the subject of parochial schools, those who withdrew being in favor of establishing schools of that character. At that time Rev. Mr. Weisgerber was Pastor of the old German Evangelical Church. He was a positive man in all his opinions, and especially positive in his opposition to distinct schools, under the management of the church. Upon the fact being settled that, under the government of the German Evangelical Church, parochial schools would not be established, the withdrawal took place, and the German Evangelical Lutheran Church was at once organized, and is now one of the institutions of the city. Under the fostering care of Rev. O. W. Shetlar, the old German Evangelical Church is moving onward, embracing in its membership a most useful and intelligent class of the German population of the city and township, and largely increasing in numbers by the unparalleled immigration from the Fatherland, and the influence and well-directed labors of its worthy Pastor.

In October, 1835, Rev. O. N. Sage, now of Cincinnati, a Baptist minister, arrived in Massillon, then a young gentleman from Erie, Penn., unheralded and unknown, and as he says "not knowing the name of any one of the people of the place." In those days, the village being on the full tide of successful competition with all the neighboring towns, paying always the highest prices for produce of all kinds, its fame as the "wheat city" of Ohio attracted the young Baptist Minister. It seemed to him to be the field wherein he could labor and leave at least "some footprints on the sands of time,"

"Footprints that perhaps another Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, might take heart again."

The young minister was right in his conclusion, as the following extract from a pleasant letter received from him indicates. He "found a quiet temperance house kept by William M. Folger, and preached the next day in Hogan & Harris' Hall to a good, attentive audience. Before leaving the hall, it was resolved by the people that a meeting house should be built, and the young man was informally invited to become a citizen of what was then known as the most enterprising business place in the interior of Ohio."

When it is remembered that there was not at that time a half a dozen Baptists in the township of six miles square, it will strike the reader singularly that on the second day after the arrival of Mr. Sage, which was on the first Sabbath, and on hearing his first sermon, that his congregation should resolve that a house should be built, and he invited to become a citizen. The people of Massillon were not disappointed.

The name of Rev. Orrin N. Sage is kindly remembered by the few who remain, who listened to his preaching, and who will never forget his earnest labors to fashion and improve the social and moral condition of the then plastic society of Massillon.

The encouragement given to Mr. Sage of course set him at work. He purchased the lot on the northwest corner of North and Mill streets, which was then the extreme northern boundary of the village, and, with untiring energy, erected the church edifice now there. As soon as it was inclosed and convenient rooms in the basement could be finished, religious worship was had there, and the first Baptist Church of Massillon was organized, with Mr. Sage as its Pastor. The church edifice, under the general management of Mr. Sage, the funds for which were furnished, mostly, says Mr. Sage, "by the business men of the place, who had no particular devotion to any religious sect; but a kind word for all."

Those who have lived since 1836 and remember the inflation of the currency and consequent panic in the following year, will remember how easy it was to lay out cities, and in part to build them up. Massillon went into the wildest speculations. Corner lots, that have since been sold for less than a tenth part of the then prices, brought $5,000, and more was paid in "hand money" than they were worth; the result was bankruptcy and ruin, in which the First Baptist Church of Massillon was a sufferer. The church edifice was erected on the credit of the subscriptions of those persons "who had a kind word for all," who subscribed without thinking of the pay day. In 1837 came the crisis. Gen. Jackson, President of the United States, the year before had issued his famous "specie circular," and in May, 1837, a general suspension of specie payments by the banks all over the country took place, and suspension of payments in anything, by individuals, followed. The church had a heavy debt, and which was an incubus from which it never recovered. Mr. Sage remained five years, struggling to save the property and keep the congregation and church, especially, intact. It was the darling object of his early life as a minister. His health, from labor and anxiety, broke down, and he was compelled to seek another home. His successor was Rev. S. B. Page, D. D., now of Cleveland, who found about one hundred members connected with the church, who were increased during his ministry to about one hundred and twenty. Mr. Page was Pastor in 1841. As services were had in April that year on the occasion of the death of President Harrison, the opening hymn, as is well remembered, commencing with the lines,

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

How long after that year he remained is not certain. The church being burthened with a heavy debt and accruing interest, struggled for many years. The business of the town changed and went into new hands, who were in no wise responsible for subscriptions to the church nor were members. As an organization the church could not be sustained. Super-added to all other calamities, it passed into the pastorate of a most unpopular minister, under whose pastorate the house was closed forever to the Baptists, and the church was scattered. Few yet remain who were members. Among those who are yet living should be named Andrew B. Cox and William Bohanon, respected citizens of the Third Ward in this city. The building was sold at Sheriff's sale, under a decree or judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Stark County, and the First Baptist Church of Massillon exists only in history.

Although the Baptist Church organized by Mr. Sage was the organization of that communion in the city, he was not the first Baptist minister who had preached there. As early as 1830, Elder Jehu Brown, by occupation a millwright, who did a great amount of work for Mr. Duncan, preached on alternate Sundays at his boarding-house, corner of Oak and Erie streets. He was a man of strong mind, and did his duty faithfully as he understood it. He was elected in 1833-34 to the House of Representatives in the General Assembly of the State, and afterward removed to Mt. Carroll, Carroll Co., Ill. Rev. O. N. Sage is now, and for thirty-seven years has been, a resident of Cincinnati, beloved and respected by a large circle of friends.

The first preaching or address by a Priest or Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church in this city was by Bishop Purcell, and was in what was then Johnson's, now Beatty's, Block, on the corner of the canal and Main street, in the room now occupied by the Knights of Pythias. The Bishop had been in the northern part of the diocese, Ohio being then included in the Diocese of Cincinnati, on an Episcopal visit, and took Massillon en route on his return. Timothy Finnegan, an active Irish Catholic, procured the hall for the Bishop. This visit was in 1838, and before many of the since numerous German Catholic population had settled in the Tuscarawas Valley, in the neighborhood of Massillon. The old church at Canton, St. John's, being the only one in this part of Ohio, except a little church in Lawrence Township, naturally drew around it the immigrants of that faith.

The few Catholics in Massillon were not without religious services. The first celebration of mass was by Rev. Father Hoffman, from Canton, in a private house. He continued to visit the members of the church during the year 1836, as circumstances permitted him to do so. The next year, Father Yunker had services in a little one-story dwelling house, since raised to a two-story building, near the corner of Mill and Plum streets, and also had service at the house of Patrick Harney, northwest of where now stands the station house and other buildings of the Cleveland, Tuscarawas Valley & Wheeling Railway, which house is yet standing, and is one of the oldest frame houses in the township, having been built and occupied by an early settler by the name of David Anderson, Esq., and father of Samuel M. Anderson, now of Dalton. Squire Anderson will be remembered as one of the early Presbyterians of the Tuscarawas Valley. In 1838, Father Kuhr, from Canton, had services in the third story of Gen. Gardner Field's building on the west side of the canal. This was a comparatively large and comfortable room, but it could not be had at all times, and the Catholics were driven into private houses. They next met in 1840, in a small frame house on Charles street, near the corner of Muskingum; then at Widow Ertle's, on North Mill street, near the present residence of David Kerstetter, Esq. That year services were also held at the house of Timothy Finnegan, in a building yet known as the "Finnegan House," corner of Mill and North streets. Timothy was a scholarly Irishman. Tradition has it that he was educated for a priest, but was captured by a bright Irish girl, whom he married, and then learned the trade of a cooper, at which he excelled, as he did in defense of his religion. He finally removed to Cincinnati, where he died.

Near the close of the Pontificate of Pope Gregory XVI, there came into the village a Presbyterian minister by the name of Delavan, and the Presbyterian pulpit being vacant, he, Mr. Delavan, was temporarily employed. He at once commenced preaching sermons and publishing articles in the newspapers against the Catholic Church, and especially against Pope Gregory XVI. The irreverent boys about town gave him the sobriquet of "Pope Gregory," which fastened itself upon him until he was better known by that name than any other. His articles were replied to with great spirit and ability by Finnegan, over his initials. His familiarity with the history of the Church, and his quotations from the Fathers, accompanied by translations, surprised everybody, and the Presbyterian minister found his match. His perfect discomfiture by the Irish cooper did much to prevent his being permanently employed by the Presbyterians.

At the time Mr. Delavan left, a most amusing incident occurred. A meeting had been called by the Presbyterians to determine whether they would employ him, F. M. Keith, Esq., then of the law firm of Pease & Keith, being his warm friend and a member of the church. On the evening of the meeting, he went into the office and had a conference with Mr. Keith, after which Messrs. Pease, Keith and two students went to the church, the students to see what would become of "Pope Gregory," under the championship of their preceptor. When the vote was taken upon employing Mr. Delavan permanently, there was but one in his favor. After the close of the meeting, he again went to the office and found one of the students in, and at once asked him if "there was a good degree of unanimity in the proceedings?" "Oh yes," replied the young man. "It lacked but a single vote of entire unanimity." Mr. Delavan seemed delighted and left for his lodgings, and encountered Mr. Keith on the way, who gave him the facts. Mr. Delavan left the next morning, and Timothy had the field.

In 1840, the Catholic residents within what might be denominated the Massillon Mission, or St. Mary's Mission, and who are really the pioneer Catholics, were Frederick Ertle, Nicholas Smith, Andrew Paul, Christian Witt, Nicholas Heiser, John Frease, Anton Vogt, John Boerner, John Yungbluth—commonly called Youngblood—John Yungling, Francis Miller, John Kutcher, George Seifert, George Ress, Thomas Kegler, George Hoke, Adam Hamersmith, Martin Bauman, Peter Runser, Magdalena Bamberger, Margaret Frease, Nicholas Bamberger and some others whose names cannot be ascertained. Few of these pioneers yet remain; prominent among the survivors are Christian Witt, John Boerner, Anton Vogt and Adam Hamersmith.

In the summer of 1840, for a short time Father Peter McLaughlin, was at Massillon, making his home with Timothy Finnegan. Father Peter, as he was called by those whose acquaintance justified such familiarity, was one of the most genial gentlemen ever at Massillon in the service of the church. His truly Christian character will ever be regarded with affection by all who knew him. The last known of him was that he had a parish in Milwaukee.

At the date last mentioned, the Catholics of Massillon and vicinity, extending to McDonaldville, in Jackson Township, Richville, in Perry, Brookfield, in Tuscarawas, feeling that they should have a church edifice and grounds surrounding it, purchased the premises where now stands the magnificent structure known as St. Mary's, or Neue Katholische Mutter Gottes Kirche, in Massillon, Ohio, and which when completed will eclipse anything of the kind in Northern Ohio. The photograph, by Haring, shows what will be the elegance of the building when it shall have received its finishing touches.

On purchasing the premises, which were then far north of the city limits, the few Catholics of the mission proceeded to build a church edifice, which they accomplished under the guidance and supervision of various priests, who were sent here, and St. Mary's grew and prospered until 1852, when their church was destroyed by fire, the work of incendiaries. Stricken, but not disheartened, they rebuilt and enlarged the building, and continued to use the repaired structure until a few years since, when they tore down the old building, that with its repairs, had for more than thirty years served them, and have gotten their new building in a condition to be used. The new building was commenced by Father Koehn, but his health failing, he was transferred by Bishop Gilmour to another field of labor, where he soon ended a useful life. On his leaving the parish of St. Mary's, Rev. Father Kuhn took charge, and has since remained. There are nearly three hundred families connected with the church, with which they have a large school, by the enlargement of the city limits; the buildings and churchyard are on the corner of Cherry and Mill streets, a location well adapted to the wants of the large membership.

Clinton Lodge, No. 47, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons. This institution commenced work under a dispensation granted by Right Worshipful William J. Reese, Grand Master of the State of Ohio, in 1836, and continued so to work until the 22d day of January, 1837, when a charter was granted to George D. Hine, W. M.; Joseph G. Hogan, S. W.; S. Buckius, J. W.; Asa Rice, Treas.; George W. Swarengen, Sec'y; Conly Hunter, S. D.; Britton Edwards, J. D.; Andrew Robertson, Tiler.

There were many others in the neighborhood who had not affiliated with the craft, their being no working lodge within their reach. For forty-five years Clinton Lodge has sustained itself, and is now about to erect a new and commodious hall, having used the present one since 1840. Its present officers are: G. W. Blanchard, W. M.; Frank Strobel, S. W.; D. L. St. John, J. W.; J. R. Dangler, Treas.; F. A. Brown, Sec'y; J. C. Harwood, S. D.; Howard Garrigues, J. D.; J. M. McEwen, Tiler. Of the original members who obtained the charter and organized the lodge, not one remains.

Hiram Chapter, No. 18, of Royal Arch Masons, was organized by charter from the Grand Chapter of Ohio, 1839. The first officers were: George D. Hine, M. E. H. P.; T. Dunham, E. K.; Jesse Rhodes, E. S.; John E. Dunbar and others, Associates. The present officers of the Chapter are: George W. Hathaway, M. E. H. P.; Charles H. Tinkler, E. K.; G. Liv. Ryder, E. S.; J. C. Harwood, Capt. Host; B. F. Cline, P. S.; D. J. Kirkland, R. A. Capt.; D. L. St. John, Third Vail; A. P. Wiseman, Second Vail; D. Atwater, First Vail; J. R. Dangler, Treas.; C. H. Garrigues, Sec'y; J. M. McEwen, Guard.

A Commandery of Knights Templar was organized under a charter issued Oct. 16, 1842. Its original officers were W. J. Reese, G. D. Hine, K. Porter, John Barney, Joseph B. Heuzey, Sylvanus Buckius, Thomas Hine and George A. Kellenberger. Its present officers are: R. V. Hampson, E. C.; Frank R. Webb, Generalissimo; James H. McLain, Capt. Gen.; James R. Dunn, Prelate; C. H. Tinkler, S. W.; W. H. Kirkland, J. W.; G. Liv. Ryder, Warder; J. R. Dangler, Treas.; G. W. Blanchard, Rec.; Luther Hicks, Standard Bearer; J. Robbins, Sword Bearer; J. McEwen, Sentinel.

Sippo Lodge, No. 48, I. O. O. F., was instituted August 30, 1845. Charter members: F. T. Hurxthal, James S. Kelley, George Miller, Joseph Culbertson, John Wisner. First officers: James S. Kelly, N. G.; George Miller, V. G.; John Wisner, Sec'y; Joseph Culbertson, Treas. Present officers: C. H. Mong, N. G.; C. E. Taylor, V. G.; Charles T. Higginbotham, R. Sec'y; H. C. Brown, P. Sec'y.

Eureka Encampment, No. 24, I. O. O. F., was instituted August 13, 1847. Charter members: George Miller, William C. Earl, C. A. Brobst, Pomeroy Baldwin, Samuel Oberlin, William H. Bahney, William S. Wann, N. S. Russell, F. W. Parmelee. First officers: W. C. Earl, C. P.; George Miller, H. P.; J. J. Hofman, S. W.; Pomeroy Baldwin, J. W.; I. H. Brown, Scribe; Samuel Oberlin, Treas. Present officers: Henry Suhr, C. P.; C. W. Kline, H. P.; C. H. Mong, S. W.; Thomas Lavers, J. W.; H. C. Brown, Scribe; N. S. Russell, Treas.

Massillon Lodge, No. 484, I. O. O. F., was organized July 11, 1871. Charter members: Conrad Gessner, Louis Stilke, Frederick Loeffler, Henry Nalter, Joseph Slebaugh, Frederick Buckel, Charles Zupp, Christian Blaker, Frederick Beck. First officers: Conrad Gessner, N. G.; Louis Stilke, V. G.; G. F. Buckel, Sec'y; F. Loeffler, Treas. Present officers: John Kapp, N. G.; Philip Baldauff, V. G.; Valentine Kroenerich, Sec'y; Julius Koehnle, P. Sec'y.

There is a large and flourishing German lodge, and is composed of representative Germans.

Perry Lodge, Knights of Pythias, was instituted June 30, 1875, the following persons being charter members: Henry Alterkruse, Alexander McLaughlin, L. C. Cole, Isaac Ullman, Victor Burnet, George W. Earle, Herrman Mayer, George Goodheart, Z. T. Baltzley, R. A. Walker, S. S. Whisler, Orlando Martin, Henry Waggoner, E. N. Seeley, Turenne Goetz, W. F. Harshey, W. G. Curry, Henry Peters, W. C. Poe, D. Kitchen, R. Hay, Robert Lormer, John Lun. On the organization of the lodge, the following persons were elected to the several offices: Isaac Ulman, O. C.; Z. T. Baltzley, V. C.; S. S. Whisler, P.; H. Mayer, M. of E.; L. C. Cole, K. of R. & S.; H. Altekmer, M. of E.; A. McLaughlin, M. at A.; Orlando Martin, I. G.; Turenne Goetz, O. G.; G. W. Earle, D. D. G. C. The institution has progressed until it numbers seventy-five members, and is now governed by the following officers: D. A. Henney, C. C.; M. C. Young, V. C.; John Spuhler, P.; Alexander McLaughlin, M. E.; Z. T. Baltzley, M. of E.; H. H. Minnick, K. of R. & S.; John Martin, M. at A.; A. Matthews, I. G.; T. Goetz, O. G.

The year 1836 opened upon Massillon with one of the saddest events of its early history, in the death of Gen. Gardner Field, which occurred on the road between Massillon and Canton. Gen. Field was driving to Canton in his sulky, and by some mishap fell from his seat, and was found with his skull fractured, and beyond the reach of medical aid. He was taken to Hawk's Hotel, in Canton, where he died.

Gen. Field was largely connected with the business and social interests of Massillon, and his loss was severely felt for a long time. As an indication of the public feeling and public sentiment on the occasion of his death, the following proceedings were had, as shown by the obituary notice of Gen. G. Field, published in the Massillon Gazette, January 9, 1836:

DEATH OF GEN. G. FIELD.

In our last was mentioned the accident which happened to Gen. G. Field, of this village.

We have now the melancholy duty to perform of recording his death. He expired in Canton, on Friday evening, on the 1st day of this month, in the thirty-fifth year of his age, about ten hours after the accident. The manner in which he was thrown from his carriage is not known beyond the border of a conjecture, as he was riding alone and none sufficiently near to witness the commencement of the scene. The vehicle was proceeding over a smooth part of the road, there was no running off, yet he was found dragging between one of the shafts and the wheel by which his head was so horribly mashed that he never after uttered a word. In the death of this man society has sustained a shock from which it will not easily recover. The community at large will feel it, and will regret it the more that he has been snatched away in the flower of his years, in the spring-time of his career of usefulness. The calamity, however, must be felt with greater poignancy of grief and sorrow by his family and connections, by having by so lamentable an occurrence their late happy homes changed into grief and mourning, and the smile of peace and comfort giving way to the tear of family affliction. The memory of the deceased will long continue engraven on the recollections of many; but no condolence can materially lessen the sorrow of domestic woe.

The deceased was the son of Waterman Field, of New Berlin, Chenango County, New York. In the spring of 1827, he came to this State, and engaged as an engineer on the Ohio Canal, in which service he remained until about three years since, when he left it to engage in business in this town. He had held for the past year the office of Collector of Tolls on the Ohio Canal at this port, and only a few weeks previous to his death was elected Brigadier General of the Militia in this county.

Among the active, industrious and enterprising citizens by whom Gen. Field was surrounded, none were more so than himself. He enjoyed in an eminent degree the confidence of his neighbors and fellow-citizens, and in the characteristics of promptness, energy and activity in all operations which he undertook, either for individual or public benefit, no one excelled him; and being amiable in his deportment, conciliating and just with all, and friendly beyond the usual acceptance of the term, his death will be mourned by all, and his worth, now that he has gone, will be more fully appreciated and his loss more sensibly felt. He has left an amiable and interesting widow and an infant son to deplore his sudden and untimely end and their irreparable loss. His remains were brought to this place on Saturday last, and were buried on the following day with military honors, and, notwithstanding the extremely unpleasant weather, a large concourse of people attended his funeral. A meeting of his friends and acquaintances was held the evening preceding his burial to express their regret on the occasion, and to make arrangements for the funeral, the proceedings of which as furnished to us, read as follows:

At a meeting of the citizens of Massillon convened at the house of William M. Folger, on Saturday evening, the 2d inst., for the purpose of making necessary arrangements to pay the last tribute of respect to their late valuable fellow-citizen, Gen. Gardner Field, Alexander McCully, Esq., was called to the Chair, and A. G. Hammond appointed Secretary. The object of the meeting having been briefly stated by the chairman, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That in the melancholy and sudden death of our highly esteemed fellow-citizen, Gen. G. Field, society has sustained an irreparable loss, and his numerous acquaintances, a warm and generous friend.

Resolved, That this meeting tender to his widow, relatives and family connections, their deepest and most sincere sympathies, and that a committee of three be appointed by the chair to communicate these resolutions to them. (Whereupon D. Jarvis, P. Handy and William M. Folger were appointed said committee).

Resolved, That the following gentlemen be requested to act as pall bearers, viz.: D. Jarvis, H. B. Harris, H. Wheeler, Jr., J. G. Hogan, Alexander McCully, John Everhard, William M. Folger and S. Buckius.

Resolved, That the fellow-citizens of the deceased be requested to wear crape on their left arm, while attending his funeral obsequies.

Resolved, That C. K. Skinner, Osee Welch, M. D. Wellman, F. Hurxthal, P. C. Hull and George Harsh be a general committee of arrangements.

Resolved, That the proceeding of this meeting be published in the papers of the county.

A. G. HAMMOND, Secretary.
ALEXANDER McCULLY, Chairman.

The year 1848, while it was the year for organizing the Union Schools of Massillon, witnessed an event of a different character, and one that will never be forgotten while any one lives who witnessed it. For the purpose of supplying the village with pure water and creating a water power of immense value to the proprietors, the "Massillon Rolling Mill Company" purchased all the land immediately adjoining Sippo Lake, about three miles northeast of the village, and, by means of a dam across the outlet of the lake, created a reservoir of water covering about 1,100 acres, fed from the lake and some small springs, and which was as fine a body of water as is usually found. In addition to the purposes sought to be accomplished by the rolling mill company, the State became a party to the enterprise for the purpose of using the water for the Ohio Canal, which is near ninety feet below the surface of the lake. The plan proved to be a success in every respect, and could the reservoir have been permitted to remain, the benefit the city would have derived can hardly be estimated.

Almost as soon as it was built and filled, and before it was possible for any evil effects to have arisen from the accumulation of so large a body of water, a hue and cry was raised against it because of alleged malaria arising therefrom, and thereby prejudicing the health of the neighborhood. Threats of its destruction were made, but as they could not be traced to any reliable source, and considering the effect upon the city, involving property and life, as the whole lower part of the city would be swept away, no one supposed that the neighborhood either of the city or the reservoir contained any person who would be guilty of such an outrage.

On the night of the 22d of February, 1848, which had been selected because of its being the anniversary of the birthday of Washington, and the opening of the Tremont House, then much the largest hotel in this section of the State south of Cleveland, arrangements were made for a dance in the spacious dining-hall of the hotel. Parties were present from all the prominent places in the neighborhood, including Akron, Wooster, Canton and Cleveland, and the occasion was, as it was intended to be, one of the grandest festivals that Massillon had ever witnessed. The rolling mill company, who were the owners of the hotel, had spared neither pains nor money in its construction or appointments for the purposes for which it was erected, and taking its name from the "Tremont" House, of Boston, Mass., it was intended by the proprietors that the Tremont of Massillon should be to that city what the Tremont of Boston was to the "Hub of the universe," hence its opening was signalized by extraordinary efforts on the part of all concerned.

While the dance was at its height and all present were in the full tide of enjoyment, "the sound of revelry" was hushed, and "whispering with white lips" took its place; the roaring and hissing of the torrent up the valley told but too truly that the reservoir was coming. The dam had been blown up with powder, and suddenly the whole body of water was put in motion, having a fall of ninety feet before it reached the level of Main street, in Massillon. The effect of a breast-work of six to eight feet of water moving down the little channel of Sippo Creek can hardly be imagined. It had been known for a long time that the 22d of February had been selected for the grand opening of the hotel, and that occasion was undoubtedly selected by the miscreants who blew up the dam as one in which not only property in the city could be destroyed, but a destruction of human life could and would be effected, to the greatest possible extent, and why no lives were lost is a question that cannot be answered. The designs of the conspirators were completely foiled in that respect. The loss of property was simply immense. The solid gravel street between the south end of the stone block and the north front of the hotel, which stands on the southeast corner of Tremont and Erie, as far east as the corner of Tremont and East streets, was swept away. Reaching Erie street, it swept that away also, taking with it the large and well-built three-story brick warehouse, owned by the Rolling Mill Company, occupied by J. L. Reynolds as a wholesale grocery store. Of this building "not one stone was left upon another," nor was one dollar of the stock saved. The flood swept through the street to the canal, and through both banks of the canal, and up and down the canal, with a resistless force, filling the basement of all the warehouses, crushing in the doors on the canal side, and floating out everything that would float. Such packages as were too heavy to float were swept into the river, and went down with the current. The south end of Tremont Block, better known as the "stone block," a three-story building of cut stone, built in the very best manner, by the late Francis Worthorst, was swept out as though it had been a cot house, and to this fact may be attributed the safety of the hotel. Before reaching the hotel, the current took a northerly course, striking the end of the stone block, and while it retained sufficient force to wash away the earth from the cellar walls of the hotel, it had not force enough to disturb the wall. As the water fell, the cellar wall was exposed from the lowest foundation stone to the brick work. A critical and careful examination by experts showed the walls to be uninjured. The entire lower part of the city, south and west, was completely submerged, and what the loss was has never been completely ascertained. Among the greatest losers were the heavy wholesale grocery firm of J. Watson & Co.; Fenner & McMillen, wholesale groceries and dry goods; the Rolling Mill Company, the damage to which consisted in injury to real estate, loose property carried off by the flood and damage to buildings.

Since that memorable night, thirty-three years have passed away, and whatever is written of it now must be transcribed from memory. At the time, dreadful as was the calamity, and it was worse than all the fires the city has ever experienced, no record can be had that gives a detailed account of the losses. Many who were great losers have passed away. Death and removals, in the absence of records, tend largely to increase the difficulties attendant upon the obtaining of correct local history.

In April, 1830, Capt. James Allen, of Canton, who had served his apprenticeship to the "art preservative of all arts" in the office of the Ohio Repository, at Canton, came to Massillon with the material for a newspaper, and rented the upper room of a building on Main street, immediately east of the store of I. Brown & Co., about where now stands the drug store of Mr. Ph. Morgenthaler. The material that he bought included all that was necessary to get out a paper such as was gotten out a half a century ago. The press on which the paper was to be and was printed, was an old Ramage press, so old and dilapidated, that the inventor, himself, Adam Ramage, would hardly have recognized it as a copy of his invention. It, with the other material, was brought into the county in 1827, by that veteran printer, now gone to his long rest, Joseph Wilkinson White, a printer who had started more newspapers in Ohio and elsewhere in the United States west of the River Ohio than any man, living or dead, except Sam Pike. When Mr. White brought his printing material to Stark County, he was bound to start a paper to support the Administration and re-election of John Quincy Adams, then, 1828, being in its last year; but falling in with several influential Democrats at Canton, he concluded to start a paper at Paris, in this county, then a little hamlet, in the support of Gen. Jackson. He did so, and his paper, the Ohio Democrat, lived and flourished until after the Presidential election, when it was removed to Canton, but did not flourish there. Capt. Allen was in some way connected with it, and finally became the owner of the establishment, and brought it to Massillon at the time named, and, with Dr. John Townsend, started the Massillon Gazette. It was printed on a small super-royal sheet. Massillon at that time had possibly five hundred inhabitants, when the Massillon Gazette, by Allen & Townsend, appeared in April, 1830. The political tidal wave that carried Gen. Jackson triumphantly into the Presidency had scarcely subsided; the ground-swell after the storm was still rolling, everybody was Democratic save a few who inherited the faith of the Federal fathers, and, under these circumstances, the Gazette, without any particular principles, started. Townsend soon withdrew from it. Allen, one of the most genial men ever connected with the Stark County press, and of remarkable ability as a writer, and whose colloquial powers were rarely equaled, and a practical printer withal, was unable to make the Gazette a success. The Democrats of Massillon, under the lead of Alexander McCully, bought out the paper, and it went into the hands of Bernard & McCully, Bernard being a practical printer.

In the autumn of 1831, Allen was elected to the Legislature, and did not return to Stark County from Columbus. When the Legislature adjourned, he went to Cincinnati, obtained a berth on a steamboat as clerk, for a time, and finally brought up as editor of the old Cincinnati Republican, then published by Looker & Reynolds. He remained there until the establishment changed hands and he became proprietor, and the firm was Allen, Looker & Disney, familiarly called Dick Disney. Allen was a man of fine presence and engaging manners, and with a thorough knowledge of English literature and English history, he was able to write an article on almost any subject with little preparation. His fine physique gave him, while he resided in Cincinnati, the sobriquet of "The Six-foot Two," which was really his height, and admirably proportioned, by means of which, as a military officer, he was enabled to present an appearance which was envied by many an officer who served with him. His paper, the Republican, went down. Allen remained in Cincinnati until 1836, when the Texas fever broke out. He then raised a company in Cincinnati that was armed, equipped, and provided with the munitions of war in almost every respect, and, taking passage on a steamboat to New Orleans, thence to some Texan port, they went into the contest "to extend the area of freedom," but like almost all of Allen's schemes, his Texas adventure was a failure. The company was disbanded in Texas. Allen and Sam Houston, afterward Senator from Texas in the United States Senate, could not agree, and Allen came home to Stark County, like Francis the First, of Austria, having lost everything but his honor. The citizens of Massillon, of whom the writer was one, recognizing his talents, got together the material for a newspaper, and again set him at work as the editor of the Gazette, revived, after many changes, as noticed elsewhere. Still the phantom, success, was just out of his reach, and his second attempt to conduct a newspaper was a worse failure than the first, seven years before, and he went to Columbus to edit the Daily Journal, which was simply another failure. When the memorable campaign of 1840 came around, Allen, Sage & Beveridge started a paper at Columbus called the "Straight-out Harrisonian," a campaign paper, which, with the election of Gen. Harrison, ceased to exist. Capt. Allen and Gen. Harrison were warm personal friends, and could the President have lived, he would have remembered his earnest friend of many years, whose trenchant pen had vindicated his claims to the presidency against Buckingham, of the Boston Courier, in the palmy days of that well-remembered paper. He did get a clerkship at Washington, but had to surrender that when things there became Tylerized, and he came back to Ohio.

In 1846, when the Mexican war broke out and troops were called for, Allen enlisted and was elected Captain of Co. A, of the First Ohio Regiment, Col. Samuel R. Curtis, afterward Major General of Volunteers in the war of the rebellion, and Member of Congress from Iowa. As the then Ohio regiments were only intended for one year's service, when the year was up the troops were mustered out, and Capt. Allen came home, after having done camp duty a year at Matamoras; he went to his old home at Canton, was elected a Justice of the Peace, and was appointed a Deputy Clerk of the Common Pleas Court of the County. In 1849, on the discovery of gold in California, Capt. Allen determined, like the Argonauts who sailed in search of the Golden Fleece, to sail for California as soon as circumstances would permit him to do so, having a brother-in-law at Marysville, Hon. O. P. Stidger, a Judge of one of the courts, who had gone there in 1849. He left Canton for the Golden State in 1853, and arrived there after a two or three months' journey. He, soon after arriving there, was offered and accepted the position of editor of the Marysville Herald, where he remained for some time. Leaving there, he visited various portions of the State, and finally brought up again at Washoe, Nevada, and, in 1863, was editor of Washoe City Times, a daily. How long he remained there is not known. In 1865, as nearly as can be ascertained, he died suddenly, somewhere in the Sierras; and a truer man, in all that constitutes genuine manhood, than James Allen never lived. Under other circumstances, his name would have been peerless in the list of American writers.

From 1843 to 1848, it is exceedingly difficult to keep track of the changes in the newspaper press in Massillon. At one time, during those few years, the late E. P. Grant had charge of a paper. Also, the late Dr. William Bowen. There was the Massillon News, in 1847, by Messrs. Keith & Miller.

The following, furnished by Joseph K. Merwin, Esq., a practical printer residing in the city, may be regarded as giving a correct account of the newspaper press of Massillon since 1848.

"The Herald of Freedom and Wilmot Proviso was printed in the summer and fall of 1848 as a Free-Soil campaign paper, by E. Burke Fisher, than whom there were few more spirited writers. That year, the Massillon Telegraph was published by Painter & Wilson, and was a Whig paper. It ceased to exist in 1849, and the materials belonging to the office were purchased by a Mr. Hanna, from Circleville. He had a fondness for the name he gave his paper, the Herald, having been connected with the Circleville Herald. The late Hon. William C. Earle and James S. Underhill, Esq., now in Illinois, purchased the material and revived the Massillon News. Mr. Earle soon purchased Mr. Underhill's interest, and edited the paper several years with marked ability and success, when he sold out to Messrs. Logan & Fletcher, who held the paper something over a year, when they sold out to Charles A. Hugus. James E. Wharton bought Hugus out, and continued the publication of the paper until 1857, and then stopped. In 1858, in the early spring, Joseph K. Merwin and David W. Huntsman purchased the material of the News office, and commenced the publication of a paper called the Journal of the Times. After publishing a paper neutral in politics for fifteen months, Mr. Merwin purchased Mr. Huntsman's interest, and continued the paper as a Republican paper until the spring of 1861, when he sold out the good-will and subscription list to Josiah Hartzell, of the Stark County Republican. Soon after, the material composing the office was purchased by Robert & Alexander Harkins, who revived the old Massillon Gazette, and continued it until May, 1862.

After the Harkins Brothers ceased to publish a paper, John Frost, of New Lisbon, the veteran printer of this Congressional District, and Peter Welker, Esq., of the city of Massillon, purchased and commenced the publishing of the Massillon Independent. They were succeeded by Charles E. Taylor, Esq., who continues to publish it. In the meantime, J. W. Garrison removed to Massillon from Alliance, bringing with him a general assortment of printing material, and commenced the publication of the Massillon American November 10, 1869. He was succeeded by Messrs. McCurdy & Geesaman, in August, 1870, and they in turn were succeeded by Messrs. S. & J. J. Hoover, in December, 1870, who have continued the publication of the paper to this time." During all this period other papers have started and gone "where the woodbine twineth." In 1851, the ubiquitous Joseph Wilkinson White started the Wheat City Mercury, which lasted about three months. Dr. Bowen, an enthusiast on the subject of education, at one time published The Free School Clarion, and in 1841, The Genius of Temperance lived as long as the friends of temperance would sustain it. When they ceased its support, it sickened and died, as did more than one hundred temperance papers that sprang into existence that year all over the land under the dispensations of Washingtonian temperance.

That part of Massillon now known as the Fourth Ward, originally as Kendal, was always famous for its celebrities. In its early days, it had its Poet Laureate or Laureates, for they were many, one of whom seemed especially favored.

In 1822, while Thomas Rotch was proprietor of the Kendal Woolen Factory, he had in his employ an Irish weaver, who was in many respects a genius, by the name of Moses McCammon, who, in addition to his being a weaver and at the head of his profession in the handling of the warps and woofs of a piece of cloth, often essayed to scale the rugged heights of Parnassus. His Pegasus used to carry him to the mountain top.

One of his flights brought forth the following. His employer, Thomas Rotch, having sent to Sally McCammon, Moses' wife, a small package of tea, Moses thus acknowledges it in a note to his employer:

Disappointments of view and the courses of fate
Press down on our bosoms with wonderful weight,
But all the annoyance that tends us through life
Is nothing at all to the frowns of a wife.

I have one, who as long as her teapot's supplied,
I seldom have known her to scold or to chide,
But when it is empty, no mortal, I'm sure,
Could bear the abuse I am forced to endure.

Since ever she got what you sent her, she's been
As great in her mind as a Duchess or Queen;
Like a kitten, she skips thro' her house full of glee,
And I am as happy as happy can be.

Elisha Teters

She vows and declares, to the end of her days
While her tongue it can wag she will sound forth your praise,
And she'll work like a Trojan thro' cold and thro'
heat,
And endeavor to make all her endings to meet.

Let speckled faced toppers, so jolly and frisky,
Keep roaring the praises of brandy and whisky;
They may roar till they split, it is nothing to me;
I'll sing while I'm able the virtues of tea.

Tea makes an old woman that's withered and gray
As blithe and as blooming as daisies in May,
And I know very well that it quiets the strife
Which often arises 'twixt husband and wife.

Here, now, I conclude, and as long as the spring
Entices the bushes gay verdure to bring,
Or as long as great Erie produces a salmon,
So long, I'm your Well wisher,

LEXINGTON TOWNSHIP—THE EARLY HISTORY AND PHYSICAL FEATURES—SETTLEMENT BY THE WHITES—PIONEER INDUSTRIES—EDUCATIONAL INFLUENCES—CHURCH HISTORY, ETC.

THE chronological increase of agricultural products, wealth, population of the township, etc., are garnered matters of record, open to research and examination, now as in the future. But the arduous labors, interesting hunting exploits, depredations, heroic fortitude, reminiscences of the Indians, etc., of the pioneers of the township, have their record only in the fading memories which gleam dimly on the incidents of early life. It is the design to incorporate as much of this class of material in the subsequent chapters as has been or as can be reliably obtained.

The facts herein written were obtained some twenty years ago from the first settlers of 1806-08; since then, the last of these, Shadrach Feltz, has passed the threshold of that home, which fast bolts its treasury of early remembrances from the prying scrutiny of inquiring posterity. There are many who sleep in the small, neglected and almost forgotten graveyards of the townships, whose heirloom was heroism, but whose wager of life was hard. They battled with interminable forests, wild beasts and wilder men, and to-day they sleep forgotten. Their hard-earned patrimony is in the fertile fields, early life, happy homes clustering with peace and comfort—a realized legacy to-day. For these bequeathments we will read and write their names anew.

Settlement in Lexington Township was made in 1805-06, by families attached to the Quaker faith, among the first of whom were Amos Holloway, Zaccheus Stanton, Nathan Gaskill, John Grant, David Berry and Jesse Feltz. Amos Holloway emigrated from Loudoun County, Virginia and entered the land that was chosen for the site of the village of Lexington, and, in conjunction with Nathan Gaskill, was the proprietor. The first roads laid out in this township were the ones leading from Deerfield to Canton, diagonally across the township, and the other was from Salem, intersecting the first at the village of Lexington. The first post office was on the first of these routes, located in 1811, three-quarters of a mile west of the town, at the house of the pioneer, Jesse Feltz. The farm is still occupied by his son, Shadrach Feltz, who had the control of the office near twelve years. A weekly mail arrived at this station. It was first carried on horseback by Judeth Farnam. It was considered an extraordinary trip to reach Canton from Deerfield in one day. The same post office was kept till it was laid down in Lexington, by Mr. William Kingsbury, a volunteer soldier in the last war with England, and who was in the reception of a pension from the Government for over thirty years. In an engagement with the British on our northern frontier, he was struck with an ounce lead ball in the occipital region of the head, which deeply embedded itself and was not dislodged by surgical skill until some weeks after the accident. The old man kept the ball and his bloody shirt till his death, which occurred in 1835, as trophies of the danger he encountered through his youthful patriotism. His son, Guy Kingsbury (deceased) represented the county from this township in the lower branch of the Legislature in the year 1833. Mr. Guy Kingsbury was the only resident of the township that ever represented the county in the Legislature, except the Hon. Humphrey Hoover (deceased) who was elected in 1860, and re-elected in 1862. Since then R. G. Williams and E. Hartshorn have served in that capacity. John Kingsbury, a resident of this city, was a brother to Guy Kingsbury. The Ohio Repository, which was published in Canton for more than fifty consecutive years, by the respected pioneer editor, John Saxton, was the first paper received at the first office and read by the first settlers of Lexington Township. The first child born in the township was a daughter to Timothy and Alice Grewell. The first marriage was a daughter of Abraham and Tabitha Wileman to William Beeder, of New Garden. The second marriage was a daughter of William and Mary Pennock, to Matthew Vaughn, of Virginia.

It seems singular to the third generation that the prospecting settlers of Stark County should prefer to pitch their tents on the thin, cold, clay soil, common to the immediate vicinity of Lexington, when much more fertile localities lay in close proximity. The barrens, or that section surrounding Canton, now grown, except where cultivated, with small oaks, was considered, in 1806, to be very worthless land. Time has proven it to be the richest land in the county, and peculiarly adapted to the cultivation of wheat. But there are many influences at work controlling the judgment of locating pioneers; soil and timber kindred to the kind from whence they came is not the least potential. The Mahoning, at this date, was a mighty river, often sweeping to the brow of its secondary embankments, its tributaries yielding it their ever constant supplies, drawn from the humid soil, evaporation shut out by dense, over-arching forests. It is now shorn of its majesty, and dry seasons see it dwarfed to a rivulet. Then the white-barked cottonwood trees, a few of which remain along its course, though prostrated, had no power to dam its waters or stay its course; they were swept as feathers from its channel. The early settlers were of the opinion that the Mahoning was navigable and would be the highway of commerce from the Ohio River to Lexington. This opinion had much to do with the first settlers locating upon its banks and calling that location Lexington in 1805. This stream, which once was deservedly dignified by the title

"river," enters the township on the southern third of its eastern border, runs a circuitous direction and passes out at its northeastern corner. At the time of the first settlement, it was well stocked with fine fish; from its waters the pioneers and Indians drew a supply of food of this kind, equal to all their wants. Notwithstanding its present diminished volume and interrupted waters, many good-sized fish (bass) are yet annually caught. The bank of this stream in this township for sixty-eight consecutive years has had its continuous line of Daniel Waltons. Cotemporary with the settlement made in Lexington Township, one was made at Kendal, now a northern ward of the city of Massillon. It gives the mind a better conception of the wild and chaotic condition of things in that territory six miles square, known as Lexington Township, at the time of its first settlement, viz., 1805, to know that the county of Stark was not organized for four years after this date (1809). The first house in the town of Lexington, and the first with a shingle roof in the township, was built in 1808 by Amos Holloway. In this building the first store was opened, by Gideon Hughes. The heaviest of any one article, as well as the one in which most capital was invested, was earthen-ware. This mercantile enterprise, proving anti-lucrative, was soon abandoned, and this shingle-roofed St. Paul's of Lexington was used as the first house for the assemblage of public worship by the Society of Friends, and in the interim of its religious occupation, was hallowed to the noble use of "teaching the young idea how to shoot." The first pedagogue in this school was Daniel Votaw. This was a subscription school, and conducted in harmony with the views of Friends.

The land of Lexington Township was entered at $2 per acre, and payable in three installments at the land office in Stenbenville. In the reduction of the price of Government land to $1.25 per acre, there was a clause permitting all who had forfeited their land, by not paying the second and third installments, to re-enter Government land at the rate of $1.25 per acre, to the amount of the money they had paid on their forfeited estates. From the scarcity of post-roads, and consequent difficulty of disseminating a knowledge of enacted laws, as well as other news, in these times, the early settlers were generally ignorant of this providing clause in the new land-law, and thought they had lost all under the provisions of the old law. A few men, or rascals, acquainted with the facts in the case, purchased the entry papers of numerous defaulting early settlers, for a few dollars, and paid the balance due or entered new lands to the amount that had been paid upon what had been deemed forfeited patents. The beginning of some of the largest fortunes in this section were laid by dealing in these papers. The morality of the procedure may be a question upon which the posterity of a defrauded ancestry may speculate. A real estate operator, well known in this section of Ohio, obtained a beginning in this way, and died ten years ago worth $1,500,000.

In the war between England and America, in 1812, the British Government sought in the savages, numerous in the West, and in front of the advancing tide of Caucasian civilization, emissaries to assist in the dominancy of their arms. Prior to this period, the Indians of Lexington Township were numerous. The red men throng and linger where game abounds. The forests here were alive with game, and the waters of the river filled with fish. From the earliest settlement of the township until the war, the conduct of the Indians toward the white settler was pacific, if not kind. This, to an extent, was referable to the fact that the first whites were disciples of William Penn, and the kind, peaceable disposition of the members of the tribe inhabiting the township. We have no savage brutality upon their part, occurring in the township, to record. One white man was shot, the ball passing through both eyes and the bridge of the nose, yet lived deprived of sight. His name was Daniel Diver. He died in Deerfield in 1850, where the shooting occurred. It sprang out of a horse trade. The Indians trapped game on the Mahoning, Beech Creek and Deer Creek, all larger streams than now, but they had no permanent settlement in the township. Another feature which attracted the Indians to Lexington Township, besides the abundance of game, was the large, compact groves of sugar trees peculiar to the township, from which they obtained a supply of the saccharine element. Some of the trees yet show the scarifications and girdlings adopted by them to obtain the water. It was also the current belief among the people of the township, even as late as 1840, that the Indians obtained their supply of lead from this immediate vicinity. At the time of the first white settlers the Indians possessed many of the common implements incident to frontier civilization, such as guns, hatchets, axes, kettles, etc. The chief encampment of the tribe found in this township was four miles south of New Philadelphia, in what was then Coshocton County. But it was then common for Indians to stay over the hunting season, committing no depredation, and remaining kind and deferential to the whites. The exact spot of one of their primitive mills is a little south of Mr. Haines' orchard. The machinery consisted of a stump hollowed out and a sapling bent over; to the pendant extremity of which was attached by thongs of tough bark a large stone, which, by bearing on the bent sapling, played upon the maze in the concavity of the stump, which would reduce it rapidly and effectually. Suspicion is a strong, latent or developed trait in the Indian character. They raised the war-whoop against the settlers in 1813. Some few settlers of the township left through fear, for more populous and better protected localities, but Commodore Perry put an effectual quietus upon the unnatural and barbarous coalition formed by England against Americans; and the Indians, left unsupported by British gold, rum and influence, grew sullen and suspicious—stopped all intercourse with the whites of the township, and withdrew to unoccupied, or new hunting-grounds. After 1813, only a traveling or passing Indian was seen in the township. Occasionally an Indian grave is by accident opened, revealing only some rude device for hunting less perishable than their bones—flint, darts and stone axes being now and then turned up by the plowman. These, with the traditions we have recorded are the only reminders that they ever trod the soil of the township. Let them go from other places as from here, their destruction is fixed and necessary everywhere; we have no sentiment to waste on a savage.

Wild game, at the settlement of Lexington township, was very plenty, with the exception of beaver, which, being very scarce at first, soon entirely disappeared. Otters and muskrats were trapped by the Indians until 1813, on the Mahoning. Bears were very plenty and destructive on hogs as late as 1815. They would seize a hog that would weigh one hundred pounds, in their fore paws, and run direct with it to the forest. If the hog was too large for them to manage in this manner, they would jump on it, guiding it with their fore feet, and stimulating it by gnawing its neck, thus ride it to the woods and destroy it. A large specimen of the bruin species, engaged in this equestrian exercise, was shot by Shadrach Feltz, (a pioneer living about one mile west of Lexington, on the road to Limaville). Its weight was two hundred pounds. The Bucephalus of its choice was a large hog belonging to Mr. Feltz. Bears attack swine by gnawing the tops of their heads and shoulders. A hog belonging to Nathan Gaskill had stayed away in search of mast; it returned with its eyes out and its skull bone exposed. This hog, though scalped and blinded by bruin, lived and was fattened by Gaskill. The last bear seen in the township was in 1830. A large tract of land that is low and level, consisting of ten or fifteen feet of turfy vegetable deposit, resting on a body of water about three feet deep, upon which East Alliance is now built, was known to the earliest settlement of the township as the "Bear Swamp." This wet or swamp land was covered with a dense growth of alder bushes, ten or fifteen feet high, which formed an excellent rendezvous for bears. From its being their covert, it received the name of "Bear Swamp." But there are no alder bushes or swamp or bears there now, and the title is fast losing its significance.

Isaac Teeters—who don't know Isaac? He has been for years an essential feature of the P., Ft. W. & C. R. R. at this point. Isaac and Peter Chance each lost an arm by the premature discharge of an old cast cannon, with which they were trying to give character to a national birthday in Williamsport, over thirty years ago. Isaac well remembers his father, Jonathan, going to this swamp to hunt deer, always returning to his home laden with bear, deer or otter. Deer, in 1806-07, in Lexington Township, were as abundant as sheep are now, and continued abundant until the great snow storm of 1817, which thawed a little, then froze, thus forming a crust which incapacitated them from traveling; hundreds of them starved to death. This protracted snow starved many other varieties of game. The great snow of 1817 is yet ominously referred to by old people now, but young and vigorous at that date, and battling bravely with the vicissitudes and obstacles of frontier life. The snow averaged a depth of four feet, and continued on the ground near four months. Deer could illy travel on the frozen crust of the snow, and if they broke through, they could not extricate themselves, and consequently perished by the score. Wolves were numerous and the wary and common enemy of the sheep the settlers were trying to introduce, which could only be preserved by penning them up through the night and guarding them through the day. Turkeys, between the years of 1806 and 1820, were seen in great flocks, often numbering hundreds. Porcupines were very thick; they are strictly vegetarian in their habits, living on bark, roots, buds and wild fruits. There are none now in this section. A price is paid to see them in traveling menageries. Rabbits and quails were very scarce in early times. These and some other animals are a link between domestic and absolutely wild or untamable animals; they flourish better under the shadow of a sparse population. There are more of them to-day in the township than there were fifty years ago. From 1805 to 1820, deer skins were worth 75 cents; raccoon skins, 25 cents; otter skins, $4, and bear skins, $1.25. Rattlesnakes, in early times, in Lexington Township, were quite common, and very numerous. In 1812, one struck an ox above the eye, which speedily caused his death. The ox was owned by John Grant, father-in-law of R. J. Haines. Grant's first cabin was about twenty feet north of L. L. Lamborn's stable. The debris of the cabin was partially exhumed by the plow last fall. The last rattlesnake seen in the township was caught by the writer in 1850, on the grounds now owned and occupied by the Mt. Union College. It was captured by inducing it to enter a barrel laid on its side, and when in, the barrel was straightened up; it was two feet long and had eight rattles. It was kept and experimented with for four months. It took no nourishment during this long time but a small, green-colored snake, nine inches long. When first captured, this snake was very poisonous; it struck a quail on the thigh, which caused its death in five minutes. From confinement and improper nourishment it gradually lost its poisonous qualities. It is a traditionary practice with hunters traveling grounds infested with this reptile to stuff their boots or shoes with white ash leaves, believing them to be an effectual remedy against the attack of the rattlesnake. So far as this snake was concerned, it was found to be but a traditionary practice, for it would dart its head into a bunch of white ash leaves as quickly as it would into a tuft, bush or elder leaves.

Bees were abundant in the township in early times; wild honey was an article of export second only to maple sugar. The value of honey from 1806 to 1815 averaged about 12 cents per pound or $1 per gallon. The pioneers were very expert in ferreting out bee-trees. They noticed the direction a bee would take when heavily laden with the sweets of a wild flower, and that direction would be in a straight line to the hollow tree in which the swarm rendezvoused. The tree were also found by the drones of the hive which had been killed by the workers and thrown out and lay dead at the roots of the tree. And in the early warm days of the spring the bees would be drawn out of their winter quarters and make a peculiar buzzing noise; these and many other devices were oft resorted to by the sharpened senses of the bee hunter to find this hidden treasure. It is singular how quick the civilized Caucasian becomes an expert in all the shrewd tactics of the savage, to circumvent and capture all kinds of game; these capabilities have been supposed to belong exclusively to the Indian race, but frontier life on the continent has developed many white hunters far superior to any red men of whom we have any account. Squirrels were not so plenty at the period of the first settlement of the township as they were twenty years after. Black squirrels at first were the only ones seen. About 1820, the gray variety made its appearance, and the few that remain at this date are of this kind. In 1840, the red squirrel made its advent into this section and is now altogether the most numerous species. In 1827, there was a hegira of squirrels; they were so numerous that they destroyed the farmers' crops. There was a squirrel hunt organized this year; a sum, or purse of money, was raised,—the hunters were to receive this money in proportion to the number of squirrels they shot. They were all to hunt on the same day, and meet in Mount Union in the evening, count the scalps and receive their pro rata of the fund. Job Johnson was purse holder, and Nathan Gaskill judge. E. N. Johnson, Sr., shot 55,

Charles May, 170, etc., and in all they killed in one day seventeen hundred squirrels. Thomas Grant took the premium for killing the greatest number. He now resides in Williams County, Ohio. In the year 1821, wolves were very numerous, and so bold they would attack stock of any kind. A little west of Freedom, on the farm now occupied by Mr. Elisha Teeters, a pack of these animals attacked and killed a six-years-old cow that belonged to John Grant. About this period, the last otters were killed in the Mahoning and its tributaries. Clayton Grant, now living in Bourbon, Kosciusko Co., Ind., shot the last deer, and caught the last otter seen in Lexington Township. In the year 1818, a Mr. Hubbard lived one mile east of the town of Lexington. He, as well as Mrs. Hubbard, were excellent rifle shots, and often amused themselves by shooting at a mark. But death came into the family and left Mrs. Hubbard a widow, with four children depending upon her for the necessities of life. To illustrate the trials, fortitude and heroism of a pioneer mother, the following incident is given: About dusk one evening, a sow that had a brood of pigs by the side of a large log, in the woods a little south of Mr. Hubbard's cabin, was heard demonstrating in a way peculiar to hogs when menaced with danger; Mrs. Hubbard, with the quick sense of a hunter, at once suspected the cause of the threatened peril to the pigs, took her trusty rifle from its resting place, and with a courage that would blanch half the men in the township to-day, went to the scene of the trouble; when within a hundred paces, she barely discovered the dim outlines of a great she-wolf battling with the sow. With insufficient light to see the sights upon the gun, she fired. The wolf not knowing from which direction the shot came, or intending to attack her, sprang toward her and fell dead at her feet. Mrs. Hubbard drew the knife from her hunting girdle, and skinned the wolf, threw the skin over her shoulder and started in the supposed direction of her cabin. In this she was mistaken and bewildered. It was now blank darkness, and she wandered in the woods all that night and all next day, in the vain search of her humble home and little ones. Again night donned its sable mantle, and to mock its blackness, lit it up with stars, beneath which, and the somber, spectral gloom of arching primitive forests, moved the wearied steps and beat the anxious heart of that brave mother. After thirty hours of travel and counter-travel, and circlings in the woods of almost tropical denseness, she caught a ray of light, which, on nearing, proved to be a glimmer escaping from between the rude logs of her rustic home, though to her more than a palace, for it contained her children, a mother's priceless jewels. Mrs. Hubbard's second husband was a Hazen, by whom she had three children—Daniel, Simeon and Valentine—uncles to the present generation of Hazens in Lexington Township. This circumstance was related to E. N. Johnson by Mrs. Hubbard herself, and he thinks he is not mistaken as to her being grandmother to our living citizens of that name; to say the least, they are worthy enough to be her offspring, and she was brave enough to be their grandmother.

Up to 1812, salt was very high and scarce; it had to be packed on horseback from Cleveland or Conneaut. The first barrel ever teamed into the township was in 1814, and cost $12. A few years after this, manufactories of salt were established on Yellow Creek, from which source the early settlers obtained their supplies, at a cost of $6 a barrel. The first improvement east of Alliance was on the then called "Mercer Clearing," afterward known as the "Oyster Farm;" it is now owned and occupied by James Hoiles. The farm lies at the junction of the county line road and the Mt. Union road. The only house or cabin in 1818 between Salem and this point was one half a mile this side of Damascus, built and used by a Mr. Morris, who was grandfather to the Hon. James Bruff, who now owns the spot of these primitive improvements. How strangely are the conveniences enjoyed to-day contrasted with those of the settlers of this township at the beginning of the present century, when it is remembered that Charles Hamlin, father-in-law to Shadrach Feltz, Nathan Gaskill, father-in-law to Joshua Hamlin, residing now just west of Alliance, and other persons, had to go to the mouth of the Little Beaver to get their grain converted into flour. Corn was brought down the Ohio in barges, from the Monongahela region, and landed at the Little Beaver. From this source the first settlers obtained their supplies, until these "openings" or "clearings" would yield them a sufficiency. It required three days to go to mill and bring home two bushels of corn meal on horseback. The next approximation to a flouring-mill to these localities was one erected in the vicinity of New Lisbon. It only requiring two days to go and return from mill; this mill was considered quite convenient, and supplied all further demands in the way of luxury for a number of years. The next great move, in the mill line, toward degeneracy upon the part of the vigorous pioneers of Lexington Township, was to have flouring machinery so luxuriously near to their cabin doors, that they could visit it with their batch of corn and return in a single day. So to meet this voluptuous demand, a mill was erected on the waters of the Mahoning, in Deerfield Township, Portage County, and long known as the "Laughlin Mill." It was owned and run by the father of Harvey Laughlin, Esq., a citizen of this city. A satiety of epicurean convenience was at last reached, but the cause of development and decay was at work, as it always has been and always will be. It ran Rome and Greece from noble, vigorous men to voluptuous imbeciles, and both became the easy prey of hardy enemies, who were destined to run this, the same course, and leave the track open for successors. It was true at the advent of the "Laughlin Mills;" the settlers of Lexington Township had not reached the epicurean sensuality of Romans, at the era of their greatest debauchery, but their yearnings were in that direction. Powdered diamonds could not be drunk, but linsey-woolsey trousers could be substituted for buckskin breeches. The aromatic fruits of the tropics were not of easy access, but a flouring-mill run by water, with wooden gudgeons, and costing the enormous fortune of $400 or $800, could be built within a stone throw of their clapboard cabin doors. There was the sweeping current of the Mahoning, made into a highway of commerce by legislative enactments, restless to revolve the ponderous machinery.

The first grist-mill in Lexington Township was south of the town of Lexington, on the river; it was built by Aaron Stratton. A saw-mill was built in conjunction with the mill. It was on the latter mill that Job Holloway, son of the pioneer, Amos Holloway, lost his life by the falling of a beam. Job Holloway was the father of Mrs. William Antrum, now living with her excellent husband on a finely-cultivated farm immediately west of Mt. Union. Treble the quantity of rain fell in early times that falls

now. The Mahoning was subject to three or four frightful freshets every year, inundating all the bottom lands. The river, restive of all first restraints upon its swollen waters, washed away the first enterprise of the kind attempted in the township. The next mill built in the township was by Bryan Elliot, on the less angry and more generous waters of Deer Creek, about one mile west of the village of Limaville. This mill, though frequently repaired, has run continuously since its first erection. In 1818, a grist and saw mill of some greater pretensions was built in Williamsport by Johnson & Pennock, on the Mahoning. The water being insufficient at times, steam was introduced. It is at present in successful operation under the management of Kirk & Co. This mill has been successively owned by Thomas Grant, John Grant, John Miller, M. Miller, C. Russell, Buckman & Co., and others whose names are not obtained. Mr. Burgett, formerly of Paris Township, erected, about 1863, a steam grist-mill in Alliance, which has run continuously under his management since it was first started. The Limaville Mill, Kirk & Co's "City Mills" and Burgett's Mill are the three flouring-mills now in operation in Lexington Township. The proprietors of these mills are all fine citizens, and their respective brands of flour have a good reputation in the market. An incident is related to illustrate the jollifications of the settlers. In 1818, at the opening of the Williamsport Mill, John Meese, a hunter of considerable note, had a large and ferocious male bovine, which he had broken, to be led and carry burdens. He ladened this bull with a bag of corn, rustically ornamented his horns, and mounted on his back one of his boys that could play the fife, and to its sprightly music he led the beast to the new mill with the first grist ever ground in Alliance. Saw-mills are more transitory in their lives than grist-mills. Rolla Day built the first saw mill in Lexington Township on the Mahoning. A saw-mill was connected with the Williamsport grist-mill; one was built on Rockhillton Creek, on the farm now owned by David Rockhill; one in Freedom, east of the present steam mill; one in Limaville; one about one mile west of Limaville; one on Beech Creek, in the neighborhood of John Taylor's; one on Little Beech Creek, in the settlement of David Minser; another in the Hively neighborhood, on or adjoining lands owned by Jacob Lower. The ruins of one are seen on a small brook west of the Scranton farm, north of Lexington. There have been from ten to twelve water saw-mills built in the township, but none have been erected since 1840. The ruins of some of the above located mills are found on what are now not even rivulets, water scarcely passing by the ruined tail-races of these former mills, in the wettest season.

Steam saw-mills have supplanted water mills; there have been five of these mills in the township; one was built in Alliance by George Stroup, in 1857, sold by him to Watson & Barnaby, and now owned by the latter member of that firm. Another steam saw-mill was located north of Strong & Lower's warehouse, one at or near Carr's Corners, and one on lands owned by Mr. Greenshields, three and one-half miles northwest of Alliance, and one west of Limaville. The era of saw-mills of all kinds has about passed. In this township, timber is comparatively scarce and indifferent for sawing purposes. Pine and hemlock are brought into the city from the Saginaw region and sold as low as the native timber of the township. But little sawed timber was used or needed prior to the era of water saw-mills. The first sawed lumber commanded a value equal to 25 cents per hundred feet from 1815 to 1820. It was worth 50 cents a hundred feet from this date till 1845, when it brought in trade at Canton from 75 cents to $1 per hundred feet. After this period, the rapid development of the country and the increase of manufacturing, the price of lumber in the township has gradually advanced, till it has reached its present price, viz., $2 per hundred feet for hard wood, beech, sugar, elm, oak, etc.; white cucumber and poplar commanded at the mills from $2 to $2.50 per hundred feet. This is probably the maximum price which sawed lumber of the township will ever reach, for the reason that the quality is fast deteriorating, and hemlock and pine are now imported by the lumber merchants, and sold at the quoted rates.

The town of Lexington was surveyed in lots in 1807, and duly christened after that spot on the continent which witnessed the first contest of British and Colonial arms, and inaugurated the Revolution of 1776. The name was historical, and the anticipations of its founders doubtless great. By legislative decree, the Mahoning was made a public highway of commerce. Provisions were made in the survey for all necessary docks and wharves. Imagination possibly saw the first occupied with masts, whose spars floated the flags of other nations, and the latter piled with the exports of the North and the products of the Gulf. It can easily be imagined how metropolitan this town, laying claim to such grand expectations, was held by the primitive settlers. Williamsport was not laid out for twenty years thereafter, and then was suburban to Lexington. Freedom followed in twenty-one years. Mount Union in twenty-three years. At or soon after the founding of the city of Lexington, ex-President Grant's father lived in the adjoining township of Deerfield, and was engaged in the tanning business. Capt. Oliver, once Mayor of Alliance, William Vincent, James Garrison and other citizens attending the National Convention at Chicago in 1868, which nominated for the Chief Executive of the United States U. S. Grant. The Captain and his comrades went to the headquarters of the Ohio Delegation, and found the Deerfield tanner there. They were introduced to the old gentleman, who inquired where they were from. They informed him from Alliance. He said he had no remembrance of that place or of any of the surrounding towns, which they named. The Captain then told him they lived about midway between Canton and Salem. He then remarked they must be from the town of Lexington. The town of Lexington had a tavern, a store, a Friends' meeting-house, and a school; it had the thrift and economy common to Quakers; it had an expected future, and besides these grand frontier privileges, it had a weekly post office, and was the headquarters of news for a large adjacent district. Mount Union had no post office for twenty years after one was established in Lexington. Freedom had none for nearly forty years thereafter.

The post office in Freedom was established in 1848. David G. Hester was the first appointed. He held the position eighteen months. The first mail to Alliance or Freedom brought one paper, the Ohio Repository, and one letter. The gross receipts for the first quarter were $17. The position was responsible, and the distributive labors of the office arduous. David resigned, and Robert N. Buck (deceased), the father of Dr. R. M. Buck, formerly a physician of this place, was his successor. Mr. Hester kept the post office at his then residence, facing the Central Union School grounds. Mr. Buck then owned and occupied the grounds now known as "Garrison's Garden," at which point he dealt out the installments of news for three months. Not relishing the duties of the position, he sought a resignation and a successor for three months more, when one turned up in the person of Thomas Beer, a telegraph operator, occupying a room in the frame depot building, since burned, located opposite the present brick depot. Mr. Beer was an ardent Democrat. He turned his attention to the law; moved to Bucyrus, Crawford Co., Ohio, and has gained some eminence in his profession. He has been twice honored by the citizens of that county with a seat in the councils of the State. Mr. Beer's successor was H. Laughlin, Esq., who held the office during the last two years of Buchanan's administration. The post office during his term was in the building now occupied by J. M. Webb as a restaurant. On the accession of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency, D. G. Hester was again appointed to the position of Postmaster, and held the same for six years. A part of the time the office was in the building now occupied by Leek & McElroy as a provision store, and the balance of the time in the room now owned and used by Mr. Hester as a book and stationery store. Mr. Hester yielded the post office to Wilson Culbertson through the persuasion of one Andrew Johnson. Mr. Culbertson located the office in the room now occupied by Dr. Fogle as a drug store. His lease of office continued only six months, when it was yielded to the Hon. Humphrey Hoover, and returned to Mr. Hester's store. It continued under the management of Mr. Hoover for eighteen months. Mr. Henry Shreve, an assistant in the office under Mr. Hoover, was his successor, and has served the position of Postmaster acceptably to the departments and to the people for four years, and was re-appointed for another four-year lease. Mr. Shreve had the office in Mr. James Vallilley's building, on the west side of the public square. It requires three persons in the post office to discharge the labor. What better commentary on the development and growth of Lexington Township could be found, than the statement, that, in 1848, the receipts of the post office at this point were $17 per quarter; in 1873, they were over $1,500, and in 1881 $1,800 per quarter. The people of the township are further supplied with postal conveniences at Limaville and Mount Union. The offices at these points may be referred to in a subsequent chapter. A colony of colored people located in Lexington Township, one mile east of Williamsport, that being the name of the few buildings on the north side of the Mahoning River. This people had a church at the above-mentioned point, and they called themselves "Christ's Disciples." All that remains of that church now is a narrow strip of land thrown out to the commons, on the north side of the highway running east, and overgrown by brambles. This was their burying ground. This settlement of colored people comprised about 200 souls, and was made up chiefly of fugitives and freedmen from Virginia. They were orderly, industrious, and esteemed good citizens. Messrs. I. Price, Roland Bracy and E. Hamlin officiated in the church in the administration of the Word. An anecdote is related of one of their preachers, as occurring in the heated summary of his discourse, establishing the doctrine that they were God's peculiar people. He touchingly referred to the lamb-like tufts of wool upon their heads as conclusive upon the point that they were his especial lambs. This church and settlement is now, and has been for years, entirely broken up. From this point, two fugitives were recaptured and consigned to a life of hopeless toil. Logan County, in this State, and Lower Canada were the two chief points to which they emigrated. In 1850, there were only 39 colored residents in Lexington Township; in 1860, there were 157; 38 in the Limaville Precinct, and 119 in the Alliance Precinct; in 1870, there were 201 colored citizens in the township; 66 in the Limaville Precinct, and 134 in the Alliance Precinct. This people possesses, in a large degree, the religious element. They have a church in Alliance, organized in 1870, by "Uncle Josie Armstrong," a colored man of large brain, and possessing great power as a preacher and great unction in prayer. This organization is called the African Methodist Church. It has no regular Pastor at present, and is languishing, embracing only from fifteen to twenty members.

Prior to 1812, there was no necessity for sawed lumber in the township. The floors of the cabins were made of "punchcons," their roofs were covered with "clapboards," rived from straight-grained oak timber, their sides of round logs, their doors of heavy clapboards and swung on wooden hinges; their window consisted of a couple of feet cut from one of the side logs and the hole covered with greased paper. The chimney and fire-place was a magnificent affair, the latter often occupying the entire end of the cabin, and the base of it was built of "nigger-head" stones or "bog-ore," and the balance of the chimney above the contact of the fire, was built on the outside of the cabin, of cross-sticks and tempered clay. These cabins made one room, were one story high and a "loft." The furniture consisted of a rude table and stools of primitive style. In some instances, there were two doors in the same cabin directly opposite, and logs ten feet long and eighteen inches in diameter were drawn with a horse into the cabin, and then rolled into the capacious fire-place. A few green logs of this size, when fairly ablaze, would bid defiance to the coldest weather. This form of architecture was followed, not precisely by the Corinthian, but by an improved hewed log house. The logs were flattened on both sides, the joists were hewed, the flooring sawed, and the buildings were mostly two stories high; the roofs were made of rived, and often shaved, oak shingles, fastened to the sheeting with nails which would now be obtained at 25 cents per pound. The windows were few, but consisted of a four-light sash window, made to hold 8x10 glass; the crevices between the logs were filled by juggles, and then neatly plastered on the in and out side with well tempered yellow clay, of which article there has never been any scarcity in the township. The outside ponderous chimney of the round-log cabin was moved to the inside of the hewed-log house. This kind of a house was warm and neat, and also aristocratic, until John Grant, in 18—, built a commodious two-story brick house, west and across the ravine from where Amos Coates now lives.

There have been three woolen mills in Lexington Township. One was built south of Lexington, on the Mahoning, by W. S. Miller; it was sold by him to one Snyder, under whose management the enterprise failed. It was then purchased by Lawrence Alexander, under whose practical control it manufactured a variety of fabrics for clothing, as well as carded wool. This mill was burned. Mr. Alexander removed to Canton, and now owns and runs fine woolen mills in that city. Another woolen mill was built in Limaville by William Hicklen and sold to M. Allison, and then purchased by Elias Hoover. During the administration of the above parties, the mill was operated for the purpose for which it was built; but Mr. Hoover sold it to John Ware for a chair factory, and while thus occupied it was burned. The third and last mill of this description was built on the Freedom side of the Mahoning. The race is yet to be seen, about which a law suit was commenced at the time the mill was ready to go into operation, which defeated the project, and the machinery was moved to the northern part of Portage County.

"Nothing so dear as a tale of the olden time."

The differences being so great between the surroundings of life in Lexington Township sixty years ago and what they are to-day, many might conclude that those old veterans of pioneer life had deprivations and hardships without any interims of pleasure. Such a conclusion is very wide of the mark; they had their recreations and festivals. The brain power and moral tension for wealth was not so great then, and more frequently relaxed than it is to-day. Democracy pervades society in frontier life, wealth and development are the lever-arms upon which aristocracy treads to power. Democracy is equality and humanity; border and dependent life compels it. Aristocracy is enthroned selfishness; wealth and its purchases permit it. The pioneers, outside of superior social enjoyment common among early settlers, enjoyed a delirious pleasure when, with their sinewy arms, they grappled with the ferocious bear. They felt a wild enjoyment when the fleeting stag fell dead in his lightning course, through the agency of their unerring rifles. This exhilarating and manly sport may be startling to the pampered, effeminate sons of luxury. Those iron-armed, resolute settlers might have been unlearned in books, but they were wise and ennobled from an admitted converse and intimacy with nature, when her grandeur was undefaced by man's spoiling art.

The population of Lexington Township in 1820 was 165, all enumerated. In 1830, it was 869; in 1840, 1,600. The value of personal property in 1853 was $122,808, with $31,968 of an increase over the previous year. The value of real estate in 1853 was $183,783, with $15,175 of an increase over the value of the same property the year previous—there being three times more of an increase of real estate than in any township in the county, save Canton and Perry. In 1852, Lexington Township had 6,000 acres of wheat, which yielded 13,564 bushels. The same year was cut 506 acres of corn, which produced 15,627 bushels. The soil of Lexington Township is thin and clayey. White oak timber was the chief variety in the northeast corner; the other sections grew more poplar, maple, beech, chestnut, etc. The soil in the neighborhood of the town of Lexington seemed originally quite productive, but from bad husbandry or a deficiency of the proper elements of a good soil, it must be regarded as the poorest in the county. Politics never caused much excitement in this township until the log-cabin and hard-cider campaign of 1840, since which time there has been a sufficiency of zeal manifested on all election occasions. The stores in the township in 1823 were owned by Jacob Shilling, Limaville; Stephen Hamlin, Lexington; Akey & Culbertson, Limaville; Mathias Hester, Freedom; Job Johnson, Mt. Union.

Making a grand total since 1826 until 1872 of $415,781.07. These amounts of course include Alliance, as well as the other portions of the township. No tax duplicate has been made for Alliance separately, except that of 1872, when it was made in a separate list, and, for the sake of convenience, has since been made so.

The municipal government of Limaville was organized on April 3, 1841, by the election of Isaac Winans as Mayor. The following is a list of Mayors elected by the citizens of the corporation since that time until 1870 :

“ ‘Tis education that forms the common mind,
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined.”

The first school ever opened in Lexington Township was in the town of Lexington, in the year 1809. The first school teacher in that school was Daniel Votaw. It was a subscription school, and under the management of the Society of Friends. A few years thereafter, a subscription school was opened in the vicinity of Limaville. The first school held in the Alliance section of the township was held in a vacated cabin on the land now owned by Clement Rockhill, just west of the fair grounds. It was taught by Andy Murran in the year 1820. It will be remembered that the present common-school system of the State was not instituted or organized until after 1824, consequently, all schools, prior to this date, were temporary, springing up in this or that locality, and living two or three months, as the school necessities of a neighborhood seemed to give them birth. They were held in vacated cabins, and the teachers paid by subscription. To Stark County belongs the credit of having sent a representative to the State Legislature in 1822, who introduced the first bill which was ever introduced into the Legislature for the establishing and regulating of common-schools in Ohio. The experience of almost half a century has rendered changes in the law necessary ; but to the Stark County representative be the credit of having introduced a system of common schools that has, with its amendments, been found sufficiently comprehensive to educate all the children in the State. Every man who has lived in Stark County long enough to remember, and has noticed the current of events, can call to mind the opposition that burst upon Mr. Lathrop on his return to his constituency. A howl went up against taxation and against Mr. Lathrop; but he was not to be driven from his purposes.

The School Board has wisely adopted the distributive system of schools; locating one Primary Department in Webb's Addition to the northeast section of the town; one on Market street, in the southwest section; one in Lamborn's Addition, in the southern section. The School Board asked the voters to grant funds in the way of self-imposed tax to erect a fourth building to meet a growing want in the southeast section of the town. The three Primary Departments are clever, substantial, two-story brick structures, which have been built at a cost of about $2,000 each to the people.

The following official census report of the city of the number of youths between the age of five and twenty-one years, for the years 1867-72, inclusive; also the number of children under five years of age for the year 1872:

1867—Number of children between five and twenty-one years of age, 610; 1868, 1,002; 1869, 1,128; 1870, 1,255; 1871, 1,393; 1872, number of children under five years of age, 698.

The history of Lexington Township would be incomplete, should it fail to speak of an institution, which more than any other in the county, was humble and unpromising in its origin; yet, with objects based on the wants of the people, has overcome almost insurmountable obstacles, and stands to-day a source of usefulness high in the confidence of the people. A six-room schoolhouse was erected in 1856. A system of graded schools, under the State laws of 1849, was organized, in March, 1857. Under this organization, schools were opened in four rooms, in charge of a Superintendent, with the total number of youth of school age in the district amounting to 360. The number of youth of school age in September, 1880, was 1,452. The number of rooms occupied in 1880, and each in charge of a separate teacher, was 19, and the number of schoolhouses at that date, each containing from two to six rooms, was 5. The buildings are located to suit the convenience of younger pupils. The following gentlemen have served as Superintendents during the term specified: J. K. Pickett, George Hester, Jesse Markham, D. M. Miller, W. H. Dressler, C. Y. Kay, J. F. Richards, and at present Mr. Dressler is again in charge, and discharging the responsible duties acceptably to the people. The public schools of Alliance have attained a high degree of efficiency in organization, course of study, discipline, method of instruction and proficiency in the substantial studies, justly placing them in the front rank of the better class of schools in the State.

As nearly as can now be ascertained, the first Methodist society of Lexington Township was formed in the village of Lexington in 1819. It consisted of a class of six members, of whom Thomas Wood was appointed leader. It was perhaps in the autumn of the same year that Lexington became a regular preaching-place in connection with what was called Mahoning Circuit, with Calvin Rutter and John Stewart preachers. The society first worshiped in private dwellings, then in an old schoolhouse. In 1827, they erected the first Methodist Episcopal Church built in the township. It was a rude affair, constructed of white oak logs, puncheon seats, minus backs. In this homely structure, they worshiped with slow but steady growth, until their present neat and comfortable building was erected. Some members of the first society still survive. In 1840, a class was formed, and preaching established in what was then called Williamsport, in connection with Salem Circuit, Brother M. L. Weekly preacher in charge. The society worshiped in private dwellings for a year or two, when they fitted up an old wheelwright-shop for the purpose. In this extemporized church, a series of meetings were held, under the superintendence of the Rev. S. D. Kinear, which resulted in the conversion and addition to the church of about ninety persons. Among them was Henry Chance, the popular temperance lecturer, known as the "Buckeye Broadaxe." Mr. Chance is still living, and doing effective work in the cause of temperance. This large addition to the society encouraged the hitherto little band to inaugurate a movement to secure, if possible, a house of their own in which to worship. The result was the erection of the frame building in which the Friends now hold service, located in what was called Freedom. Here the society worshiped with constant growth until 1865, when the house, becoming too small for the congregation, it was sold about the 1st of May to the Society of Friends, who repaired it, and still occupy it as a place of worship. The congregation, then under the superintendence of Brother A. B. Leonard, engaged in a new church enterprise, which culminated in the erection of the brick building in which they worship. This society has a membership of about 400, which is constantly increasing.

The Sabbath School connected with the charge is one of the largest in Eastern Ohio. It is under the supervision of an able body of officers and teachers, and is in a flourishing condition. The Society is contemplating a radical improvement of their church building, which is greatly needed. The truth is, Alliance ought to have better church accommodations and we have no doubt if the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church will undertake the erection of a first-class church, they will have the earnest co-operation of the citizens generally, and will deserve the everlasting gratitude of every one ambitious for the improvement of the growing young city of Alliance. In 1841, a society was formed and preaching established in Mt. Union, by Rev. M. L. Weekly. This congregation has steadily prospered and is now in a flourishing condition. Mount Union, it is well known, is the seat of Mount Union College.

A Methodist society has existed for years at Limaville. From a feeble start it has grown into a vigorous band of Christian workers, numbering some fifty communicants, have a fine sabbath school and a neat church. There are now, in Lexington Township, about ten hundred members of the Methodist Episcopal Church! Over twelve hundred Sabbath school scholars, and over $300,000 worth of church and college property. Besides all this, a large number of the members of the church here, from time to time moved to other sections of the country, while many have gone to that better land. This is but a brief and imperfect sketch of the history of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Lexington Township. It is the best we can do with our present limited data. The following is a list of Methodist ministers who have served charges in Lexington Township and Alliance station since the church was organized, in the fall of 1839, with the dates of their respective appointments :

July 17, 1839—Simon Elliot (deceased), M. L. Weekly.

July 15, 1840—Joseph Montgomery (transferred), Thomas Thompson (deceased).

July 13, 1842—G. D. Kinnear, J. Tribby.

July 12, 1843—J. Murry.

July 10, 1844—J. Murry (located), Hosea McCall.

July 2, 1845—Robert Wilkins (superannuated), Hosea McCall, Henry Ambler (expelled).

July 1, 1846—David Hess, N. Gilmore (located):

June 30, 1847—Hiram Gilmore (transferred), James H. White (transferred).

July 5, 1847—John Huston, H. Rogers.

June, 1849—Z. H. Gastin (superannuated).

June, 1850—Joshua Monroe (superannuated), Richard Jordan.

June 28, 1852—Aaron H. Thomas (deceased), John Ainsley.

June 23—Hugh D. Fisher (transferred).

June 20, 1854—Samuel Wakefield (superannuated).

June 13, 1855—John Wright, Samuel Crow.

June, 1856—J. C. High, S. Burt.

April 29, 1857—Lewis J. Dales, F. D. Fast.

April 28, 1858—David B. Campbell.

April 27, 1859—M. S. Kendig, R. Morrow.

March 20, 1861—A. E. Ward.

March 19, 1862—T. Storer.

March 18, 1863—Wesley Smith, T. S. Hodgson.

March 10, 1864—A. B. Leonard.

March 15, 1865—John Williams.

March 17, 1869—George W. Johnson.

March 15, 1871—S. P. Woolf.

March, 1876—S. L. Binkley.

March, 1881—L. W. Day.

Of the above list, five have died, five are superannuated, three have located, six have been transferred to another conference, one expelled. Thus, out of forty-seven ministers, twenty-six only are in the work.

CHAPTER XVII.*

THE TOWN OF ALLIANCE—GROWTH AND ADVANCEMENT—BUSINESS INDUSTRIES—SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES—THE PRESS—CHURCHES, SUNDAY SCHOOLS, ETC.—BENEVOLENT ORGANIZATIONS.

ALLIANCE is built at the crossing of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago and the Cleveland & Pittsburg Railroads; the former is a continuation of the great Pennsylvania Central, through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, to the city of Chicago; the latter connecting the "Forest" with the "Iron" city, and with its branches associating in business relations with those two great inland marts a wide farming and grazing district in the Buckeye State. The etymology of the term denotes its origin, and though it has resulted that these two routes were not really allied at the time the town was named, yet it was supposed they would be. Alliance was named by Gen. Robinson, deceased, of Pittsburgh. The lots around the crossing were surveyed chiefly by the County Surveyor, Mr. Whitacre, in 1851, and the proprietors of the adjoining land were Simon Jennings, Joseph J. Brooks, I. N. Webb and Elisha Teeters.

And now that the town was located, it became necessary to improve it. Accordingly, a house was built by Mr. Hester, the first house ever erected in Alliance, and which is now standing, and occupied by Mr. Olliger. The same year, Mr. Hester started a store, thereby being the first to establish mercantile pursuits in the town. Mr. Hester gave the town the name of Freedom, by which it was known until ten or twelve years after its origin, or until the completion of the C. & P. and P., Ft. W. & C. Railroad, when the railroad companies gave it the name of Alliance. Mr. Hester made a public sale of lots, the same year in which the town was laid out, and disposed of several, upon which buildings were soon erected. In 1841, or about three years later, Mr. S. Shaffer came here from Pennsylvania and opened another store. Here was the first competition in trade in Alliance. And from these two insignificant establishments have sprung over 100 odd business houses of to-day. Verily, their progeny has been prolific. For the first ten or twelve years, the growth of the town was very slow; the accessories were few and infrequent. Another store was added, a small brick schoolhouse, a church and a few dwellings comprised the principal improvements. There was nothing here at this early day to attract immigration. The country was almost a wilderness; there was no milling privilege, there were few comforts of any kind to be obtained, and many annoyances and inconveniences were submitted to. The post office was two or three miles distant. There were no markets for surplus products nearer than Massillon, 26 miles away, and to that point farmers would haul their grain, receiving for it 40 or 50 cents per bushel. Our merchants' supplies were purchased at Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, and transported by canal and river to Wellsville, and from there by wagons to this place. In those days it required from four to six weeks for our merchants to make the trip to Philadelphia, purchase goods and return. Now, with our present railroad facilities, the same trip may be easily accomplished in the space of one week. The ground upon which the city now stands was, at the time of the location of the town, owned by the following gentlemen: Matthias Hester, William Aultman, Michael and John Miller, Mr. Scott and Mr. Cassidy. These gentlemen made numerous additions to the town, and public enterprises, in the way of land for the purpose of stimulating and encouraging the improvement of the town, but its progress was very tardy, and twelve years after its origin, or in the year 1850, the place contained only about 200 inhabitants.

Much the same as Altoona is on the east, Alliance is on the west of Pittsburgh, an offspring of the locomotive, a legitimate child of steam. In the history of the last few years, a great chapter of which is occupied by railway events, an episode injected into the stale memoranda of former centuries which are continued in this—stereotypes of diplomatic strategy, wars, marches, battles and sieges—this word Alliance has repeatedly appeared in the daily and weekly bulletins of news. Sometimes it has figured as the scene of unfortunate fatality, at others as the theater of social or political demonstration, and the telegraph announcing to distant cities the arrival here, or the passage of this or that distinguished personage through the place, has helped to lend celebrity to the town. The following is the additions to and composing the city of Alliance:

Mathias Hester and John Miller laid out the town of Freedom July 24, 1838, composed of sixty lots. William Altman laid out an addition to Freedom September 17, 1841, composed of eleven lots. Mathias Hester laid out an addition to Freedom September 17, 1841, composed of twelve lots. Alliance was laid out by Mathias Hester September 10, 1850, composed of fifty-eight lots. E. Teeters laid out an addition to Alliance September 3, 1851, composed of fifty-one lots. M. Hester laid out an addition to Alliance September 10, 1851, composed of forty-four lots. Jennings & Brooks laid out an addition to Alliance May 21, 1852, composed of sixty-five lots. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance May 16, 1852, composed of sixteen lots. William Teeters laid out an addition to Alliance August 28, 1852, composed of eight lots. E. Teeters laid out an addition to Alliance May 29, 1852, composed of sixty-five lots. Samuel Shaffer laid out an addition to Alliance April 15, 1853, composed of seventeen lots. Mathias Hester laid out an addition to Alliance December 13, 1853, composed of thirty-one lots. E. Teeters laid out an addition to Alliance April 4, 1855, composed of thirty-seven lots. John Miller laid out an addition to Freedom July 3, 1856, composed of seven lots. E. Teeters laid out an addition to Alliance June 14, 1856, composed of one hundred and fourteen lots. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance May 27, 1856, composed of thirty lots. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance June 9, 1856, composed of nine lots. M. Hester laid out an addition to Alliance February 27, 1856, composed of five lots. E. A. & C. W. laid out an addition to Alliance July 7, 1860, composed of — lots. Outlots sixteen. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance April 26, 1861, composed of nine lots. Lee's outlots, laid out August 5, 1863, composed of twenty-four lots.

Mathias Hester laid out an addition to Alliance October 14, 1856, composed of fourteen lots. L. L. Lamborn, May 18, 1866, and May 18, 1868, composed of one hundred and fifty-two lots. Josiah Rosenberry laid out an addition to Alliance June 5, 1867, composed of fifteen lots. J. R. Haines laid out an addition to Alliance April 27, 1864, composed of twenty-eight lots. E. Teeters laid out an addition to Alliance December 19, 1865, composed of one hundred and fifty-two lots. Linus Ely laid out an addition to Alliance May 11, 1870, composed of six lots. G. W. Sears laid out an addition to Alliance January 25, 1870, composed of seventeen lots. J. B. Milner laid out an addition to Alliance April 16, 1866, composed of twenty lots. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance May 1, 1866, composed of twenty-five lots. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance August 27, 1866, composed of thirty-two lots. Philip Etienne laid out an addition to Alliance July 29, 1867, composed of five lots. Elizabeth Grant laid out an addition to Alliance November 14, 1867, composed of nine lots. M. A. Ramsey laid out an addition to Alliance June 14, 1864 (outlots), composed of twelve lots. J. H. Haines laid out an addition to Alliance June 29, 1867, composed of ten lots. Grant & Rice laid out an addition to Alliance July 13, 1867, composed of eighteen lots. M. Hester laid out an addition to Alliance December 18, 1867, composed of twelve lots. Moushey & Davis laid out an addition to Alliance November 21, 1861, composed of six lots. J. B. Milner laid out an addition to Alliance April 24, 1868, composed of two hundred and five lots. Simon Johnson laid out an addition to Alliance September 18, 1868, composed of thirteen lots. J. B. Milner laid out an addition to Alliance February 16, 1867, composed of seventy-two lots. Teeters, Lamborn & Co. laid out an addition to Alliance, various dates, composed of nine hundred and ninety lots. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance May 6, 1870, composed of twenty-four lots. B. F. Rosenberry laid out an addition to Alliance November 20, 1870, composed of thirteen lots. Buck's heirs laid out an addition to Alliance March 13, 1872, composed of ten lots. I. N. Webb laid out an addition to Alliance February 22, 1870, composed of eleven lots. Anna Webb laid out an addition to Alliance May 14, 1870, composed of thirty-nine lots.

It will be seen that the city has 2,638 recorded lots. In addition to these are very many pieces of land but little larger than a lot, not numbered, upon which residences are built. There are 390 pieces of land upon the tax duplicate of the township outside of the incorporate limits of Alliance, Mount Union and Lima-ville. The average amount of land to each land owner in the township is thirty-seven acres.

The following are the additions and lots composing the town of Lima-ville: David Holloway first laid out Lima-ville June 18, 1830, the same being composed of twenty-two lots. David Holloway laid out an addition to Lima-ville December 8, 1830, composed of ten lots. Peter Akey, Isaac Winans and Alva Proutz laid out an addition to Lima-ville October 3, composed of fifty-nine lots. Peter Akey and A. Proutz laid out an addition to Lima-ville July 24, 1836, composed of forty-one lots. Thus Lima-ville has 132 recorded lots.

The following are the additions and lots composing the town of Mount Union, to wit: Richard Fawcett laid out Mount Union August 22, 1833, the same at that date being composed of forty lots. John Hinds, E. N. Johnson, N. Hoiles, J. Watson, Rachel Hoiles and Daniel Reeves laid out additions to Mount Union composed of thirty lots. Ellis N. Johnson laid out an addition to Mount Union May 22, 1851, composed of four lots. J. B. York laid out an addition to Mount Union September 30, 1863, composed of forty-five lots. Ellis N. Johnson laid out an addition to Mount Union November 29, 1858, composed of four lots. Pettit & Park laid out an addition to Mount Union March 29, 1859, composed of twenty-four lots. J. B. Milner laid out an addition to Mount Union July 20, 1867, composed of 142 lots. E. N. Johnson and J. P. Gould laid out an addition to Mount Union November 10, 1871, composed of ten lots. This number added to the 390 pieces of land, makes 3,437 distinct and separate pieces of real estate in Lexington Township. A number of the lots are yet in the hands of the first owners, but probably not more than would be equaled by the pieces of land in the three incorporations which are not estimated in the above aggregate. At a public sale of lots on Main street in 1851, made by Mr. E. Teeters, the lots barely averaged $40 apiece. The lots known as the Reynolds corner were purchased by Mr. Jacob Oswalt, of Washington Township, at $37. He thought he had paid dear for his whistle, and got Mr. William Teeters to take it off his hands. During the year 1873, the same lot, with but little improvements on it, sold for $13,500.

It is to W. C. Wilcox, Esq., the Recorder of Stark County, we are indebted for a transcript, owners and dates of the various additions to the township mentioned in this chapter.

The reputation of "Coates Lock-Lever Hay & Grain Rake," is so thoroughly established that it finds a sale in all parts of the United States, and large numbers of it have been shipped to Europe. The factory has a permanent investment in grounds, buildings and machinery, of about $75,000. Employs about seventy-five men, and turns out from $100,000 to $200,000 worth of work annually, while the gross sales of this rake alone have exceeded $1,000,000. At the Paris Exposition, in 1878, the "Coates" Lock-Lever Rake received the only silver medal awarded to any horse-rake separate from other farm implements. The business is now conducted under the firm name of A. W. Coates & Co., and is one of the most substantial manufacturing enterprises of the State, having withstood the terrible pressure of hard times and financial ruin of the past five years, and stands forth to-day with strong reputation and largely increasing patronage.

On Thursday, June 8, 1854, the first newspaper was published in Lexington Township, at Alliance. It was printed at Salem, Columbiana County, at the office of J. K. Rukensbrod, the present able and popular editor of the Salem Republican. L. L. Lamborn, a practicing physician of Mt. Union, was the editor. A few weeks after this period, a Washington press and a tolerable printing office outfit was purchased of Lyman W. Hall, the present efficient editor and proprietor of the Portage County Democrat, and brought to Alliance and an office opened in Merchant's Block. After this the paper was printed and published in Alliance. The paper was christened the Alliance Ledger. By reference to the editorials of the Ledger recently reviewed, the fact was clearly elicited that the paper was strongly opposed to the Democratic party. The readers of this article might infer this would be an astonishing disclosure to the author of the history of Lexington Township. The Ledger was also virulently anti-slavery and wonderfully

W. M. Coates

Maine-lawish. After about one year's time A. H. Lewis bought the entire interest in the Ledger, and ran the paper for two years. James Estell, Esq., then bought the office and ran a paper in the interest of the Democracy, under the name of the Times. Mr. Estell removed from Alliance to Holmes County, Ohio, and published the Holmes County Farmer, and was elected Probate Judge of Holmes County, and received other evidences of the people's confidence and ability. In 1856, S. G. McKee removed to Alliance from Carrollton, Carroll County, and purchased of Mr. Estell the Times office, and owned and published the paper under the name of the Times up to 1861. Barlow & Morgan, Webb & Co., Elmslie & Co. successively owned the office after this. Gotschell Bros. bought the office and moved it to Canton, and published a paper there for a few months. The Local was a party organ, giving its influence exclusively to the tenets and policy of the Republican organization. The Monitor was a hybrid; it tried the circus feat of riding two horses named Prohibition and Republicanism. The True Press belonged to the neuter gender hermaphrodite; some think it faced toward Democracy. The Monitor was chiefly edited by Mrs. Brown, a clever lady, fine writer and excellent itemizer. The Local was done up by Joe Gillespie. Few local items passed unchronicled in his paper; he was brief and decisive in his retorts and criticisms. The Local cut, the Monitor tore and the True Press poulticed; the Local pillled, the Monitor gripped and the True Press soothed. All of these papers were ambitious; the Local for party dominancy, the Monitor for money, and the True Press for that quiet which came to the waves of Gallilee. Out of the sanctum, the Local was affectionate, the Monitor courteous and the True Press placid. The Local was pointed, the Monitor general, and the True Press neither. The Local shot at the heart, the Monitor at the whole body, and the True Press shuddered. The editor of the Local was obese and childless, the editor of the True Press was gaunt and wifeless, and the editress of the Monitor was lithe and guileless.

They were an inimitable trio. Concretely they were prismatic, resolving a ray of life's great duties into primordial elements even to the negation principles of light, with all the intermingling rainbow tints. Abstractly they were less ostentatious and gaudy. It is true the Local, Monitor and True Press were not the Tribune, Herald and Times, or the editors Greeley, Bennett and Raymond, but they were respectable in their spheres, and the city of Alliance was proud of them as editors and citizens. In the way of journalism, Alliance was the peer of any interior town in Ohio. These presses were the heralds of the city's future; for them to languish was for the city to die at heart; for merchants and manufacturers to give orders for printing to traveling rats to advertise competing towns is felo-de-se—it was suicide—it was a stone at the goose or geese that lay the golden eggs; it might not have killed, but it wounded them. Mr. Lewis managed the Press for a few months, and then disposed of his office to W. F. Hart. Mr. Mossgrove assisted him as foreman and associate editor. The Monitor was started by J. W. Garrison and J. Hudson July 13, 1864. In October, 1866, Mr. Hudson sold his interest in the office to Mr. Garrison. This establishment in 1864, was a new and splendid outfit, with steam presses and all fitting adjuncts. Mr. Garrison sold the office to A. W. Taylor, and moved to Massillon where he inaugurated the Massillon American. Mr. Taylor soon found a purchaser for the Monitor, in the person of W. K. Brown. While Mr. Garrison owned the Monitor office, he printed for one year the Christian Standard, a religious paper in the interest of the Christian Church, and edited by Rev. Isaac Errett. The Ledger, under the management of A. H. Lewis, published for one year, the Family and School Instructor, a monthly of respectable size and appearance, projected by the Faculty and students of Mount Union College. Mr. Gillespie, of the Local, has published for one year the Literary Advance, a monthly emanating from the same source. Mr. Patterson, the excellent foreman of the Local office, and McKee's partner in the publication of that paper before Mr. Gillespie purchased his interest, ran for several years a job office in the building owned and occupied by J. Murray Webb. The Weaver Brothers also ran a job office in this city before they purchased the Minerva Commercial. Mr. Stewart McKee, who has been almost constantly connected with the press of this city since 1854, in connection with his son-in-law, now runs a tidy and excellent job office in Harrold's Block. This includes, so far as memory now serves, the various printing and newspaper enterprises in this city.

The Democracy of Alliance and surrounding country purchased an office and reshipped it to this city to print a paper under the management of one Robinson, who formerly had some reputation as a writer, having been connected with the Cincinnati Enquirer. At one time, Mr. Robinson, though a virulent Democrat, patriotically held that the national debt created by the war, should be promptly paid, and that the most expeditious plan to liquidate the nation's liabilities, was the payment of an internal revenue by an extravagant consumption of whisky. He largely and liberally practiced on his theory and his paper died. Patterson & McKee purchased the office and issued the Local. After a time Joseph W. Gillespie purchased the Patterson interest in the office, continuing the paper under the same name. Mr. Gillespie soon became the exclusive owner of the office, but feeling that a Washington hand press and accompanying material, much of it quite old, could not be made to meet the necessities of the increasing patronage of an enterprising town fast merging into a city, sold the press and office, the history of which has been briefly traced since 1854, to Lacock & Co., of Salineville, to which place it was shipped a few years back, and where it is probably entering on the vicissitudes of a twenty years' experience, such as it passed in Ravenna and in Alliance. After S. G. McKee sold his interest in the Local to Gillespie he purchased a splendid cylinder press and jobber, with corresponding and accompanying outfit, and issued a weekly called the Telegraph. The Telegraph apparently was well supported and entering a career of unusual prosperity, when one morning the citizens of Alliance were astonished with the report that Gillespie of the Local had bought out the Telegraph. The latter paper supported the interests of the Democratic party, and the Local was the organ of the Republican party. The purchase gave the Local every facility for successfully competing with the Monitor. There was more material than could be advantageously used obtained by the purchase of the Telegraph office, and Dr. Lewis bought a hand press and some of the material of Mr. Gillespie, and in the fall of 1872 started a paper. Since the above occurrences, other papers have been published in Alliance.

The Alliance Tri-County Review, edited and published by Capt. J. W. Gillespie, is one of the newest papers in Eastern Ohio, and has obtained considerable celebrity for its independence of thought, its bold and fearless defense of its opinions, and its carefully edited local and news columns. It is Republican in politics, but evidently does not take kindly to the extreme hard-money doctrines of that party, and having opinions of its own on all the issues of the day, to which it gives fearless expression and a bold defense, it occasionally of necessity, incurs the adverse criticisms of the more hide-bound leaders of the party with which it is identified; and yet, on all the doctrines which properly and originally entered into the creed and confession of political faith of the Republican party, as well as in spirit, the paper is "radical" and "stalwart." The history of the Review is one of success. In May, 1871, Capt. Gillespie bought a half-interest in the Alliance Local, a small "patent outside" sheet, struggling for existence with a nominal subscription list of barely three hundred, and, in company with Capt. S. G. McKee, undertook to conduct it as a neutral paper. This, of course, was unsatisfactory. A man with positive opinions and convictions, must necessarily chafe and fret under the restraints of neutral journalism, and in November of the same year, Capt. Gillespie bought out his partner, and, abandoning the "patent outside," changed its character to one of the most pronounced and wide-awake Republican papers in the Seventeenth Congressional District. From that day may be dated the present popularity of the paper, and its publisher could not help but see, in a short time, that it had outgrown its name and had become something more than a mere "local" paper. He, therefore, dropped the name Local and substituted the more pretentious and significant title of Review, changing its form, too, to a quarto and enlarging it. The next advance step was taken in 1876, when the Review was made a cash-in-advance paper, and immediately following this and entirely contrary to the expectations of many of its friends, it obtained a circulation four times larger than any paper ever published in the town of Alliance. But another change seemed to be demanded, and in the same line, indicating growth and progress; the Review rapidly extended its circulation in the adjoining counties till, on the 1st of January, 1881, its proprietor, as a fitting recognition of this generous patronage, adopted its present title; and now, as the Tri-County Review, its subscription is larger than ever before, and daily increasing. Aggressive, outspoken, saucy and combative as the Review has always been, it, of course, has made some enemies, and in its treatment of these, it seemed never to be able to appreciate the nursery axiom of "a kiss for a blow." Tit-for-tat was rather its motto, and it seems to really enjoy a square stand-up fight, and is not likely to grow rusty in literary pugilism for want of practice, or sulk, or whine, or sniffle at the result of any of its set-tos.

One of the leading Republican newspapers of Stark County is the Alliance Standard, which was established January 1, 1880, by John G. Garrison. At its inception, the Standard was a six-column folio, but under Mr. Garrison's careful editorial and practical mechanical management, it soon became an enterprising local journal, and an enlargement became necessary. It is now an eight-column folio. The Standard has steadily grown in favor and influence until it has become one of the most widely read local newspapers ever published in Alliance. Its careful make-up, fine paper, good press work and neat typographical appearance, give it the reputation of being a handsome county paper. Much of the success of the Standard is due to the refined and elevating manner in which it has been conducted, as well as its fair and gentlemanly treatment of the people, whether they were patrons of the paper or not, and its impartial, unselfish and journalistic manner of handling all questions. The office is one of the finest equipped of the kind in the county, and the only one in the city which combines all features of the printing business under one management. A new six-horse power engine, paper cutter and other conveniences have recently been added, making the job department most complete. Much of the work turned out by Garrison's Standard Steam Printing House has never been equaled in the city, and would favorably compare with that executed by first-class city offices.

The Monitor was established in 1864, by Hudson & Garrison. In 1865, Hudson sold his interest to his partner, J. W. Garrison (father of the editor of the Standard, of Alliance), who conducted the paper until he established the Massillon American in 1869, when he sold the Monitor to A. W. Taylor, who, a year later, disposed of it to Rev. W. K. Brown and wife. They ran it until 1877, when it suspended. In 1869, the Monitor had a circulation of about 1,200 copies. The Christian Standard, with a circulation of 18,000, was published by Mr. Garrison from the Monitor office, at this time. The latter paper is now published in Cincinnati.

Among the industries that have appeared in Alliance is the large bagging factory now in operation. It was erected in 1870 at a cost of $32,000. Its annual capacity is 450,000 yards of bagging, which is used in covering cotton so that the latter can be readily transported to market. The material used in the manufacture is flax, tow and jute butts. The first two are obtained in this country and Canada, and the latter is imported from the West Indies. During the year there are consumed 600 tons of nearly equal quantities of flax and jute. The number of hands employed is from forty-five to fifty, and the average wages per day is 65 cents.

After 1824, and up to the time the Union school system was adopted in Alliance, there was a small brick schoolhouse, 18x24, located in the immediate vicinity of the Disciple Church, which house was of sufficient capacity to meet all the educational wants of this locality. School was held in this small structure three months every year. Since the establishment of the present school system, the township has been divided into ten separate school districts, and each district has a neat and commodious schoolhouse, with ample accommodations for the children of the district. In most of these districts a winter and summer school is taught. The Union School of Alliance was organized under the act of February 21, 1849, in the month of February, 1857. Mr. J. K. Pickett was elected the first Superintendent, in March, 1858, and continued to act in that capacity until January, 1860. George D. Hester was elected in August, 1860, and continued until June, 1861. J. K. Pickett was re-elected April, 1861, and continued until March, 1865. Jesse Markham was elected in March, 1865, and continued until April, 1865. D. M. Miller was elected in April, 1865, and continued until June, 1866. E. N. Johnson, Jr., was elected July, 1866, and continued until June, 1867. W. H. Dressler was elected August, 1867. The single building now known as the Central School was all the school room afforded, or needed, as late as 1857. In that year there were but 300 children in the Union School District. The first Superintendent had four assistants. One of the finest edifices to be found within the scope of a hundred miles is the Alliance College, a magnificent brick, erected on the hill site of our city, within five minutes walk of the railroad depot. It is just cause of pride in our citizens, being an ornament to the place, and those who conceived the design and carried out the execution can well be proud of their conception and labors. It owes its paternity to Prof. A. B. Way, and was built under the patronage of the Christian Church. It cost $50,000. Prof. Way was continued as Financial Agent, and to his herculean efforts we are indebted for the completion of the College.

Mount Union College was founded for a purpose, with a definite plan. Its humble origin, dating from its provisional organization, October 20, 1846, has ever since continuously outlined its progressive character; while its existing membership, appointments, provisions, instructed students, permanent improvements and regular workings under its charter, show its attained growth and usefulness. The true history of the College, showing the facts, growth and results of its plan, would be misunderstood, without constantly keeping in mind not only the results of its providential facts, but also as its progressive or final end, the following proposed or fundamental objects:

1. To found a progressive institution for truthfully developing right character, culture and knowledge, and for making a thorough, liberal, Christian education accessible to all.

2. Besides ancient classical, to provide fresh courses and departments fundamentally essential for educating symmetrically all the faculties, for promoting character above culture, and culture above knowledge, and for earnestly uniting the utilitarian, disciplinary and æsthetic; and thus practically and truthfully making not only laborers and scholars, but citizens and the highest grade of men and women.

3. Rightly to enable any students to choose and master a thorough general course, as the ancient and modern classical, philosophical, scientific, or literary; or take electives or a post graduate course, or a special or technical course, as preparatory, business, mining, engineering, normal, musical, fine arts; or such studies in any course or department, and for such time as students desire and need for harmoniously educating the head, hand and heart, and for giving them true personal ability, availability and reliability.

4. To secure a moral, healthy and enterprising location, improved and ample grounds and buildings; a voluntary and effective association of competent and reliable patrons, trustees, faculty and students, with wise management; logical systems of thorough, illustrative instruction, with moral, social, æsthetic and physical culture and self-government; also, progressively to secure improved libraries, and an abundance of superior, scientific and artistic apparatus, implements, cabinets, museum, picture galleries, observatory, gymnasiums, botanical and zoölogical gardens, aquaria, parks, models, relics and charts, with natural, classical, archæological, industrial, paleontological and æsthetic specimens, as cosmic endowments, with which truthfully to illustrate and apply all studies.

5. To make the college a free, patriotic, Christian and aggressive institution; to hold and use its property perpetually, in trust, for the benefit of its students; to bring a thorough, liberal, Christian education in easy reach of all, enabling enterprising students of either sex, however humble or self-dependent, to complete a general or elective course, and support themselves; to adapt the terms, curricula and management to the actual needs of the people, and to our country's public school system; to regulate the price of student's rooms and board, (their chief expense), and keep their expenses of living within certain low rates, by erecting buildings and providing good rooms and ample boarding facilities.

6. To promote the union of earnest and generous patrons, trustees, professors and students, and thus to perpetuate the plan and growing membership and usefulness of the institution, with God's continued favor, by largely keeping the College, internally, self-supporting, and externally, through permanent improvements as representative free-will offerings, and by progressively adapting the college to the actual needs of our American masses.

The main reason for chartering the institution as a college, was the better to carry out the foregoing fundamental objects, the time being arranged to suit the large attendance of students, who had in this institution been pursuing a full college course, and who desired to graduate and obtain the degrees legally and honorably from the institution where they had received their chief instruction.

In addition to the foregoing objects, the charter provides that the property of the college shall be held perpetually in trust, by a board of trustees, for the educational benefit of students. It is also provided that the trustees and faculty shall carry out progressively the foregoing fundamental objects of the institution; that they shall acquire and supply the means of a thorough, liberal, Christian education, equally to persons of both sexes, irrespective of their religious or political opinions; that the faculty shall possess and exert the requisite authority to establish and administer all necessary and proper regulations for the instruction and internal management of the college as related to students, and for any general, elective, special and practical courses of study; that the institution shall be conducted in harmony with the principles of Christianity; that any department or school that may be established, or any literary society or other organization composed of students, shall be under the supervision of the college authorities; that all moneys and property of the college shall be faithfully and safely appropriated by the trustees to the purposes for which they were respectively donated; that the trustees hold their office chiefly during three years, about one-third of the number being elected each year; that in electing the trustees, any candid person, religious denomination or philanthropic association, accredited or donating to the college money or property, shall be respectively entitled to one vote for a trustee, for every $25 donated to the college; that the institution shall be patriotic and Christian, but not sectarian or partisan, and shall be generously conducted on the voluntary philanthropic principle of doing the greatest educational good to the greatest practicable number of worthy, self-dependent students.

Thus, through trustees whom they elect as their representatives, the college is equitably and generously controlled or governed by the people who, with a united interest and just representation for the impartial and equal good of all, voluntarily bear the responsibility of contributing the means for sustaining the college in its benevolent mission.

The degrees or other honors that may be conferred, are similar to those that may be granted by colleges or universities of this or other countries. The charter has undergone no modifications; contains no limitations or reservations as a condition in grants or otherwise, or as to any scholarships or requirements as to instruction in particular studies, and provides for any changes necessary to adapt the college to the needs of the people.

Immediately after perfecting the charter, January 10, 1858, this institution, whose distinctive features had been nominally developing since its provisional organization in 1846, was now regularly and efficiently organized as a college. A suitable board of trustees was elected, with an effective executive committee, also a competent faculty of experienced professors. Rev. O. N. Hartshorn, LL. D., was elected President of the Trustees and Faculty; Ira O. Chapman, A. M., was elected Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy, and Secretary of the Faculty; G. W. Clark, A. M., was elected Professor of the Latin and Greek languages, and Treasurer of the Trustees, and E. N. Hartshorn, A. M., was elected Professor of Natural Science, and Auditor of the Trustees. The first class was regularly graduated in the summer of 1858, and, ever since, classes have duly graduated each year in the several authorized degrees.

The attendance and needs of students so increased, as to make it necessary to enlarge the college grounds and erect a new and capacious main building, which was in 1864 completed, the dedicatory address being delivered by Hon. S. P. Chase, who was one of the trustees. Among other things, Chief Justice Chase publicly said: "Mount Union College, as to both means and usefulness, is among the foremost in our country; it certainly is greatly needed; has a superior system of instruction, government, support, membership, and of equal and equitable patron relations; is nationally and wisely located and conducted; its simple and impartial, yet complete and distinctive, plan, merits the generous and united patronage of all American people, for it generously makes a thorough, integral, Christian education easily obtainable to every enterprising young man or lady."

In February, 1865, Bishop M. Simpson, D. D., LL. D., delivered in the large hall of this new building, to an intelligent audience of 2,500 persons, his address on the "Future of our Country," and at the close of which he publicly stated that "Mount Union College, manifestly a gift of Providence, is an eminently needed, live and progressive institution, where excellent government, high intellectual and moral culture, cheapness and thoroughness, with a sound plan wisely adapted to the enlarging wants of the American people, are happily combined."

Bishop E. Thomson, D. D., LL. D., another trustee of this college, spent a week attending the annual examinations of the classes and other commencement exercises, in the summer of 1865, and, upon delivering, on commencement day, the annual address, he publicly stated that "Mount Union is an established collegiate center, eligibly and beautifully situated, admirably managed, possesses highly valuable apparatus and specimens, with extensive collegiate facilities; its mission is philanthropic, equitable and providential, its objects impartial, practicable and widely demanded. This college has a superior and distinctive plan, embracing wise government, economy, right patronizing relations, thoroughness, elective courses of study, integral illustrative teaching, and adapted to develop sterling character, personal liberty and culture, and to meet the progressive wants of society, recognizing efficiently, besides the mathematics, literature and ancient languages, the growing importance of the natural sciences and modern classics."

At their annual meeting of the board, in 1865, on motion of Lewis Miller, the trustees resolved to erect an additional commodious boarding hall, to accommodate a large number of students, and thus to enable the college to keep the price of students' rooms and boarding at the lowest practicable rates. A Building Committee of Trustees was elected, consisting of Hon. Lewis Miller, of Akron, Col. E. Ball, of Canton, J. B. Milner, of Alliance, O. N. Hartshorn and William Autram, of Mount Union. In 1866, this committee erected an excellent four-story brick building, 132 feet long by 46 feet wide, on an addition of ten acres of college grounds.

At a special meeting of the trustees, held July 6, 1867, in the office of C. Aultman & Co., Canton, Ohio, "Dr. O. N. Hartshorn was authorized to visit Europe in the interest of the college, especially by investigating educational improvements, courses of study, the importance and methods of procuring apparatus and specimens, for fully illustrating and applying the various branches of study;" and subsequently, after reporting to the trustees, "the results of his investigations in Europe, respecting apparatus, specimens, courses of study, methods of teaching and other educational improvements," "Dr. Hartshorn was instructed to fit up rooms and cases, and to purchase proper specimens and apparatus for fully illustrating and applying the courses of studies."

Through written introductions and the recommendations of such men as Chief Justice Chase, and Gen. Cox, then Governor of Ohio, Dr. Hartshorn found ready access to all the educational institutions and national museums of Europe. He not only made full investigations, but arranged for the procuring, from every part of the habitable globe, rare and valuable specimens of science and art, on the plan and through the agents of the British museum, of London. Thus this Museum chiefly took its origin, and has since been rapidly and grandly accumulating, both systematically and economically.

In 1868, O. N. Hartshorn, in order to give his whole time to the increasingly responsible internal duties of the college, resigned the Presidency of the Board of Trustees, and Hon. Lewis Miller, of Akron, was elected, and still holds that office. About the same time, C. Aultman, Esq., of Canton, Ohio, was elected Treasurer; and Hon. Joseph Walton, of Pittsburgh, Penn., was elected Auditor. Hon. John A. Bingham, LL. D., a Trustee of the College, delivered here, just before starting as United States Minister to Japan, a public address, during which he observed: "I find at Mount Union College both the facilities and instruction quite as ample and thorough, as I lately saw at Yale and other Eastern colleges."

As the purling rivulet, issuing from some perennial spring, gradually carves its channel through flinty rocks, and enlarges its current by each additional streamlet, forming at length a majestic river, whose lucid waters, in their onward course, widen and deepen by accessions from a thousand noble tributaries; so has Mount Union College providentially taken its humble origin, and thus has regularly progressed in essential appointments, permanent improvements and eminent usefulness, by constantly developing, through voluntary agencies, its chartered objects, until it has already, not only gained a distinguished position in the confidence and affections of the American people, but also has nobly developed and largely achieved the following distinctive features:

1. The making of a thorough, liberal education, equally and economically attainable to all enterprising youth, without restriction of their true individuality.

2. Thorough, illustrative instruction, to develop symmetrically all a student's faculties.

3. Electives, or liberty in the choice of courses, or studies. The student may select any one of the four general courses; or, from the general course, may choose, in proper order and amount, any studies that he may be qualified to take.

4. Prominence to practical studies. This practical, Christian age, demands practical studies to develop all the powers thoroughly and symmetrically, and to give wise and full preparation for responsible, active life.

5. General and special courses, with free literary societies. In addition to the equal four years' general courses of study—classical, scientific, literary and philosophical—extensive provisions are made for systematic and illustrative instruction in thorough special courses, as the three years' preparatory, normal, commercial, music, designing, laboratory practice, engineering and fine arts, in thoroughly systematized departments; also, free efficient literary societies—the Republican, Linnæan and Cosmian.

6. Christian and patriotic; not sectarian, sectional or partisan. The college seeks radically, benevolently and effectively to advance Christian civilization.

7. Equal privileges to ladies. They, from the first, have been admitted as students on the same terms as gentlemen, to all the departments, to all honors and privileges, and are equally eligible to the position of trustee, professor or patron.

8. Apparatus and specimens to illustrate and apply each study. Next to good teaching, the apparatus and specimens for illustrating and applying the principles of science, are indispensable to a student's success in any study, enabling him much more easily and quickly to acquire and permanently to retain any study or branch of knowledge.

9. Economy in expense; there are no matriculation or incidental fees, which, at many colleges, amount to several times the trifle of tuition charged here. Simple dress, and plain, economical habits are encouraged. The cheapening and regulating of student's board—their chief expense—by having erected buildings and providing rooms and boarding facilities, save to students each term a large amount.

10. Three regular college terms, and one special winter term, each year; thus enabling students to earn their entire college expenses by teaching public schools during the winter season, while a special winter term accommodates others not teaching, and thus to complete a four years' college course in three calendar years. The college year is divided into three terms—fall, spring and summer. Students who teach in winter desire three terms—not two only—between the closing of their schools, about the last of February, and the beginning of their next schools in November; so that they can support themselves by teaching without losing a college term, and its consequent derangement of a college year.

11. The policy of applying all general donations or interests to extending permanent improvements. This has been the practice of this institution from its origin, and it has proved both successful and satisfactory.

12. Students taught and aided to govern, think, and to act properly for themselves. Free, conscientious thought and action are essential to the full and symmetrical development of true character and culture.

13. Care for the health, morals and comfort of students. Both the trustees and faculty take pleasure in providing every facility, and using every proper effort for promoting, as in home life, the health, morals, self-discipline and comfort of students, as well as their intellectual advancement, social refinement and general culture and elevation.

14. A college for the masses. Ignorance, or neglect of culture, is a crime—the radical bane of humanity. Every person should have educational opportunities as extensive and varied as his capacities. Those endowed with the greatest capacities rise usually from the mass of humanity, and belong to the lowly and industrious ranks. From the farmer's dwelling, the mechanic's shop, the merchant's cottage and the laborer's home, come the pioneers and advocates of true reform, national weal and human elevation. This college is designed for the masses—even the most lowly and self-dependent.

15. Self-government. Self-government, honest, voluntary and prompt, in strict conformity to published provisions, founded on Truth and Right, has always been the rule of this institution.

As evidence of the fidelity and success with which these characteristic features have been honorably achieved, and are now daily causing their distinctive results, the following facts and statements from competent judges will rightly attest:

Rev. C. H. Fowler, D. D., LL. D., former President of the Northwestern University, at Evanston, Ill., stated, May 27, 1880, at an educational re-union (at Cincinnati) of the Alumni and the General Conference Delegates of the Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, patronizing this college, and as reported in the Cincinnati papers, stated: "Mount Union College is pre-eminently an institution of the people, by the people, and for the people, and is one of the most useful in the land. It has been in existence as an institution of learning, thirty-three years; and, as a chartered college, twenty-three years. It has had over 15,000 different persons as students, and has graduated with college honors over 800 students, nearly 700 students being in attendance the last year." After referring to and concurring in the estimates and statements as made by Bayard Taylor, Bishop Gilbert Haven, Chief Justice Chase and Bishop E. Thomson, Dr. Fowler further said: "I have been there myself, and have carefully looked into its plan, appointments and methods, and know whereof I speak. It is no imitation, but a true aggressive college, with live and competent men composing its Faculty and executive committee of Trustees. Its students are as smart, energetic and persevering as are found anywhere. While there is due care for the health, morals and comfort of students, they are rightly taught to think, act and govern themselves. Science and Christianity are here practically united. Its Faculty, Trustees and Patronizing Conferences are doing a grand work, and the college should, in addition to promptly completing its local improvements, increase the value of its general improvements to a round million dollars, during this centennial quadrennium, and this will be done, for its Trustees and patronizing bodies, like its President, are able and enterprising. The college is healthily and beautifully located on the highest ground in Ohio, at the junction of the Cleveland & Wheeling and the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroads. The property of this college is worth over half a million dollars, above any indebtedness. All the Bishops have commended this college to the confidence and benefactions of the people, and Bishops Simpson, Harris, Bowman, Merrill, Hurst and Foster have delivered lectures or sermons in the college. As God is obviously in its plan and work, it will certainly triumph in the interest of the masses."

Bishop E. O. Haven, LL. D., former President of Michigan University, at the same meeting with Dr. Fowler, said, "I have never seen Mount Union College on its landed estate; but I have seen it often in its reports, in its work, and in its students. If it is to be judged by its results, Mount Union College is outstripping us all, and stands sui generis. In our educational councils and conventions, where the plans and practical workings of all our Colleges have been freely and fully discussed, that of Mount Union has received favorable consideration and commendation. This college for the people, also its generous capitalists and patronizing conferences, are well known all over the country. Its distinctive object of making a liberal education properly attainable to any poor and worthy young man or woman, certainly merits correspondingly large means and success."

Bishop C. D. Foss, D. D., LL. D., formerly President of the Wesleyan University of Middletown, Conn., says: "I heartily indorse what others have said of this deserving college, and hope its trustees, patronizing conferences, and all generous men and women of means, friendly to this unique idea of liberally educating the masses, will, during this immediate centennial, permanently place this worthy enterprise, in the interests of the common people, in the front rank of American colleges." Says Bishop I. W. Wiley, D. D., former editor of the Ladies' Repository, at Cincinnati: "To the remarkable objects and success of Mount Union College, not only our attention, but that of the people of our country are turned. This has become a well established college. Its distinctive plan and characteristic features should be brought to the notice of all, and be studied by all. It ranks among the foremost under the patronage of our church. It is doing a noble work for humanity, and its students are among our most energetic and useful workers. Its President and other members of the Faculty are competent and experienced, and are putting their minds and hearts in the great work of reaching the masses with liberal culture. The church and country owe a lasting debt of gratitude to Lewis Miller, the enterprising President of its Trustees; to C. Aultman, its generous and far-seeing Treasurer, and to Jacob Miller, and other liberal men of means, whose noble benefactions to this college will be appreciated during the ages by the self-dependent youth of the land."

Grants and Endowments.—1. The original grant, under which the college was chartered, was donated by O. N. Hartshorn, December 12, 1857, embracing, as appraised in the recorded schedule, all the property previously used by the institution, including the grounds, buildings, furniture, cabinets, apparatus, implements, specimens, etc., and by him, under the State and National Laws, conveyed in fee simple to the college as a body corporate and politic.

2. A series of grants by Professors O. N. Hartshorn, Ira O. Chapman and George W. Clark, donated by them from 1859 to 1864, chiefly in money for purchasing philosophical apparatus and the telescope; estimated at $8,200.

3. A grant of about eight acres of additional college grounds, deeded to the college, Dec. 25, 1861.

4. A grant of 630 acres of land, donated by Rev. T. C. Hartshorn, D. D., and deeded to the college, November 15, 1864.

5. A series of donations, by divers persons, including many generous contributions by citizens in the vicinity of Mount Union and Alliance, of the means for erecting on the college grounds in 1862 and 1864 the symmetrical and capacious main building, its value having been estimated by the architect, Col. Porter, of Cleveland, at $100,000.

6. A series of donations, chiefly by students, made prior to 1866, for procuring books for the libraries of the Republican and Linnæan Literary Societies, and furniture for their halls, estimated at $6,300.

7. Various subscriptions, amounting to $34,000, by various persons, as reported March, 1866.

8. A few small grants in 1876, to apply on erecting the boarding hall, and to purchasing ten new pianos, and an addition of ten acres to the college grounds.

9. Subscriptions, aggregating $20,250, by sundry persons, made on Commencement Day, June 21, 1866.

10. The donation of $25,000, made October 4, 1866, by Lewis Miller, of Akron, Ohio, endowing the Professorship of Philosophy and Astronomy.

11. The donation of $25,000, made October 4, 1866, by C. Aultman, of Canton, Ohio, endowing the Professorship of Mathematics and Civil Engineering.

12. The donation of $25,000, made October 4, 1866, by Jacob Miller, of Canton, Ohio, endowing the Professorship of Moral and Mental Philosophy.

13. The donation of $1,000, made October 4, 1866, by Miss Libbie Aultman, daughter of C. Aultman, of Canton, Ohio.

14. Donations amounting to $2,375, made October 4, 1866, by citizens of Canton, Ohio.

15. An extended and specific series of valuable donations for purchasing mathematical implements, chemical and physical apparatus, for the laboratories and lecture rooms, physiological apparatus and specimens, geographical and astronomical apparatus (not including the telescope), with various important apparatus for teaching engineering, mining and other applied science.

16. Grants of money and materials prior to 1874, by divers persons, for specific improvements, chiefly libraries, furniture, and improvement of grounds—$500 being subscribed in books by W. A. Ingham, of Cleveland, Ohio.

17. Munificent grants for the museum, repeatedly made by various liberal patrons of this college—the value of this museum being estimated at $251,000. This estimated value—$251,000—of this college's Museum of Science and Art, is considered too low by many experienced travelers and judges of the value of the museums in different countries, among whom are the late Bayard Taylor and Bishop

Gilbert Haven; the former, after carefully, in 1876, inspecting and estimating the value of the specimens, stated, in the New York Tribune, that "The museum of Mount Union College is among the best I ever visited anywhere, and the natural specimens are the most select and valuable I have seen in any country." The latter (Bishop Haven), one of its Trustees, after also carefully estimating the value of this museum, when attending the annual examinations of classes, and the commencement, in 1874, and subsequently, when lecturing in the college, five different times, stated, June, 1879, in his published correspondence to the Atlanta (Ga.) Advocate: "It is but just to Mount Union College, to say that its curriculum is as stiff as its neighbor's; and its graduates show that they have to do something to get out and get on; among its appointments is a museum superior to any other college in the country; I do not think the Smithsonian is richer."

Dr. Daniel Curry, of New York, stated, May 27, 1880, in an address then published: "One of the things to make a successful college, is money well invested, and enough of it. Mount Union College has an estate of over $500,000. The first time I ever saw its President, Dr. Hartshorn, he had just landed from Europe with a vast amount of—I will not say curiosities, but peculiarities. From what I know of the Custom House entries in New York, I can appreciate what Bayard Taylor said, that Mount Union College had the best museum he had seen in any country. Bishop Gilbert Haven had truly said that he did not consider the Smithsonian Institute's better."

18. A valuable grant of a silver mine in Arizona, donated to the College, March 23, 1876, by Col. William G. Boyle, of London, England.

19. A valuable grant of a silver mine in Montana Territory, near Bannoc City, donated to the College April 13, 1876, by James Hammond, a resident of Bannoc City.

20. A series of donations, chiefly by students, since 1866, for additions to the libraries and furniture of the Republican and Linnæan Literary Societies, estimated at $3,300; also a series of donations, chiefly by students, since May 1876, for procuring the library, piano and furniture for the Cosmian Literary Society, estimated at $2,150.

All moneys or property donated to the College, with all interests or proceeds therefrom, instead of any of the above being used to pay the professors or other current expenses, have, in all instances, been applied to increase the permanent improvements and facilities of the College, thus perpetually benefitting the students.

The Alumni Association has taken steps to endow an Alumni chair. The above amounts do not include the subscriptions of $35,000, lately made by citizens of Mount Union for permanent improvements, including a new museum building.

The educational work which this institution has, in accordance with the above principles, already accomplished, and the students instructed in the several departments, may be inferred, when briefly indicated, as follows:

In the department of literature, science and the arts, of last year (1880-81): Seniors, 32; juniors, 23; sophomores, 48; freshman, 118, preparatory, 155; normal department, 110; business department, 224; department of music, 183; department of fine arts, 21; making, as a total for the past year, after deducting those counted more than once, 679. The total number of students since the origin of the institution, is 15,911, of whom 8,917 have been employed as teachers of public schools. The whole number of graduations in the general courses, in cursu, with degrees and diplomas: Bachelor of arts, 173; bachelor of philosophy, 114; bachelor of literature, 7; bachelor of science, 100; master of arts, 121; master of philosophy, 43; master of literature, 1; master of science, 97; total, in cursu, 651. Graduates, pro merito, with degrees and diplomas: bachelor of arts, 5; bachelor of philosophy, 1; master of arts, 6; master of philosophy, 2; doctor of philosophy, 5; total, pro merito, 19. Graduates in the full commercial course, in cursu, with degrees and diplomas: Bachelor of commercial science, 405. Graduates in special courses, with diplomas and no degrees, normal or teachers' course: gentlemen, 2,716; ladies, 1,458; total, 4,174; instrumental music: full classical course, 12; Cramer course, 4; fine art course, 3. Graduates, per honore, with the following honorary degrees and diplomas: Master of arts, 10; doctor of divinity, 30; doctor of laws, 3. Total graduations, with degrees and diplomas, 1,123.

The city government of Alliance in 1873 was represented by the following officers :

Mayor—Simon Johnson.
 Clerk—A. W. Green.
 Solicitor—William Pippitt.
 Marshal—John C. Griffith.
 Treasurer—William H. Teel.
 Street Commissioner—Z. B. Johnson.
 Council—B. F. Mercer, Henry Aultman, John McConnell, Joseph L. Brosius, J. H. Sharer, Caleb Steele.
